Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

School Governors

2. Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what further steps he will take to inform school governors of their rights and obligations under local management of schools.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Sir Wyn Roberts): Before I reply to the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones), I hope that you, Madam Speaker, will allow me to welcome the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) to the Opposition Front Bench as this is his first Question Time as Opposition spokesman on Welsh affairs.

We will shortly be distributing to all governors updated versions of "School Governors—A Guide to the Law". This contains a great deal of useful information for governors including advice on managing a school's budget and staffing.

Mr. Jones: The Minister of State was slightly remiss in not congratulating Llanelli on their win over the Wallabies when he congratulated my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), our new shadow spokesman on Welsh affairs.

Does the Minister acknowledge that there has been a problem with the governors of locally managed schools and grant-maintained status schools which was only recently acknowledged by the Secretary of State for Education with the new Education Bill? Does the Minister agree that being a school governor at the moment is quite a hazardous occupation in respect of liability for health and safety and the Food Safety Act 1990?

Sir Wyn Roberts: Certainly, governors do valuable work. There are 20,000 school governors in Wales and between 12,000 and 13,000 of them were due to be reappointed or to be appointed anew this term. They have a great deal of responsible work, but, according to the reaction that I have received, they are taking their work very seriously and are doing extremely well.

Mr. Richards: Does my right hon. Friend agree that local management of schools has been an outstanding success and that grant-maintained schools will be an even greater success? What measures does my right hon. Friend intend to take to stop local education authorities under the control of Opposition parties from mounting scurrilous campaigns against those schools, and their governors and parents, that are considering applying for grant-maintained status?

Sir Wyn Roberts: Certainly, I agree with my hon. Friend that LMS has been a great success in Wales. Six hundred and fifty primary schools and 200 secondary schools are now locally managed and all schools will be locally managed by April 1995. It is indeed a short step from local management to grant-maintained status. I agree with my hon. Friend that parents who wish to consider grant-maintained status should be given fair play and should certainly not be bombarded by local education authorities. We are taking steps in the Education Bill to ensure that the amount of money spent by LEAs is equivalent to the amount of money that could be spent by a school seeking grant-maintained status.

Mr. Wigley: The Minister must surely be aware of the groundswell of opinion against the provisions that were put forward in the consultation paper in the summer and the implications that they have for all schools in Wales. May I press him on guidance to governors with regard to special needs education? Is he aware that many governors will not have a background in respect of the special resources that are needed, and that, if they have to make value judgments on the use of available resources, they may not have the necessary backgrounds to reach such decisions? What steps is the Minister taking to safeguard the needs of those who require special education?

Sir Wyn Roberts: There is a later question, as the hon. Gentleman probably knows, about special educational needs. However, over the past four years we have spent £12 million on support and training for school governors in Wales, so they should know about children with special educational needs.

Mr. Ron Davies: May I thank the Minister for the kind words with which he started this Question Time? I hope that he will enjoy my stay at the Dispatch Box as much as I shall.

When the Minister informs LMS schools of their rights, and, incidentally, tries to bribe them into opting out, will he be slightly more honest than he has been recently in his analysis of LEA expenditure? Not all Welsh local education authorities are underspending on education. Why does he not admit that there is no pot of unspent gold, as he suggests? If schools are bribed into opting out, that will be at the expense of the majority of schools in Wales which will not opt out. Why does he not accept that?

Sir Wyn Roberts: There is no bribing whatsoever. Through grant-maintained status we are ensuring that schools get their proper share of the money. The hon. Gentleman must know that local education authorities retain a substantial amount of money to maintain their services and their local bureaucracy. With regard to capital allocations, I have made the point clear again and again that there has been an underspend of 15 per cent. overall in Wales in the amount of capital spent on schools and colleges. There was a similar underspend, although not as large, last year and, indeed, the year before.

EC Funding

3. Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to seek objective 1 status for Wales, or parts of Wales, under the structural funds of the European Community.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. David Hunt): May I also add my words of congratulation to the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies)? I think that I am the third Secretary of State for Wales in 13 years and he is the third shadow spokesman in 13 weeks, but I wish him well for many years to come as Opposition spokesman on Wales.

On question 3, I shall of course be submitting to the EC proposals to secure the maximum support for Wales from the structural funds.

Mr. Dafis: I am sure that the Secretary of State recognises, or at least I hope that he recognises, the immense importance of strengthening the structural funds —the only hope for a vigorous regional policy in Wales. Is he willing to undertake to attend the Edinburgh summit and represent Welsh interests directly and specifically in talks about the importance of the structural funds for the development of the Welsh economy?

Mr. Hunt: So far as the Edinburgh summit is concerned, of course we work through our colleagues in the normal way, but I will personally undertake to do everything possible to secure the maximum possible support for Wales under the structural funds. As the hon. Gentleman knows, such matters are governed by the nomenclature for territorial statistical units, which is known affectionately in the Community as NUTS, and the NUTS classification is very important. Notwithstanding that, I will do my best to secure the maximum resources for Wales.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Will my right hon. Friend, in putting together his submission in support of aid under the structural funds, draw specific attention to the survey that was published in the Financial Times on 12 November, confirming the excellent record that has been achieved by the Welsh Office in ensuring that Wales is ahead of the league in the whole of the United Kingdom in attracting inward investment throughout the 1980s?

Mr. Hunt: The partnership with the European Community, with local authorities, with central Government and with the Welsh Development Agency has meant that Wales has consistently won record levels of international investment, as the report bears out. Just as the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) and I were at Stradey park on Saturday to watch Llanelli gain a brilliant victory, so Wales wins in the world.

Mr. Barry Jones: I warn the right hon. Gentleman not to strip Deeside of development area status. That would imperil its objective 2 status. Does he agree that this would be the wrong time, during a slump and with rising unemployment, to detract from the assisted area status map of Wales? May I warn him that the steel industry in Europe, Britain and Wales is under severe pressure and ask him what be intends to do to safeguard Wales's steel interests?

Mr. Hunt: In Wales we are proud to have some of the finest steel plants anywhere in the world, with a producitivity to match that of anywhere in the world.

As for assisted area status, I am about to meet a delegation from Clwyd county council about it, and I will of course bear what the hon. Gentleman says in mind.

Mr. Ron Davies: I thank the Secretary of State for his courtesy. I may be the third shadow that he has had to face in 13 weeks, but I assure him that I fully intend to be the next Secretary of State, representing a Welsh constituency.

The fact is that we in Wales need all the help that we can get, from the European Community and from the Government. Wales is now at the bottom of the British wages league. Last week's autumn statement will be a bitter blow. One third of Welsh workers in the public sector are already on low wages, and in effect they now face a pay cut.

Why will not the Secretary of State accept that, with rising unemployment and poverty wages, the last thing that Wales needs is a question mark hanging over its assisted area status in the important belt from Bridgend to Cwmbran—and as my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) said, beside the Dee estuary?

I am grateful for the right hon. Gentleman's undertaking to consult, but why does he not give the House an assurance that he will fight for assisted area status in Wales? Why will he not assure us that he will fight for Wales?

Mr. Hunt: I am delighted to hear that the hon. Gentleman intends to remain Labour spokesman for many years to come. I am pleased that the game of musical chairs has stopped, and I wish him well as Opposition spokesman for many years to come.

Since I became Secretary of State, wages in Wales have risen faster than the average in the United Kingdom—[Interruption.]—that is a statistical fact. But I also recognise that there is a longstanding problem in Wales. I want many more high-quality, highly paid jobs to come to Wales. I repeat what I have said about the importance of bearing in mind all representations received on assisted area status.

A470

4. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has for the improvement of the A470; and what work has been done so far.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Since 1979 over £115 million has been spent on the A470. We have plans to spend a further £120 million including the major improvements shown in the 1992 "Supplement to Roads in Wales".

Mr. Knox: Does my right hon. Friend expect that the whole route will eventually be upgraded to dual carriageway standard? If so, can he give any idea of when that might happen?

Sir Wyn Roberts: There is no economic or environmental justification for upgrading the whole route to dual carriageway standard. Our policy is to undertake selective improvements for safety reasons and to reduce journey times.

Mr. Rowlands: If the economy is to be made to grow by investing in capital projects, is there not a better scheme to extend the A470 than the one from Pentrebach to Cefn Coed? Will the right hon. Gentleman move heaven and earth to bring in the scheme ahead of schedule and get it started in 1993? Will the Minister at least assure us that the development of the A470 scheme will not be the subject of any silly experiments along the lines of private financing or tolling, as foreshadowed in the autumn statement?

Sir Wyn Roberts: The Pentrebach to Defn Coed scheme is one of the bypasses envisaged under the plans that I just mentioned. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the supplement for "Roads for Wales" he will find the time band in which it has been placed. Meanwhile, the draft line side road orders were published in September and draft compulsory purchase orders are expected to be published this month. A public inquiry could be held in the spring of 1993.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Is my hon. Friend aware that many of my constituents will be greatly relieved to hear that he does not propose to drive a dual carriageway through some of the loveliest parts of mid Wales, where there is clearly no economic demand for such a road. On behalf of my constituents, I ask him for an assurance that the representations made at the presentation in Builth Wells, concerning the proposed bypass, will be closely considered by his Department before any announcement is made?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I can certainly give my hon. Friend the last assurance that he requested. Consideration is being given to the views expressed following public consultation. I am glad that he agrees that, on environmental grounds, there is no case for upgrading the whole route; nevertheless, as he knows, many parts of it require improvement.

Mr. Alex Carlile: While there is no requirement for a dual carriageway throughout Wales from north to south, will the Minister tell the House by what date we can expect a decent-quality trunk road from north to south Wales? Will it be in this century or in the next?

Sir Wyn Roberts: Certainly we are improving the A470 and the A483. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the considerable improvements that have been carried out. I have mentioned that among our future plans are the Pentrebach, Cefn Coed, Merthyr bypass, the Builth Wells western and eastern bypass, the diversion east of Llangurig to Wern Villa, the Commins Coch bypass, the Lledr Valley improvements and the Llanwrst bypass, with a possible further improvement to the Pontypridd to Coryton section of the A470. We expect considerable progress, in addition to the considerable improvements which have already been carried out.

Council Housing

5. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his Department's latest estimate of the number of people on local authority waiting lists for rented housing; and what is his planning figure for the number of new public sector rented housing units which will become available next year.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Gwilym Jones): Information on local authority waiting lists is not available centrally. Decisions on resources to local authorities following last week's autumn statement, will be announced shortly.

Mr. Llwyd: In view of the large amount of informed opposition to Tai Cymru's recent discussion document, does the Minister agree that the proposal in it—that there should be housing on a development scale of 50 to 200 units, centred in four or five geographical areas of Wales—is utterly unsuited to the needs of rural Wales? Does he further agree that it flies in the face of the purpose of setting up Tai Cymru, which it was said was for local and sensitive development? Finally, does he agree that it would be far preferable to purchase existing housing stock and to refurbish rather than to build?

Mr. Jones: Tai Cymru's consultative process finished on 31 October. I hope that the hon. Gentleman took the opportunity to submit his comments. I know that Tai Cymru is keeping an open mind and will consider fully all representations made to it, as I am keeping an open mind on the matter. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was able to announce last week a further £38 million to be spent before the end of this financial year and I look forward to that adding about 1,000 new homes for rent in Wales.

Mr. Roger Evans: On waiting lists, can my right hon. Friend explain the other side of the issue and tell us how far Welsh housing stock has increased in recent times?

Mr. Jones: I am delighted to tell my hon. Friend that Housing for Wales and the housing associations have been making superb progress. This year more than 4,000 new homes will be added to the stock, which is a tremendous step forward by Housing for Wales.

Mr. Kinnock: Is not it plain that last Thursday's statement was, in respect of housebuilding, both incompetent and misleading? Is not it obvious that if local authorities must depend on additional sales to generate funds for new building in the middle of a housing slump, new building is unlikely to take place? Would not it have been much better, for the sake of the slump-hit construction industry as well as to meet housing needs in Wales, if the Chancellor had allowed local authorities properly to release their capital assets so that we could get on with some real building?

Mr. Jones: I feel that I may be in a unique position in trying to answer a question from the right hon. Gentleman. I am not sure whether he has previously asked a question since he returned to the Back Benches. I fear that he may have missed the point because the £38 million is to provide some 1,000 new homes. It is extra money provided by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take the matter forward. The point that he misses about past capital receipts is that all of that money, except that allowed by special dispensation, has been used permanently or temporarily to offset debts that have already been run up.

Mr. Murphy: If the Minister is unwilling to say how many people in Wales are waiting for council houses, may I be permitted to tell the House that between 80,000 and 90,000 people in the whole of the Principality are on council house waiting lists? If capital receipts in the next 13 months are to be used to try to build new houses at a time when it is unlikely that people will want to sell them in any event, what logic is there that nearly £600 million-worth of capital receipts, which are still tied up in our local authority coffers, cannot be used? Is not the Minister's suggestion a crazy nonsense?

Mr. Jones: No. The crazy nonsense is the fallacy to which the hon. Gentleman still clings. Except for the dispensation already allowed for, housing receipts have been used temporarily or permanently to offset the debt that has already been run up. Even after allowing for all redemption, Welsh local councils still have a debt of some £1 billion, which must be paid for by the people of Wales.

Railways

6. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met the chairman of British Rail to discuss the reduction in services along the north Wales coast main line.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend last met Sir Bob Reid on 7 September. They discussed a number of issues, including services in north Wales.

Mr. Jones: In his letter to me dated 9 November, the Secretary of State for Wales said that reports that rolling stock from the north Wales inter-city service would be withdrawn for franchise services were without foundation. However, we all know that during the summer that rolling stock was under considerable threat, as Richard Branson and others were bidding for franchise services. Will the Secretary of State now come clean on the issue? Was there a threat to inter-city services this year as a result of the franchising proposals? Will he give a categorical assurance that those services will continue when the next franchising proposals come forward in 1994 and, if they are to continue, that all services will begin and end at Holyhead?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome the privatisation of British Rail and franchising because it is possible that the north Wales coastal services will do considerably better. The hon. Gentleman knows only too well that direct services from London to Holyhead are to be reduced from three to two—[HON. MEMBERS: "Disgraceful."] Yes, but we do not run British Rail. It is not for us to involve ourselves in operational matters, which are entirely for British Rail. If I were the hon. Gentleman, I should be looking forward to the privatisation of British Rail and to franchising.

Mr. Rogers: When the Minister meets the chairman of British Rail to discuss services in north Wales, will he remind him that the valley lines in south Wales have experienced enormous problems with the lack of capital funding? As a result, they now state that they hope that there will be no demand——

Madam Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman is moving around rather geographically.

Mr. Rogers: It is a branch line.

Madam Speaker: Order. I know my Wales better than that. If the hon. Gentleman can stay within the question, he may have a supplementary, but if he is moving I am afraid that he cannot and we must move on.

Dr. Marek: As a north Wales Member, may I ask the Minister whether he accepts that at the last general election almost twice as many people voted Labour as voted Conservative? The hon. Gentleman has no mandate to be a Minister for Wales. In answer to an earlier question, he sought to wash his hands of services provided by British Rail for north Wales. He should make way for somebody else.

Madam Speaker: Order. That was by no means a parliamentary question. We shall now move on to question 7. I hope that the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) will do rather better.

Neath and Port Talbot Hospital

7. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about Welsh Office capital allocations for the planned Neath and Port Talbot hospital.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: In my right hon. Friend's statement on 29 October he advised that capital allocations were available for the next infrastructure works on site. It will be for West Glamorgan health authority to bring forward its requirements for future capital allocations.

Mr. Hain: I shall endeavour to stay within the perimeters of Neath and Port Talbot, Madam Speaker. The Minister has not denied that there is a view among the mandarins in the Welsh Office that Neath hospital, in which local people take considerable pride, will be downgraded to a new cottage hospital on Baglan moor —centralising trauma in Morriston and maternity in Singleton—thus reneging on a commitment given to the House last year by the Secretary of State. Will the Minister give an absolute and categorical assurance that the £18 million capital allocation for the construction of the new hospital, with all its planned specialties, will go ahead as originally planned?

Mr. Jones: I know of no suggestion that there shall be a cottage hospital for the new provision for Neath and Port Talbot. In addition to my right hon. Friend's statement last year, he specifically said in a statement on 29 October that we remain committed to a new hospital on the site at Baglan. We seek to go further and have asked West Glamorgan health authority to conduct a review into the best balance of services in addition to the hospital at Baglan.

Hospitals, South Glamorgan

8. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on future hospital provision in the area of South Glamorgan health authority.

Mr. David Hunt: This is a matter at the present time for the health authority.

Mr. Morgan: We in the Cardiff area are concerned about the delay in knowing exactly how many hospitals are to remain open and how many will be closed. As I have received letters from consultants at one of our leading hospitals, Llandough, saying that junior hospital doctors do not have any work to do, the Secretary of State will naturally, I hope, share my concern that the Under-Secretary of State, who is responsible for health matters in Wales, should think of giving up complacency for Lent. There is one big difference between the Under-Secretary and me as the two Ministers responsible for health matters in Wales. If I roll up my right trouser leg, it is to show people——

Madam Speaker: Order. I should appreciate it if the hon. Gentleman remained within the terms of his question.

Mr. Morgan: The point about the future of health provision and hospitals is that they have to be run by people who have a genuine interest in their proceedings and who do not make provision for appointing their own secretaries to the board of the health authority.

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman is not one of the Ministers responsible for the health service in Wales and he never will be. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and I have seen in South Glamorgan an increase in expenditure from £57 million in 1978-79 to £218 million this year. As a result, health care in South Glamorgan has improved considerably. The hon. Gentleman mentioned Llandough hospital. It received one of only 36 chartermarks awarded in the United Kingdom; that award is based on the highest standards of service and the high standards offered by the hospital. The hon. Gentleman should rethink what he says before he spouts his script without reference to what is happening on the ground in South Glamorgan.

Mr. Sweeney: How many more people are being treated in Welsh hospitals than were treated in 1979? Is that not the real test of the success of the health service?

Mr. Hunt: We have seen enormous increases in resources, from £57·8 million to £218·3 million. Over the past year alone, the in-patient list in South Glamorgan has come down 12 per cent., and the number of people waiting over a year for in-patient treatment is down 34 per cent. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the achievements of South Glamorgan. I pay tribute to all those who work in the health service in South Glamorgan, and I ask them not to pay attention to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) and instead to pay attention to the achievements of the Government and the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney).

Mr. Michael: If everything is so marvellous, why have wards at Llandough been closed when there are patients waiting for operations? As the question is about future provision, why is it that, since 1987, we have not had a proper plan for the future of hospitals in South Glamorgan, the plan produced then was unsatisfactory and was only partially approved and the planning of health services in South Glamorgan is in such a shambles?

Mr. Hunt: It is not in a shambles. The health authority asked in 1989 whether it might review its strategic plan and that is the review which is taking place. That is why the answer to the original question was that this is a matter for the health authority to determine.

Special Needs Education

9. Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what extra resources have been allocated for special needs education in Wales for 1993-94.

Sir Wyn Roberts: It is for local authorities themselves to decide how much to make available for special educational needs, but we are doing all that we can to encourage improved provision. Next year, for example, there will be a 17 per cent. increase in the grants available for training teachers of pupils with special education needs and, for the first time, funding to encourage the integration of children with special educational needs in mainstream schools. That is on top of a parallel initiative under our all-Wales mental handicap strategy for those with severe learning difficulties.

Dr. Howells: Does the Minister know that attempts have already been made to integrate into state schools children who are suffering from one impairment or another, and some have been successful? Throughout Wales, parents of those children are at a loss to understand how funding will be provided in the future, with all the gimmicks and experiments that are going on in self-financing and so on, and are desperate to know what the Government intend to do about what encompasses some of the vulnerable elements in society. Does the Minister agree that children who are afflicted in this way should at least be given an equal opportunity to make progress with their peers?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's last statement. The whole policy of integrating children with special needs in mainstream schools was initiated by the Government in 1989. I realise only too well that resources are necessary, but they can be held back by local education authorities or delegated to schools. There is a duty on the LEAs to ensure that, where children are statemented, provision is made to meet their needs. We know that some children are not statemented but have special educational needs. My impression is that the entire education system, in every kind of school—LEA maintained, grant maintained or whatever—is paying special attention to the needs of those children.

Mr. Richards: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Education Bill which was given its Second Reading last week will improve matters for such special needs children and their parents?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Bill will improve matters by enabling parents to express a preference for a school in the maintained sector, speeding up the assessment and statementing process, extending parents' rights of appeal and setting up an independent appeals tribunal to replace the current system of local appeals and appeals to the Secretary of State. Furthermore, in this coming year we shall spend £1·1 million on training teachers for children with special educational needs.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: Can the Minister advise parents in Wales who believe that their children deserve to be statemented, when they are in classes with those who have already been statemented, and who feel that their children are suffering a tremendous injustice? What would the Minister advise those parents to do?

Sir Wyn Roberts: That is one of the points that I covered on Second Reading of the Education Bill, which is due to go into Committee tomorrow. The Bill deals with parents' rights and it enables parents to have a far greater say about the education of special needs children.

House Building

10. Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many new houses were built by (a) councils and (b) housing associations in Wales in 1979, 1989 and 1991; if he will make a statement on the performance of Tai Cymru, Housing for Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Figures are not available for 1979-80 in respect of new homes. In the remaining two years, local authorities built 301 and 119 and housing associations built 534 and 1,003 respectively. Housing association stock has increased by more than one half since the inception of Housing for Wales in 1989.

Mr. Carlile: On the question of quantity, will the Minister tell the House his excuse for the burgeoning shortage of houses to rent in rural areas of Wales? On the question of quality, will the Minister join me in expressing sympathy to the family of Stanley Gregory, who died on Saturday having been burned in a property owned by Cartrefi Cymru housing association, to which he had been transferred under care in the community provisions? Will he ensure that, in future, those who go from hospitals into the community receive nursing care as part of that care in the community?

Mr. Jones: I join the hon. and learned Gentleman in offering my condolences to the family. I am aware of that sad case, which is being closely looked at by officials of my Department.

On rural housing, I remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that Housing for Wales has contributed £35 million towards meeting housing needs in rural areas, in addition to a further £10 million that has generally come from local authorities. The need for new homes is accepted, but again I must point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman that, since the Conservative party came to power, 126,000 new homes in Wales have been provided, which is an increase of more than 11 per cent., while the population has grown by less than 3 per cent.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

30. Mr. Lidington: To ask the Attorney-General what steps he is taking to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the Crown prosecution service.

The Attorney-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): The Crown prosecution service is continuing to develop best practice on a national basis through the national operational practice initiative. It is continuing to recruit high-quality lawyers and is making substantial progress in the implementation of the recommendations of the working group on pre-trial issues.

Mr. Lidington: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that reply. Is he aware of the problems that the CPS has caused to the police service in Aylesbury and elsewhere by its insistence that the police should supply it with lengthy written summaries of tape-recorded interviews? That insistence is causing police officers to spend hours seated at word processors instead of being out on the beat catching criminals. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that that is a waste of time? Will he consider whether the situation could be improved?

The Attorney-General: I understand my hon. Friend's point, but I would strongly acquit the CPS of the use of the word "caused". The use of summaries is standard procedure, but I recognise the advantage of typed transcripts, done by typists, straight off. That can provide tremendous benefits to the criminal justice system, as can the immediate typing of all the papers at that stage.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Attorney-General satisfied that at all times the CPS gets the right people charged? Is he satisfied that its effectiveness and efficiency, which resulted in the three Matrix Churchill people being brought before the court, were correct? Would it not have been more proper for all those Cabinet members to be brought before the court, instead of those three people? Is it not a coincidence that that case managed to last over the general election and was sub judice for all that time, so the real truth could not come out about Iraq-gate? If it had, we would have been faced with a different situation in that general election—where the Prime Minister and all the rest of them would have been referred to as the guilty men, and not the three people in that case.

The Attorney-General: The hon. Gentleman's comments are as riddled with confusion as any of those that we have heard recently. An important feature of our prosecuting system is that it is independent. The prosecuting authority in the Matrix Churchill case was Customs and Excise, an independent prosecuting authority which employed independent counsel. The independent leading counsel is someone of great experience who is much respected in his profession. He acted throughout with complete integrity—as, I believe, did everyone involved in the prosecution process.

Mr. Wilkinson: Is it my right hon. and learned Friend's belief that the Crown prosecution service is a more reliable prosecuting authority than Customs and Excise, which brought a successful case against Ordnance Technology in the Crown court in Reading last February? It led to the conviction of three directors of that company and two other personnel on charges relating to the transfer of weapon-making equipment, supposedly to Jordan. Will my right hon. and learned Friend examine that matter as well?

The Attorney-General: If I understand my hon. Friend correctly, he is worried about the propriety of a particular case. Although I do not know enough about that case, I think that he may well be able to refer it to the independent inquiry to be set up shortly and chaired by Lord Justice Scott.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the Attorney-General confirm that if the Scott inquiry shows there to be evidence of criminal offences by any person, however high his position and whether or not he be a Member of the House, the same level of independence will be applied to possible prosecutions as that about which the right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke earlier?

The Attorney-General: I confirm that absolutely. The prosecuting process in this country is carried out by independent prosecuting authorities without fear or favour and without regard in that sense to whomsoever it may have to consider.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the allegations by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) were superbly refuted by leading and junior counsel in the case, who said that everything had been carried out with complete propriety and that Ministers could not avoid their responsibilities? Were not those points made clear by prosecuting counsel when laying the papers before the court?

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend makes valid points, all of which will be capable of being considered learnedly, independently and impartially by Lord Justice Scott when he carries out his inquiry.

Mr. Fraser: Is not it the duty of the Attorney-General—both as head of the prosecution service and because of his inherent power to put an end to any prosecution, whether brought by the CPS, Customs and Excise or anybody else—to undertake that never again will he allow a prosecution to proceed where he had personally obliged Ministers to sign immunity certificates and where, if the judge had believed what those Ministers were saying, innocent people might have been sent to prison?

Is not the right hon. and learned Gentleman's duty to justice greater than the duty to Ministers to hide behind immunity certificates? Just what is the authority for saying that immunity certificates are mandatory? Surely somebody could use some common sense in these cases.

The Attorney-General: First, I agree with one of the hon. Gentleman's points—that the duty to justice supervenes all others. That said, I was surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman repeating a number of points that, quite frankly, are badly made and ill-founded.

The hon. Gentleman and I frequently ask and answer questions across the Dispatch Box, so with all respect I say to him that he is mistaken in a number of his suggestions. However, all those matters will be capable of being properly investigated by Lord Justice Scott.

Sentencing

31. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Attorney-General how often he has appealed against the leniency of sentences since he was granted that power.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Derek Spencer): Since 1 February 1989, when the power to seek leave to appeal against an unduly lenient sentence came into effect, 103 references have been made to the Court of Appeal, including nine references to the Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland. As at last Friday, 69 references have been determined. In 56 of those the original sentence has been increased—more than 80 per cent.

Mr. Marshall: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the Court of Appeal and the Attorney-General have combined to create entirely acceptable sentences that can be applied in future sentencing policy? Does he agree also that the high success rate emphasises the extreme folly of those who opposed the introduction of the new power by this House?

The Solicitor-General: My hon. Friend is right. We hear a great deal from the Labour party about justice, but let us examine the Opposition's record when the provisions passed through the House. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said that they were "wrong in principle", had been introduced for political purposes, and would impose

> "political influence and political pressure on sentencing."—[Official Report, 18 January 1988; Vol. 125, c. 692.]

That was an astonishing complaint because the letters that my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General receives asking for cases to be referred include a considerable number from Labour Members. Have they changed their policy in the meantime?

War Crimes Act 1991

32. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the operation of the War Crimes Act 1991.

The Attorney-General: The special unit established by the Metropolitan police is investigating all the allegations made to the Hetherington/Chalmers inquiry, together with other allegations made subsequently to the police. Inquiries are being concentrated initially on those cases offering the best prospects of a useful investigation.

Mr. Winnick: I hope that the 1991 Act will not be a dead letter and that those who should be prosecuted according to the rule of law will be so prosecuted. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that under no circumstances will Ministers sign immunity certificates in such cases? Bearing in mind recent events, such an assurance is much needed.

The Attorney-General: I can certainly confirm that if and when the police come forward with a case to be considered by the Director of Public Prosecutions and myself, prosecution decisions will be undertaken precisely in accordance with the code for Crown prosecutors and normal standards.

As for the hon. Gentleman's second point, he repeats a misunderstanding that has fairly wide currency—that to claim public interest immunity in accordance with legal duty is to deny the court a document. In fact, under the system documents are put before the court by prosecuting counsel. The judge then performs a balancing exercise having, if he considers it appropriate—as he normally would in a criminal case—seen the documents himself.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Drought, Africa

36. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he expects to visit the drought-affected areas of the African continent in the next six months; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development hopes to visit drought-affected areas of Africa again in the new year. She did so last September. We are wholeheartedly exerting ourselves to help the victims of drought and other disasters in Africa.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does not the Secretary of State agree that the 100 mecu currently languishing in Community development budgets should be urgently released? Will he bring his influence to bear at the EC Development Council meeting later this week, to ensure that money is spent on establishing a special plan for African recovery? Surely there is something seriously wrong with the system that allows money to languish when thousands are starving in Africa.

Mr. Hurd: I will certainly try to speed things up. This year, Britain has committed £150 million in humanitarian help to Africa, including £63 million to drought-affected areas. A great deal is being done to help.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Does not our noble Friend Lady Chalker enjoy a high reputation because of all the work that she is doing to improve our relations with Africa, and is not this country already doing a considerable amount to aid Africa—not least in the important matter of water extraction and the water industry throughout Africa, which is part of the base of the problem?

Mr. Hurd: That is certainly true. I am glad that—contrary to dire predictions from Opposition Members—we have been able to maintain our aid programme in the public spending review. I think that, in the circumstances, most people would regard ours as a very reputable record.

Child Labour

37. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it the policy of the Overseas Development Administration to use the aid budget to seek to eliminate the employment of children in dangerous or unhealthy conditions in recipient countries.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): It is the policy of the Overseas Development Administration to help those children who are forced, through poverty, to work in dangerous and unhealthy conditions.

Mr. Bayley: Is the Minister aware that an increase in the volume of exports of Colombian coal is forcing more and more people in Colombia to buy from the domestic market serviced by small mines? According to a recent statement by the Anti-Slavery Society for the Protection of Human Rights, 900 of those small mines employ children, some as young as five years old.

Does the Minister accept that the Government's policy of electricity privatisation has led to the purchase of considerable amounts of Colombian coal by PowerGen and National Power, and that compulsory competitive tendering has forced local authorities to do the same? Will he make it his policy to use the development budget to support development projects that will eliminate the use of child labour in Colombia?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have been informed by Carbocol, the Colombian coal company, that no coal exported to Britain from Colombia is produced through the use of child labour. If the hon. Gentleman has any evidence of the contrary, I shall of course want it to be considered very carefully.

It is very much the Government's policy to use ODA resources to help with the awkward problem of child labour throughout the world. Children are sent to work because of the great poverty that exists throughout the world. All our projects take cognisance of that, and try to improve living standards so that child labour is no longer used.

Procurement Policy

38. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of overseas aid is used for the procurement overseas of British goods and services.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The proportion of bilateral aid commitments tied to British goods and services was 76 per cent. in 1989, 79 per cent. in 1990 and 74 per cent. in 1991.

Mr. Fabricant: Do British manufacturers derive any export benefit from multilateral aid—aid given through the European Commission or, indeed, through agencies of the United Nations?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Certainly. I have just given the overall percentage for bilateral aid; a total of £934 million helped British industry in 1991. We reckon that, over the seven years between 1982 and 1989, every £1 contributed to multilateral aid produced £1·40 for British goods and services.

Aid Programme

39. Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the level of the overseas aid programme for the next two years.

Mr. Hurd: As announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his autumn statement, the aid programme for developing countries is planned to rise in 1993-94 to £1,900 million, compared with £1,835 million this year, and then to be maintained at that level in 1994-95.

Mr. Jones: Is the Foreign Secretary aware that today more than 3,000 Somalis are stranded, starving, in a ship in the Red sea? That is a matter of deep personal concern to my constituents in Cardiff who have relatives in Somalia. Is not the right hon. Gentleman ashamed that, on this day, we have frozen our overseas aid for the next two years, effectively saving £75 million next year and £150 million the year after, and cutting our aid budget by 12 per cent. over those two years?

Mr. Hurd: I am told that the refugees to whom the hon. Gentleman refers have now reached Yemen. Our aid to Somalia this year has been substantial—£27 million sterling. As for the total figures, I have received, as no doubt the hon. Gentleman received, many letters protesting against the Government's intention to cut aid by 15 per cent. I do not know where that story came from. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman does. However, it has been completely falsified by events. They show a rise, in cash terms, in aid to developing countries this year; a steady figure, in cash terms, in the remaining two years; and, as regards our total external assistance, including eastern Europe, a rise in cash and in real terms, throughout the three years. In the circumstances, that is a very satisfactory outcome.

Mr. Wells: Is it not true that the increase in the aid budget, which I congratulate my right hon. Friend on securing, clearly helps the poorest countries, and the poorest people in those countries? However, because it is tied to the acquisition of British goods and services and to the employment of British people, does it not help this country out of recession, as well?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, it does have that effect. Although much of our aid is untied, British industry benefits greatly as a result. It is widely felt in the House, even on partisan occasions, that the quality of British aid is high and that it is well targeted. I am delighted that the total agreed in the autumn statement is, in the circumstances, a good one.

Mr. Meacher: Contrary to what the Foreign Secretary said, does he not acknowledge that to freeze the aid budget for two years after 1993 will cut £75 million off aid programmes that had been planned in the first year, and £150 million in the second year, and that that represents altogether about 12 per cent. of the whole aid budget for this year—£225 million? Is the Foreign Secretary aware that the two-year freeze, plus the 15 per cent. devaluation after black Wednesday, will cut the value of British aid abroad over the next three years by no less than a quarter? Is he also aware that the latest cuts represent yet another prime ministerial U-turn and broken promise? At Rio, the Prime Minister promised that he would increase British aid, but it is being frozen and reduced. If he is still Prime Minister at the end of this week, should he not be hanging his head in shame when the European Community Development Council meets?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman has juggled rather desperately with figures which even he must admit are a good deal better than he probably expected. As regards his one substantial point, the effect on the exchange rate, he will know that a very large proportion of our aid is calculated and paid for in sterling.

Points of Order

3.32 pm

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As you know, I very rarely raise a point of order, but I do so today on an issue of considerable importance. May I respectfully ask whether you have received a request from the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), to whom I have given proper written notice of my intention to refer to him this afternoon, to make a statement about issues that he has raised in public on matters that are the proper concern of the Lord Justice Scott inquiry? It has been very much in the style of his recent unsubstantiated allegations on a whole range of topics and of statements that he had made that subsequently have been proved to be false. I refer to what the hon. Gentleman said in this place:

"I believe that self-governing trusts . . . are patently designed to pave the way for the privatisation of the Health Service."—[Official Report, 13 March 1990; Vol. 169, c. 339.]

As the House knows, that is totally untrue. Is there any reason to suppose that the hon. Gentleman's statement in connection with matters to be inquired into by Lord Justice Scott will not also prove to be other than false?

Madam Speaker: I think that I can deal with that point of order. The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) has not been in touch with me about these matters. As the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) knows, it is not a point of order, or a matter that the Chair of this House can deal with.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West) rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I hope that this is a fresh point of order and not the same point of order.

Mr. Flynn: Yes, it is.

Madam Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Flynn: You will be aware, Madam Speaker, of the long-stated concern of many Back Benchers about the need for parliamentary scrutiny of the secret intelligence service and MI5. There is news today that a committee is to be set up, but the suggestion is that it will not be directly answerable to Parliament. Given today's further allegation that MI5 has been spying on a member of the royal family, is not it crucial that a statement is made in the House and that the body that is established is directly answerable to the House?

Madam Speaker: No Minister or Department has informed me that they wish to make a statement.

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you confirm the deadline by which the subject for today's Opposition day debate had to be with your office? My understanding is that it was by close of business on Friday. If so, it seems a little puzzling that I have listened over the weekend to various Liberal Democrat spokesmen saying how they would rather debate Matrix Churchill and the Scott inquiry than the subject that has been chosen. Will you confirm that this is not censorship on your part, Madam Speaker, but incompetence on theirs?

Madam Speaker: There has been no censorship on my part; and I have been far too busy over the weekend to listen to the radio or to watch television.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As the guardian of hon. Members's rights, will you, Madam Speaker, deprecate the failure of Departments to answer questions tabled by Members? Last Thursday, I tabled 10 written questions to the Foreign Office and the Home Office about the impact of visas on Bosnian nationals. To date, I have not received even a holding reply. Would it be in order for the Minister speaking in tonight's debate on Bosnia to make it clear whether the 180 nationals who have been invited to this country by the Leeds-based organisation Alert will be granted visas so that they can enter this country for medical treatment and for the other urgent reasons why they need to come here?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman appreciates that it is up to the Minister at the Dispatch Box to make whatever speech he wishes to make. If he wishes to declare such matters, that is entirely up to him. It would not be for me to withhold any information or statement that a Minister wanted to make. No doubt the hon. Gentleman's point on parliamentary questions will have been heard on the Treasury Bench and he will receive an answer shortly.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I seek your guidance on how hon. Members can obtain an early opportunity to debate public interest immunity, especially in the light of the public statement made by defence counsel in the Matrix Churchill case that Ministers acted honourably——

Madam Speaker: Order. These are matters for the Leader of the House at business questions on Thursday.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. It has been announced that the Scott inquiry will go ahead, but its terms of reference have not been published—I checked with the Library before coming into the Chamber. Will there be some opportunity for the terms of reference to be debated in the House before the inquiry is set up? It will be extremely unfortunate if its terms of reference are rather narrow. The House will not have the opportunity of discussing the terms of reference, and if evidence is submitted Lord Justice Scott and his colleagues can argue that they cannot deal with it because it is outside the inquiry's terms of reference. Will we be in a position to debate the terms of reference and, if so, when?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting point. I refer him to the fact that it is for the Leader of the House to determine whether there will be a debate or a statement on the subject. It is not a matter for the Chair.

Sir Malcolm Thornton (Crosby): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You may be able to help me and other hon. Members. I understand what you said to my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) about the competency of the Chair in these matters. However, we are subjected almost daily to a barrage of allegations about hon. Members by the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook). In the past, such allegations have been totally destroyed when he has had to appear on television, for example, to justify them. Can you help us on the matter? Is there any way in which you can ensure that the allegations are made in the House to enable hon. Members to question the hon. Member for Livingston? If he has something to say, he should say it here where other hon. Members can comment on it.

Madam Speaker: Our rules and procedures are not being abused in any way. The straight answer to the hon. Gentleman is no, I have no authority in those matters.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In respect of questions about Saddamgate, we appreciate that there will be difficulties about what the Table Office will accept. One of the points I have been trying to get in the form of a question is how many Cabinet Ministers are involved in trying to pervert the course of justice. The Table Office is not very happy about taking——

Madam Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman has a point of order, I shall deal with it. I am not interested in any speeches that he may want to make.

Mr. Skinner: At the end of the day, all questions are a matter for you, Madam Speaker. If the Table Office says no, we can ask whether you are prepared to accept the question. If you are not prepared to accept my question —the way in which you jumped up suggested that you are not very happy about it—may we ask how many Cabinet Ministers are in the Saddamgate loop? That is the vital question today.

Madam Speaker: It very much depends on how the hon. Gentleman phrases questions. To quote a famous phrase, he should try harder.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I do not want you to think that I am not interested in the debates on homelessness and on Bosnia. However, further to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway), I clearly heard through the media at the weekened the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), the leader of the Liberal Democrats, say that he was forced to have a debate on those subjects and not on Iraqgate as he wanted. May we have your assurance that no pressure has been put on you to prevent a debate on Iraqgate? That will expose the scandalous lies that have been—[Interruption.] I withdraw that term.

Madam Speaker: Order. This is getting repetitive. Nobody puts pressure on me, either in the Chair or anywhere else.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Further to the answer you gave the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), may I ask you to clarify one issue? If an hon. Member deals in a distortion of documents, and peddles those distortions to the press, when the documents are clearly going to be the subject of a proper inquiry, will you rule it in order for Conservative Members to table early-day motions relating to that fact and to those distortions?

Madam Speaker: Hon. Members must frame their early-day motions. I shall then look at them carefully.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. On the question of documents, it is well within the recollection of the House that the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) has made something of a speciality of dealing in leaked documents of one sort or another. Will you advise the House on the proper relationship between an hon. Member and members of the civil service, especially in light of the hon. Gentleman's experience? On one well catalogued occasion, he used a document that had come from a civil servant via his adviser. Is that behaviour to be deprecated or to be applauded by the Chair?

Madam Speaker: The page number of "Erskine May" escapes me at the moment. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that the Speaker does not give such guidance and information across the Floor of the Chamber.

Mr. Jimmy Boyce (Rotherham): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) about the terms of reference of the Scott inquiry, I raised the same point of order last week and you, Madam Speaker, told me that I had overestimated your powers. I believe that this issue goes to the heart of democracy in this country. If you do not have the power, Madam Speaker, can you advise me, as a new hon. Member, how we can get to the bottom of the matter, given that people are hiding behind the Attorney-General's skirts and he is going to drop the terms of reference——

Madam Speaker: Order. The terms of reference of an inquiry are not a matter for the Speaker.

Mr. Boyce: They should be.

Madam Speaker: If the hon. Gentleman and the House feel that they should be, then by all means alter our rules and procedure and give me that authority which I do not have at the moment—but not today.

Opposition Day

[5TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Homelessness and Mortgages

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment standing in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.45 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I beg to move,

> That this House notes the shameful state of housing in Britain and the horrifying total of well over 150,000 families a year now accepted as homeless by local councils; further notes that over 75,000 homes were repossessed last year and that over 190,000 people are now more than six months in arrears with mortgage repayments; deplores the fact that in real terms the proportion of national expenditure spent on housing has more than halved since 1979; recognises that in the Autumn Statement, although Her Majesty's Government has announced a few measures which will assist some of those in need, its proposals are altogether inadequate and have yet again failed to include the release of the accrued £5·5 billion of local authority capital receipts, higher credit approvals for councils with few or no receipts including those in Scotland, and a nationwide programme of home insulation; believes that the only reliable way out of the recession is a large scale public investment programme of which a central element should be higher capital spending for home renovation and new build; and calls on the Government to introduce such a programme which would rescue the construction industry, boost the general economy and provide real jobs, whilst at the same time ending for many the nightmare of a life in cardboard city, in bed and breakfast accommodation or in a home that is under imminent threat of repossession.

It gives me no pleasure to have to introduce a debate on behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends on housing, homelessness and the mortgage crisis in Britain. I move the motion because, since the general election, the House has not had the opportunity to debate properly the state of housing in Britain. I move it because the housing crisis is a crisis the length and breadth of the country. I move it because, after 13 years of Tory Government, all their promises have been seen to be shallow and hollow and millions have suffered as a result.

In 1983, the former right hon. Member for Finchley, now Baroness Thatcher, said and had printed in the Conservative party manifesto for that year:

> "Our goal is to make Britain the best housed nation in Europe."

Nine years later, I wonder how far she believes that we have moved towards that goal.

The majority of people who come to Members' surgeries—and you, Madam Speaker, will be as aware of this as any other Member of this House—come with housing problems. It is clear to them that housing is the most fundamental issue that a Government must address. It is a kind of fundamental human right.

Housing is a moral issue as well as a practical issue. The Catholic bishops conference stated in 1985:

> "First of all, housing is a moral issue. Decent physical accommodation is a basic need and not a luxury; a right, not a concession."

Another quote sums up quite well how important housing is in the spectrum of policies that concern us all:

> "Housing is the greatest of all social needs. It is the first priority among social services. Even the best schools, clinics, hospitals, playing fields and libraries are something of a mockery to those thousands of families who have no decent home of their own."

That was a quotation from the then Prime Minister, Harold Macmillan, to the Tory party conference in Blackpool the year after I was born. Everyone of right judgment would agree with Harold Macmillan, and it is a tragedy that the 13 years of Tory rule have not dealt with that agenda in a way that the people of Britain need and would have wished.

We could look at any of the last four Conservative manifestos, but perhaps we should concentrate on the last but one Tory manifesto in the middle of the period in the 1980s which encouraged and pushed people into buying even though one had always understood that it was Tory policy to encourage people to choose—in this case, to choose whether to rent or to buy. The 1987 Tory manifesto stated:

> "Housing is the biggest single investment that most people make, whether in money or in time, skill and effort. In the last eight years, as a result of our policies, we have seen a dramatic increase in home ownership. In the next five years we will complement that with policies designed to improve the supply and condition of the rented housing stock."

Four years after the goal of making this country the best-housed nation in Europe, other targets were set—other targets which also have abysmally not been met.

On 4 February 1992, the Minister for Housing and Planning, whom my colleagues and I respect and welcome to his job, when speaking in the "Roof" debate, which we both did, just before the general election, said:

> "The goal has to be a decent home for everyone in the tenure that he or she wants and at the price that he or she can afford."

There is a consistency about the rhetoric. There is also, tragically, a consistency about the practice.

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way so early in his speech. The House will accept the sincerity of his comments and of the motion. While he is dealing with consistency and manifesto content, will he tell the House whether his party still stands by the pledge that was given in its manifesto in the recent election to scrap mortgage interest relief? Does he agree that if that pledge were implemented, and if it is still held strongly by his party, it would add to the misery of many millions of home owners today?

Mr. Hughes: Interventions are often predictable, and interventions that are culled from Tory central office briefings are more predicatable. I not only predicted but welcome the opportunity to deal with a distortion of the truth. I shall deal with that now because the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway) and his colleagues might otherwise continue to press me, thinking that I am not dealing with that matter straight away.

My colleagues and I have had a very clear view, and it is supported by all informed opinion, no matter whether it is professional from the housing sector, from the Confederation of British Industry, from housing charities or from the most famous source of all, the inquiry chaired by the Duke of Edinburgh, and that is that a system of tax relief that advantages those who purchase over those who rent is unfair and should be replaced as soon as possible in the fairest possible way.

What my colleagues and I proposed at the election was very simple. It was not the abolition of mortgage interest tax relief; it was for the future and for those who have not yet bought the replacement of that form of tax relief by a different form of tax relief, which we called housing cost relief and which would be available to those who bought and to those who rented alike. We have never proposed abolition. We have proposed doing what all informed opinion argues should be done, which is to move to a fair system of assisting everybody to acquire a home of the sort that they want when they want.

Mr. Conway: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: I will not give way again, because I hope that the answer was not only comprehensive but that it will allow the hon. Gentleman to understand our policy and not distort it.

Conservative policies of the past 13 years have resulted for many in homelessness or old, cold and damp housing, and, worse in recent years, the increasing risk to those who have bought that their homes will be repossessed over their heads. That blight affects all parts of the country and people of all ages and backgrounds. Whether I talk to my hon. Friends the Members for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) and for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), who are from one of the most remote parts of the north of Scotland in rural Britain, my hon. and learned Friend from rural mid-Wales, the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), my hon. Friends from the south-west, whether in citiies such as Bath or Truro or in rural communities such as north Conwall and north Devon, my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), or my colleagues on the council in the London borough of Southwark, the problem is essentially the same. There are queues of people who cannot be housed and queues of people who, although housed, do not think that they will be able to stay in their housing either because it is unfit or because they fear that they will not be able to keep up the payments for the home which they have been persuaded to buy.

Young people and others on the streets of cities such as London are the most visible victims, but there are many other invisible victims of the housing crisis. Today, my colleagues and I want to show that there are in this House people who understand the severity of the crisis and who believe it possible, given the political will and within the term of one Parliament, to ensure that the goals expressed over the years are achieved and that everyone in Britain has a home at a price he or she can afford.

I shall deal briefly with the record. How many houses are there; are we meeting the need? The statistics are clear. The most recent figures on house building starts and completions were issued by the Department of the Environment in November this year. They show that starts in Great Britain in the past 10 years have decreased from 194,000 to 160,000—lower than ever before. Completions have fallen from 175,800 to about 167,000—lower than ever before.

The National Council of Building Material Producers, in its October bulletin on the state of the building industry, says:

> "There are ominous signs that the industry is now moving into a deeper recessionary phase and that the situation is very much worse than had been anticipated in our February survey. The autumn state of trade survey reflects the appalling state of the construction industry."

The number of jobs in all parts of the industry has fallen too. Since July 1989 the Federation of Master Builders has lost 260,000 construction workers. A quarter of the skilled work force is out of work, and apprenticeships are down by 50 per cent.

We are not building the necessary houses, and on current projections there is no prospect of our doing so.

What has happened meanwhile to the number of people wanting property? The most objective statistics are those for households accepted as homeless. Record numbers of such households exist. In England, in the second quarter of 1992, there were 34,840. In London, in the second quarter of 1992, 9,400 households were accepted as homeless and there were more than 10,000 in other English metropolitan areas. In the same period 62,780 households were in temporary accommodation—6,500 more than a year ago; 11,000 households were in bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

Last year more than 150,000 households in the United Kingdom were accepted as homeless, and about 1,250,000 were on waiting lists. Probably another 750,000 households need somewhere, but are staying with family or friends on settees or on floors. The census carried out a year ago counted just under 3,000 people sleeping rough, and at the same time a quarter of the housing stock is deemed unsuitable for human habitation, as defined by an Act of Parliament introduced by this Government.

England, Scotland and Wales exhibit similar characteristics. Increases between 1979 and 1989-91 are recorded in all three countries. In 1979, in England, about 55,000 were accepted as homeless; in 1987, the relevant figure was 109,000; and in 1991, 150,000. In Wales, the figure rose from between 4,000 and 5,000 to more than 6,000, and, in Scotland, from 7,500 to more than 10,000. These are not just statistics: they are people and families among the most vulnerable groups in society, and we all too regularly hear tragic stories of people in just such categories as these.

Of course, during the eighties, many people took the Government's advice and bought. They decided to avail themselves of mortgage interest tax relief and became owner-occupiers. What has happened to them? So far, 1992 has been—and is likely to continue to be—the worst year for house price reductions since records began. The transaction volume—the number of properties bought and sold—is the lowest since 1974, when far fewer people owned their homes.

Mortgage rates and mortgage repayments are low—no doubt the Minister will tell us that they are the lowest for 20 years—but, with the fears surrounding the prospect of purchase today, many people now will not buy.

The worst fear is that of unemployment. According to every projection, official unemployment is soon likely to rise to well over 3 million and people are not likely to buy if they do not think that they will have the money to pay for their house. They fear that the house price will fall below the value of the mortgage. One in five of the people who bought during the past five years now owns a property which is worth less than they paid for it. That is hardly a good investment, although one that has been explicitly encouraged by Tory policies.

As of June, according to the most recent report of UBS Phillips and Drew, there were 1·5 million households in the debt trap, which is one seventh of all households with a mortgage. The Bank of England estimates that 1 million people are in that position and have an average debt of more than £6,000 on their property.

Mr. Jonathan Evans (Brecon and Radnor): The hon. Gentleman referred to the UBS Phillips and Drew survey. He is aware, of course, that earlier in the year a UBS Phillips and Drew forecast was that there might be a 14 per cent. increase in house prices next year. One of the fears was that that might start too much of a sustained rush back into owner occupation. The picture that the hon. Gentleman paints, which reflects the concerns of many home owners, must be seen within the context of the survey he quoted, which also said that that situation might quickly turn round.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): We have heard that before.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, as my hon. Friend says, we have heard that before: we have heard all too many promises about green shoots and things turning round.

I have read the whole of the most recent survey, which makes it abundantly clear, in black and white, that the prospect is that things will get worse and not better in 1993. That was before the autumn statement, which I shall deal with later. The survey states that, at best, things might improve for some people in 1994. I hope the hon. Gentleman does not dispute what the survey says.

The survey also states that confidence in the housing market is at an all-time low. I do not think that there is any dispute about the fact that all those people who were encouraged to buy are now in as bad a position as many who stayed in the rented sector.

To put the most unpleasant icing on this unpleasant cake, one of the saddest things that I have read was in a law report in The Times in August. The headline read, "Children of mortgage defaulters have no right to be rehoused." If one fails to keep up mortgage payments, one can be declared to be intentionally homeless and cannot therefore be housed by the local authority, which would otherwise have a duty to house people who were on the streets.

Our last major indictment is on debt. The right hon. Lady who was, until recently, the Prime Minister of this country for far too many years said that she was in favour of family life and against debt. What has happened to debt which is the product of house purchase, which is normally the most expensive purchase that anyone makes? In the early 1980s, personal debt was about 55 per cent. of the annual disposable income of adults in Great Britain; it is now 114 per cent. of disposable income. At the same time as the number of people waiting to be housed has risen, so the number of people in debt with their properties and likely to remain so has risen. Many of them bought under the right-to-buy scheme initiated in the 1980s. They are in as bad a state as the rest, with unexpected capital, service, and sinking fund charges to pay. Having bought council stock from a council whose tenants they had been for years, they now find that they cannot keep up the mortgage payments either.

All those things are happening while around us tens of thousands, or even hundreds of thousands, of empty properties lie waiting to be used.

Tory policy in relation to tenants and owner-occupiers could be summarised so far as a double whammy. It is now in danger of becoming a triple whammy because a potentially final knockout blow is about to be struck. Next April, people in housing will have to pay a council tax, and the bills of many people who pay a poll tax may go up by 50 per cent. The council tax about to be brought in by the Government will make the properties to which many people have hung on through the bad times impossible to hang on to any longer.

It is not surprising that the Government's policies have not lived up to expectations because their expenditure on housing as a percentage of our national wealth has dropped phenomenally. When the Government came to power, we spent about £11·5 thousand million on housing; we now spend less than £6 thousand million. The Minister cannot argue that such a large proportion of people have bought their own homes that the percentage is bound to go down. He knows that the number of people who have bought their own homes has not doubled in the past 10 years and that, while the budget on housing has been slashed, expenditure on health, law and order and social security as a proportion of our national wealth has gone up substantially. The Government cannot expect people to be adequately housed when they cut the nation's housing budget from 2·7 per cent. to 1 per cent. of gross domestic product—a cut of 62 per cent., which is larger than the cut in the budget of any other of the Government's public expenditure programmes.

Not only politicians but many of our constituents were hoping that, at the Government's first opportunity since the election, they would have realised the urgency of the problem. Even Conservatives were hoping that, and many local Conservative associations submitted motions on housing to the Tory party conference, among other things, urging the Government to remove controls on local authorities' receipts. Motions from north Cornwall, Taunton and Honiton, among others from the south and from the north, said that the £6 billion or a little less from the sale of council properties should be used. The Confederation of British Industry, Shelter and all the opposition parties argued for it.

However, the autumn statement failed adequately to respond. On housing, it started by stating the obvious. The Minister said that housing and the construction industry had faced particular difficulties in the past two years, and then made some announcements. Although there is extra money, two obvious comments can be made about the £700 million plus which the Government committed last week. First, it is simply a drop in the ocean; and, secondly, it is a con because much of the money that has now been given has been taken away from programmes for the following two years.

A simple, objective analysis was made in the weekend press. The Guardian on Saturday said:

> "The Chancellor's Autumn Statement brought some cheer to home buyers but fell far short of the radical moves which many had hoped for."

The CBI said:

> "Capital receipts are also unevenly distributed and it is too early to assess the effects of the relaxation of the rules . . . on individual authorities."

The Association of Metropolitan Authorities said:

> "On capital receipts we are told we cannot spend the money we raised when the property boom was in progress but we can spend anything we can raise now the boom is past and gone. Such freedom is not going to lead to much rejoicing in the coalfields and the conurbations."

Last week the Government responded to the call for the release of capital receipts—but which capital receipts? Only those from 13 November 1992 until 1 January 1994, predicted receipts the Government say are worth about £1·75 billion. Putting aside the fact that most Government predictions over the past few years have been miles from the truth, there is not much point in saying that anyone who buys now from a local authority—and they might be mad to do so—will see their purchase money spent by that authority to increase the lowest ever amount of local authority building. As the AMA press release made clear, the capital receipts that were accumulated when people were buying because the market was good are still frozen in the bank. In England and Wales they are called receipts, while in Scotland they are called credits, but the result of the announcement is just the same.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): I can see how the release of capital receipts would benefit my constituency in which there have been many council house sales and where we have had to tackle an acute but not large problem of homelessness. However, I am slightly at a loss to see how it would help the hon. Gentleman's constituents, because his local authority is already £0·9 billion in debt.

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Gentleman touches on the important problem of how to render equal treatment to local authorities, given that the right to buy is exercised much more in areas where there are more houses than high-rise flats. He cites a good example because my authority has about 60,000 properties, the largest number of any London authority. They are mainly flats, and many of them are high-rise flats which do not sell as well as traditional council housing.

The subject is complicated and I shall not do the hon. Gentleman the injustice of pretending that it is simple. There are various ways to account for public expenditure capital receipts and to attribute the money to the accounting budget in terms of either the Government planning total or the public expenditure borrowing requirement. It is, however, possible to arrange the collection of receipts and the distribution of local authority rights to borrow to give a fair distribution that responds to the needs of local authorities.

My hon. Friends and I, whether we represent urban or rural constituencies, argue for a formula that will fairly distribute for housing renovation or repair the money that is currently locked in local authority coffers or banks. Of course, some of that money may already have been spent. It is quite possible to do that without exceeding the Government's public expenditure total of £45 billion. The Minister and I and others have had long debates about that. I shall give the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) an example. We could retrospectively legislate to allow receipts prior to this financial year to be counted outside the public expenditure total. It would have no effect on the Government total for the current year or on their projections for the year ahead. The issue is complicated, but there is a solution and the Government should find it.

The Government have given £750 million to housing associations to buy empty and repossessed properties and it is reckoned that about 20,000 such properties will be bought. However, the con is that, although the Government previously promised the Housing Corporation £1·92 billion for 1993-94, that sum has now been reduced by £133 million. For the following year, they previously promised the Housing Corporation £1·77 billion, but that has now been reduced by £190 million as well. There is money to bring back 20,000 properties into use, but it has been found at the expense of meeting the housing needs of Britain in 1993 and the years to come. If that is not a con, what is? It is also sad that the rough sleepers initiative, which was supposed to meet the needs of those at the acute end of the housing crisis, has also been cut as a result of the autumn statement.

My party has argued a consistent case for many years. It is that the only way for Britain to be adequately housed is for us to invest in it, led from the public purse by those in charge of the Exchequer and Ministers in spending Departments. We repeat that call today. Let me put it simply, because the arguments have been well made.

There should be a large increase in public expenditure, specifically to fund house building and house repairs. It is good value for money, and it not a foolish way to conduct public accounts. We should cut the uniform business rate as that will allow some businesses to put money into housing as well. We should have a stable interest rate policy so that people feel encouraged to buy, in the knowledge that they will not be penalised in the years ahead. We should invest in training and in keeping people in work so that the construction industry can recover.

Perhaps most acutely now, there should be a new element of public finance, a subsidy that would allow people in difficulty to keep their homes or perhaps convert from mortgages to rents. It is entirely possible—and we have put out figures to show this—to start turning the corner of Britain's housing crisis. Our indictment of the Government is that, over the past 13 years—and they cannot blame anybody else because they have been told over and over again—they have, worse than not listening and failing to act, condemned millions of people in a rich and civilised country to conditions that are not only unsatisfactory but often inhumane.

Of all elements of policy, it is this policy and record of which the Government should be most ashamed. I am sad that they have so far given no adequate answers. I hope that now they are at least embarrassed enough to do something about the crisis before many other people suffer as all too many have already done.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Sir George Young): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"notes the Government's continuing commitment to housing policies designed to ensure that a decent home is within reach of every family, and in particular to promoting the growth of owner-occupation, widening choice for tenants, and improving value-for-money and targeting of public expenditure; and especially welcomes the measures announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Autumn Statement which—consistently with the need to maintain tight control of public spending in the interests of the economy and the taxpayer—will contribute to stabilising the housing market, will increase the supply of social housing thereby helping homeless families, and will promote investment in renovation of run-down council estates."

The Government welcome this opportunity to debate housing. As the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said, it is an important subject to millions of our citizens. The Government are happy to explain and defend their record on housing.

Last Thursday, while most of us were listening to the Chancellor's autumn statement, someone was drafting the motion before the House, a serious motion but one drafted with a strange mixture of Sun headlines and Guardian prose. As I hope to show, all the people mentioned in the motion have reason to welcome the measures in the autumn statement. Indeed, I see that, in a release last Thursday, Shelter said:

> "Shelter strongly welcomes Government initiatives to provide more homes."

That shows that, while Shelter regularly urges us to do better, it recognises progress when it sees it.

By contrast, the rather grudging recognition in the motion—

> "although Her Majesty's Government has announced a few measures which will assist some of those in need"— does less than justice to the scale of the Government's response last week to the case for housing.

Let me set out those whom the hon. Gentleman has identified in the motion. They include those sleeping rough, those in "bed and breakfast accommodation", those > "accepted as homeless by local councils",

those in difficulty with their mortgages, those in housing in need of improvement and the construction industry. Every hon. Member shares his concern for those groups and much was already being done to help, but we plan to do better.

Let me start with the most visible aspect of homelessness—rough sleeping. In a civilised society, no one should have to sleep rough. Over the past three years, under the rough sleepers initiative, we have made available £96 million to provide 900 hostel places, 2,200 places in permanent housing for those in hostels to move on to, and 700 places in flats and houses leased from private landlords.

Voluntary organisations estimated that, before the initiative began, more than 1,000 people were sleeping rough in central London. Their most recent count on 5 November showed that just over 400 people were sleeping rough, of whom fewer than 60 were under the age of 25. Many of those remaining will be helped by the initiative under way at Lincoln's Inn Fields to provide accommodation for them and, one hopes, to restore that open space to an attractive park that can be enjoyed by Londoners.

The rough sleeping initiative was to have ended on 31 March next year, but the autumn statement announced further resources to provide continuing help to rough sleepers. A further £86 million will now be made available to enable the excellent voluntary organisations, which are managing the programme, to build on their achievements and to drive the momentum forward to make it unnecessary for anyone to sleep rough. To project that funding as a cut does less than justice to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, because the hostels and permanent accommodation are, of course, still there. They will remain available in the forthcoming period. What is happening is that we are providing an extra £86 million over and above the resources originally planned. Moreover, I will shortly be announcing details of this year's cold weather shelters, which will open in a fortnight and which will provide accommodation for people who would otherwise have to sleep rough in central London this winter.

Even before the autumn statement the numbers of those in bed-and-breakfast accommodation had been falling. No one is in favour of it as a temporary form of accommodation. I see it as a measure of last resort. Many local authorities, to their credit, manage not to use it at all. In the past year the number of homeless families in such accommodation has gone down from 13,000 to 11,080. As a percentage the number is down from 24 per cent. to 18 per cent. In London the decrease has been more marked —from 8,110 to 5,870.

Those in bed-and-breakfast accommodation have more reason to welcome the autumn statement than any other group because of the way in which the 20,000 extra homes to be bought between now and the end of March compares with the figure of 11,080 who are currently in that accommodation. Those in bed and breakfast and other temporary accommodation will be rehoused more quickly as a result of the £630 million to be spent in England in the next four months. With the private finance that we plan to lever in, I expect the result to be a £1 billion package for recovery in the housing market.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich): Will the Minister confirm that, at current rates of repossession, the number of home owners who are likely to lose their homes between now and the end of March will probably be well in excess of that 20,000? Will he tell us how there is any hope of significantly reducing the numbers in temporary accommodation when there is a huge additional demand to be met from home owners facing repossession?

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman knows that the number of court actions entered for repossession has fallen sharply by about 32 per cent. in the past year. The Council of Mortgage Lenders reckons that about 55,000 repossessions have been avoided as a result of the measures it introduced in December.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister quoted Shelter's reaction to the autumn statement and gave a litany of figures. What does he say to Shelter's comments in today's press release on rough sleepers, entitled "Government cuts in help for people sleeping rough. A matter of life and death"? It stated:

> "The Government has announced a cut of £5 million in help provided for the growing number of people sleeping rough on the streets of Britain . . . The 13 per cent. reduction . . . from £38 million to £33 million was revealed by the Department of the Environment on Friday morning, less than 24 hours after the Government's Autumn Statement".

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman is aware that the rough sleeping initiative was originally devised as a three-year programme and no provision was made in the public expenditure survey for any money after 31 March. We have found fresh resources to keep that initiative going and against that background it is misleading to allege that there has been any reduction in expenditure. Planned provision of help to rough sleepers has been increased.

On the question of the extra 20,000 homes to be made available, I am concerned—other hon. Members may share my concern—at the lack of mobility within the social sector of housing. New accommodation tends to go directly to those in temporary accommodation. It would be possible for an existing council tenant to move into the new accommodation and then to move a homeless family into the accommodation thereby released. A council tenant who chose to move would lose his right to buy, but he might be prepared for that if it meant that he could live in a more attractive property than his present home. I want the new stock that is acquired to be used to promote mobility. There should be more transfers for existing tenants where the scope for mobility within a council's stock is limited.

Of course, councils and housing associations must consider the issue in the light of local circumstances and they must take account of people's preferences. They should not assume that people are not prepared to move voluntarily outside the council sector if that would get them better houses.

I have been in touch with the National Federation of Housing Associations, the Housing Corporation and the Council of Mortgage Lenders. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment met mortgage lenders and the chairman of the Housing Corporation again this morning, when they underlined the importance that we attach to taking as many properties as possible off the market through the initiative. I am pleased to say that those lenders present confirmed that they would play a full and constructive part in the initiative. They are confident of responding to the challenge that the Government have set them and of providing the target number of homes.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: My hon. Friend referred to his meeting with the Council of Mortgage Lenders. Did he also discuss our right hon. Friend the Chancellor's announcement last week of a reduction in interest rates and the apparent difficulty of some mortgage lenders in passing on that benefit to home owners, sometimes deferring it for many months?

Sir George Young: I was not at that meeting, which was attended by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. From the press statement issued after that meeting, I understand that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor reminded lenders of the importance of passing on interest rate reductions as quickly as possible. I understand that shortly after the meeting the Halifax announced a welcome reduction in its mortgage rate.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): I am anxious to pin down the Minister on one point. He is suggesting that the scheme that the Chancellor announced in the autumn statement to create an additional 20,000 properties to rent should be used in some way to facilitate mobility in housing. My understanding is that housing associations are required by statute to operate an allocation procedure and that most allocations are zoned to a particular location. Without specific Government intervention to ring-fence the properties for a national mobility scheme, I cannot envisage how the Minister's suggestion can work in practice.

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman is making rather heavy weather of this matter. The housing associations will buy 20,000 properties. In the normal course of events, they would give the nominations to local authorities, which would then nominate families currently in bed and breakfast or temporary accommodation. My suggestion is that the housing associations should continue to give the nominations to local authorities, but that instead of them nominating people in bed and breakfast and temporary accommodation, they should offer transfers to existing tenants. Those people could move into the new homes, if that is what they want, and the homeless families could move into the local authority stock thus vacated. That would improve mobility in the social housing sector. It is certainly difficult in London to get a transfer unless one has strong grounds. My suggestion would encourage transfers within local authority stock and also within housing association stock——

Ms. Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): Will the Minister give way?

Sir George Young: Yes, but for the last time as I am anxious to make progress.

Ms. Jackson: My local authority has an inadequate number of two and three-bedroom houses, so the problem of families transferring would not be alleviated by the 20,000 properties to which the Minister referred. Indeed, inadequate properties for the size of family groups are endemic.

Sir George Young: The hon. Lady is making heavy weather of this matter. The whole point about the package announced last week is that the housing associations and local authorities should consult and the stock acquired by the housing associations should be of the sort that local authorities want—the right configuration and size to meet the needs of their areas. It is important that there is close liaison between housing associations and local authorities to avoid the mishmash to which the hon. Lady refers.

Against the background of an extra £597 million for the Housing Corporation this year, I hope that the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) will have the decency —for I believe him to be a decent man—to admit that the rumour to which he referred in Committee last Tuesday, that the Conservative party might abandon its manifesto commitment to provide 153,000 homes through the Housing Corporation over the next three years, was ill founded. The figure will rise by 12,000 to 165,000.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): The Minister refers to this year's commitment, but he will recall the Conservatives' clear manifesto pledge of money over three years ago. Is the third year absolutely guaranteed?

Sir George Young: There is a lot of battle smoke around. However the hon. Gentleman looks at the figures, he will find that there is more money for the three years covered by the manifesto—an increase of £597 million this year, with a decrease in the following two years of £155 million and £191 million. That represents an increase, and extra homes are being provided in the early part of the period in question. If the hon. Gentleman wants to intervene again to admit that our manifesto is being more than honoured, I shall be happy to give way to him.

Conditions for tenants on many council estates are unacceptable. The autumn statement made it clear that our popular programme of housing action trusts can continue. Our expenditure provision for next year will allow the momentum of the HAT programme to be fully maintained. That will allow the establishment of three further housing action trusts to follow those in Hull, Waltham Forest, and the successful ballot in Liverpool. I am sure that will be warmly welcomed in areas where housing action trusts have already begun work or are under consideration. The feasibility work on Castle Vale in Birmingham and the Bow estate in Tower Hamlets is largely complete and I expect to make decisions on ballots shortly.

[Sir George Young]

There will be more resources for the estate action programme. The amount available in 1993-94 will be £356 million, which is £16 million more than this year. On current practice, that expenditure will allow us to fund 135 of the 270 schemes that authorities are anxious should go forward. However, the capital partnership approach announced last Friday will enable us to spread resources even further. The more that authorities contribute from their capital receipts, the higher the number of schemes that we will be able to include in our programme.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Will my hon. Friend the Minister favourably consider the scheme submitted by Morecambe, which has a substantial housing need?

Sir George Young: I am delighted that that popular element in the Government's housing policy has won such favour in a constituency adjoining that of my hon. Friend. I will be happy to send my hon. Friend details of the HAT programme and the procedure that must be observed if a trust is to be established in her part of the country.

Mr. Nirj Joseph Deva (Brentford and Isleworth): I welcome the prospect of greater mobility and extra funding that my hon. Friend's new scheme will introduce, but Isleworth council is encountering considerable problems because of the way that the points system is used to allocate council housing needs. The new system has disadvantaged many thousands of people. Will my hon. Friend consider re-jigging it to allow for a more equitable share of council properties?

Sir George Young: I hope that my announcement that the Government felt that there should be more mobility within the local authority stock will encourage councils —including Hounslow—to review their transfer policies, and also to review the way in which priorities are allocated among competing demands from local authority tenants. I hope that all councils will try to find ways of promoting more transfers.

The relaxation of the rules governing local authority capital receipts over the coming year will provide authorities with an extra £1 billion for housing. I expect them to devote the money mainly to renovating rundown council estates, and to implementing the housing investment programme strategy set out in their recent bids. The figure is derived from evidence on local authority returns. Tenants awaiting improvements do not mind whether the work is paid for by borrowing or by a capital receipt; they want the work done, regardless of how it is funded—and more work will now be done.

"Capital receipts" is a phrase that has been much on the lips of Opposition Members. It is worth reminding them that there would be few capital receipts for us to debate if we had taken their advice on the right to buy. We did not think it right to allow authorities simply to spend the capital receipts that they had already built up. The current need is to stimulate the construction industry, and that justifies a temporary relaxation of the requirement to set aside part of the new receipts for that purpose. The relaxation gives authorities some £1·75 billion of extra spending power. Our proposals give them an incentive to promote new asset disposals, and to get in fresh receipts rather than recycling past ones.

I expect interest in the right to buy to increase as the economy recovers; I also expect interest in the rent-to-mortgage scheme to increase when the Bill reaches the statute book. Predictably, Opposition Members have already criticised the scheme: the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), for instance, described it as facile and short term. I see nothing facile or short term in treating people as adults and giving them choice—a word used by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey. Authorities will gain a capital receipt, and they will be able to spend all of it, provided that it comes in before 31 March next year. I predict that Opposition Members will abandon their objection to the rent-to-mortgage scheme when they realise how popular it is, just as they abandoned their objection to the right to buy.

The motion makes the fair point that some local authorities have less prospect than others of generating receipts. We can handle that, up to a point, through the services of a lady called Rita—receipts taken into account. When we allocate credit approvals to local authorities— this, I think, is the process towards which the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey was cautiously nudging his way—we take into account the relative availability of receipts. That enables us to give higher basic credit approvals to the authorities with the fewest receipts —a point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin).

Authorities with limited receipts will also be able to compete for the capital partnership scheme that was launched on Friday by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. The scheme provides up to £600 million of public money for projects that will stimulate growth.

The motion also mentions owner-occupiers. The package included help for those facing difficulty with their mortgages: a further and welcome reduction of one percentage point in interest rates. Over the past two years, interest rates have fallen by eight percentage points; that translates into a saving of more than £130 a month on a typical £33,000 mortgage since the level reached its peak in October 1990. For those who are concerned about the value of their properties, we are taking some 16,000 empty homes off the market in a short space of time. That will increase the number of transactions in the property market, and will reduce the overhang that has deterred many prospective buyers. The measure can only help to return confidence to the market—although none of us wants a return to the excesses of four years ago.

Measures taken a year ago have probably reduced the number of repossessions by about 50,000, but the best mortgage rescue scheme is provided by lower interest rates and a recovering economy, which was the purpose of the measures in the autumn statement. The number of court orders for repossessions has also fallen: in the third quarter of the year, the number of actions entered was 32 per cent. lower than it had been a year earlier.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the Minister give way?

Sir George Young: No. I promised that I would not give way again; indeed, I believe that I made that promise three times. The longer my speech lasts, the less will be the hon. Gentleman's chance of making his own formidable contribution.

One consequence of the fall in house prices has been the number of people with negative equity—perhaps 1 million, according to one estimate by the Bank of England. That phenomenon does not call for the domesday scenario painted by some commentators. Most negative equity borrowers are not having trouble meeting their payments, nor do they want to move, but if they do want to move the property that they move to is likely to have fallen in value, along with their own home. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary announced on 20 October two measures, which were widely welcomed, to help to promote mobility in those circumstances.

The building and construction industry is also mentioned in the motion. It was assisted last Thursday. Builders have the opportunity to improve their cash flow by selling unsold homes. There will be opportunities for smaller builders to carry out necessary repairs to repossessed homes that need attention. These measures have been welcomed by the construction industry. Neville Sims of Tarmac, for example, praised the Chancellor's proposals as imaginative and as a good way to get money into the construction industry in the regions. The new public-private funding rules announced on Thursday will give a further boost to investment in the inner city areas covered by city challenge.

There is even something in the package for estate agents. The £50 million to enable local authority and housing association tenants to buy homes in the market will increase transactions, as well as freeing up more homes for those on the waiting list.

Because of the rough sleeping initiative, there are now fewer people sleeping on the streets. There are fewer families in unsatisfactory bed-and-breakfast accommodation. The last figures for homeless acceptances showed a reduction, not an increase. The provision of good quality accommodation by housing associations has doubled in the past three years and the ambitious target that we set ourselves in our manifesto is now to be exceeded.

The programme for modernising and improving local authority estates can proceed at a faster pace, thanks to the change in the capital receipts rule. With interest rates for some first-time buyers at 6 per cent., home ownership is more affordable than it has been for more than 15 years; 20,000 homes, instead of lying empty, are to be put to the use for which they were built and that will help to restore confidence in the housing market.

I recognise that we have much work to do. Any London Member of Parliament knows that there are still shortages of social housing and that too many council tenants live in unacceptable conditions, but we are on the right track. It would be too optimistic to expect the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey to withdraw his motion, but I ask the House to support the Government amendment with enthusiasm.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): We, too, welcome the debate. There is nothing in the motion with which we disagree. It is particularly welcome at this time, coming so soon after the autumn statement. The autumn statement day ought to be remembered as the day when unemployment passed, in real terms, the 4 million mark. According to the original calculation of the figures, before the Government's 30 changes to massage them down, on 12 November this year unemployment passed 4 million. I mention that at the beginning of my speech because rising unemployment is the primary cause of homelessness and the housing market crisis.

The scale of the housing crisis is daunting and worsens day by day. However, the Government try to put on a brave front and say that they are coping with it. Since the late 1970s, homelessness has more than doubled. In England alone, 147,000 households were accepted as homeless by local authorities in 1991. Many more were turned away as ineligible. More than 1·5 million are on local authority waiting lists. They comprise what could be described as the hidden homeless, often living in overcrowded and inappropriate circumstances. It is estimated that in 1991 an additional 80,000 single people were homeless but ineligible for help. In the past 18 months, more than 100,000 families have had their homes repossessed.

Not surprisingly perhaps, fewer than 100 families have had their homes saved by the Government's "intended" mortgage rescue scheme, which was announced this time last year. The Government promised us at the Dispatch Box that 40,000 households would be rescued. That never happened. More than 200,000 households are now more than six months in arrears with their mortgages; more than 1 million cannot afford to move because their homes are worth less than they paid for them.

Recently, the Bank of England estimated that further small falls in property values would add an additional 500,000 households to that total. In September this year, after the general election, the Department of the Environment disclosed that a record number of 62,780 homeless families were living in sometimes terrible quality temporary accommodation. As we now know, since 1979 the proportion of national expenditure, in real terms, spent on housing has more than halved. There has been a significant cut in expenditure. I say "significant" because the cut amounts to £5·3 billion—ironically, exactly the figure of accumulated capital receipts that local authorities have in the bank. To this day, the Government are preventing them from spending that money on housing.

What is the Government's response to the housing crisis? I submit that it is feeble. When we look at the small print of what we were offered in the autumn statement, we see that we have been short-changed. Barely six months ago, on 23 March, during those heady days of the electioneering period, the Secretary of State for the Environment asserted:

"House sales under the Conservatives are picking up."

All this, we were told, would change on 10 April if there were a Labour Government. We were also told that the recovery—I am tempted, Madam Deputy Speaker, to insert the word "sic"—in the housing market would be devastated, just as it was getting under way. The Secretary of State for the Environment was echoed by the Prime Minister on 31 March, when he said:

"We're going to make life easier for people buying their home. Our policies will mean a stronger housing market."

[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) may mutter, "Hear, hear", but what every other hon. Member and everybody else in the country knows is that exactly the opposite is true. People were truly conned on 9 April. Families now face the worst housing crisis in our society since the war. It is tempting to add that all the Government's special offers have been heard before and have been found to be second-hand and shoddy goods.

[Mr. John Battle]

The latest evidence from the Joseph Rowntree Foundation report, which was published last week, shows that further small falls in house prices threaten to double negative equity. It points out that four out of every 10 Londoners who bought their homes in the past five years now have properties worth less than their mortgages. Basildon now has a negative equity rate of 60 per cent.—an average shortfall of £6,500 for every household. That is where the rent-to-mortgage pilot scheme was undertaken. In those circumstances, I cannot imagine that it is going down well in Basildon.

What of the scale of the Government's response? The Government amendment is remarkable in its complacency. It says that the Government are keen to promote the growth of owner-occupation. Many commentators on housing and economic policy now submit that, at 69 per cent., owner-occupation in our society is unsustainable because there are not sufficient homes for people who need to rent. The Government do not seem yet to appreciate that fact. The amendment refers to widening choice for tenants. It does not refer to the fact that under the Housing and Urban Development Bill which is being considered in Standing Committee the Government are taking away tenants' rights in order to push through compulsory competitive tendering.

The amendment refers also to the targeting of public expenditure. It is tempting to add that that may be the only truthful statement in the amendment. It is true that resources are being targeted, because existing resources are being wrapped up and disguised as new money when in fact they prove to be old money.

The moves on interest rates are welcome. They will give hard-pressed home owners some relief, if the interest rate reduction is passed on, but that relief will apply only so long as people have a job and continue to be able to pay their mortgages. The question that many people are asking is whether this will be enough to revive the housing market. Many people think that they live simply one pay cheque away from redundancy and worry that their home may be the next to be repossessed.

The autumn statement was trumpeted in the press as offering extra money, but the Secretary of State was careful to use that weasel word and say that money had been "earmarked" rather than to suggest that new money was available. We discover from the fine print that that was a sleight of hand—a clever piece of news management to create the impression of new money. The Government are simply juggling the figures in a remarkable creative-accounting exercise.

What does the figure of £1·75 billion mean? It is tempting to ask the Minister, in the light of his statement, how firm that promise is. We are glad that the Government are at last coming around to our common-sense arguments on the need to use capital receipts, but it is not clear whether that promise of funds will be realised.

The autumn statement is based on illusion—the £1·75 billion in estimated capital receipts is not there. The Government have acknowledged that only £1·1 billion of that money will be available for housing, and only capital receipts that may be available in the next 12 months will be available as extra expenditure.

What will happen to the £5·5 billion of receipts that is sitting in local authorities' banks? Why cannot those funds be released?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): If the hon. Gentleman is to take that point, perhaps he will redefine his position. I quote from an interview with Inside Housing as recently as mid-September in which the journalist commented:

> "redefinition of the PSBR, which could theoretically release capital receipts for housing, is clearly not something Mr. Battle is prepared to argue for today."

The hon. Gentleman said:

> "Those are the arguments that the Treasury team are going to have to sort out, not me as the Housing spokesman. At the moment, redefinition is not on Labour's agenda. It is not one of my priorities."

Has the hon. Gentleman and his team managed to redefine the PSBR for the benefit of the country?

Mr. Battle: What I said still stands. We have pressed for the phased relief of capital receipts to enable them to be distributed according to need. The Government have not responded. They have simply told authorities that they may spend money which may or may not come in. Amazingly, in the face of current evidence, the Government assume that right-to-buy sales will pick up from their present low, but if they do not do so, the extra £1·75 billion will not materialise. Is not that the truth and should not Ministers be spelling that out? In practice, as the figures work through, people will find that they have been shortchanged again. The key question is whether the money will be available, and that depends on homes being sold to tenants on low incomes, under the right to buy, during a housing market slump and at a time of record repossessions. Most people in work feel that they cannot afford to take the chance of moving to purchase in case they lose their jobs.

A London Weekend Television programme on Friday night revealed that 70,000 people who bought their council flats cannot sell them because mortgage lenders are again doing what used to be described as red-lining. In his conversations with mortgage lenders this morning, what did the Minister say about that and what do the Government propose to do to unlock that situation? In turn, that will be a check on further house sales.

The small print of the autumn statement shows that Government capital allocations for local authority housing will be cut and that credit approvals will be substantially lower. We cannot now say what the figures are, because they will be revealed only in the forthcoming months, but that is the logic of the arithmetic in the autumn statement.

I suspect that the capital partnership is another example of iniative dazzle—an initiative for the media that lasts 24 hours, but in the afterglow realises little. In practice, it is top-slicing—taking money out of budgets and organising them from the centre again. It is a form of revamping of the estate action scheme. It is also clear that it will depend on bids and competition, with local authorities competing against each other according to how they use capital receipts in forthcoming years.

Sir George Young: Hear, hear.

Mr. Battle: The Minister says "Hear, hear", but that action reduces local authorities' ability to respond to local need and the total amount that is available for them.

Sir George Young: When I dealt with the capital partnership, I specifically explained that if, for good reason, a local authority has no access to capital receipts, it will not be penalised in its bid for estate action.

Mr. Battle: It is encouraging to receive that reassurance, but we shall watch to see how it works in practice because we were told the same about the city challenge, and we saw how that worked in practice. Many authorities have been disappointed.

The promised new £600 million depends on sales that may never materialise. The whole project will buy only 16,000 homes, whereas more than 200,000 are empty, and that overhang is dominating the housing market. There is no new money, because £400 million will come from the Housing Corporation's allocation and £200 million from local authority credit approvals.

In practice, it could be argued that housing associations were worst hit in the autumn statement. Housing association grant rates are being cut from an average of 72 per cent. to 67 per cent. In an article in The Roof, Mr. David Edmonds, the former Housing Corporation's chief executive, pointedly showed how private finance would be more difficult to obtain because investors would be worried about whether housing benefit would continue to meet the tab for higher rents. The corporation's 150,000 homes promised over the next three years could be jeopardised because the Government have not got their act together and are forcing up rents. David Edmonds said:

> "There is very solid reason to argue that the point has been reached beyond which grant rates should not be diminished. How does an association explain to a banking credit appraisal expert that higher amounts of loan are needed, payments on which are serviced primarily by people on HB who pay rents which are increasingly viewed as unaffordable?"

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there must always be a correlation between private finance and the grant rate made available by the Housing Corporation to take account of reductions in interest rates? There has been a substantial reduction in interest rates. Whenever an interest rate reduction is made—at least this is what happened when I was deputy chairman of Housing for Wales—an alteration is made to the grant rate.

Mr. Battle: The hon. Gentleman is missing the point that the critical figure of 67 per cent. for attracting private finance is on the margin below which the private sector will not lend money to construct houses in the first place. The promised partnership between public and private money will collapse because the Government are reducing their contribution to housing associations.

Mr. Jenkin: I suggest that the matter is in the nature of public-private negotiations. The private sector will negotiate, of course, for the best terms that it can get and it is right that the Government should play their part and negotiate the best terms for the public sector to get better value for money. Those matters are resolved in the fullness of time. If one goes into negotiation on the basis that one will lose that negotiation, all I can say, on behalf of the homeless, is thank goodness the hon. Gentleman is not in charge.

Mr. Battle: The hon. Gentleman is missing the point that, for months, all the housing associations and the private housing finance world have spelt out to the Government that 67 per cent. is the bottom line. Below that point, schemes will not go ahead.

I hope that the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) will join me in pressing the Minister to make available the report on affordability which was prepared by the Housing Corporation and which now rests in his Department. I am pretty sure that it reveals that housing associations are being forced to push up rents, which makes schemes unsustainable. The net result is that housing associations can only take tenants who can guarantee that they are on full housing benefit. If they cannot, they will not get a place.

I urge the Minister to make the report available so that it can be discussed and the figures can be worked through in those terms. By changing grant relationships and by not taking account of housing benefit changes, the Government are pricing people out of even housing association housing, yet the Government insist that housing associations—and only housing associations—should provide affordable housing.

Special capital grant approvals are to be cut from 75 per cent. to 60 per cent. That means that for improvement grants to be paid at all to hard-up owner-occupiers, local authorities will have to meet 40 per cent. instead of 25 per cent. of the cost. We had hoped that there would be some reference in the autumn statement to the problems that local authorities face in terms of mandatory grants. The whole of their housing investment programmes could be consumed by the demand for improvement grants, yet the Government seem simply to be turning a blind eye. I urge the Minister to look again at mandatory grants and at their impact on local authorities' ability to serve housing needs in the round.

Let us look in slightly closer detail at the £750 million package to take 20,000 properties off the market through acquisitions by housing associations. We believe that that is inadequate when almost 250,000 properties either have been repossessed or were unsold in the first place. On BBC News on 12 November, John Wrigglesworth of UBS Phillips and Drew referred to the sum as "a snowflake on an iceberg".

Although the scheme is limited, the Government could sharpen it and substantially improve it.

Can the Minister assure us that the available money will go only to mortgage lenders who are running or who are about to set up mortgage rescue schemes? Why is the money not tied in so that there can be real and workable mortgage rescue schemes? That would make the money go further, as properties would not just be taken off the market. We would be reassured that repossessions would slow down, which would in turn prevent more repossessed houses coming on to the market. Why not link the scheme so that it does not simply reward lenders who repossess but goes some way towards keeping people in their own home?

Surely the same grant rates should apply to those schemes as they do to any other schemes funded by the Housing Corporation. Lower grant rates will simply lead to unaffordable rents and to dwindling housing association involvement in the scheme. In practice, the scheme is too inflexible. Some lenders may want to lease properties rather than to sell them outright. Why cannot the Government relax leasing restrictions on local authorities and on housing associations, and allow 20-year leases? There should be a combination of buy-back and leasing.

[Mr. Battle]

It is not clear whether the properties that are in disrepair or have been vandalised are to be included in the scheme. It is now evident that many properties that have been repossessed are in a terrible state. It is estimated that 100,000 repossessed properties standing for sale are in a poor condition and increasingly are being vandalised. Although lenders should bring properties up to standard, why do the Government not allow previously rundown properties to be included in the scheme as long as the lender agrees to do the necessary improvement work to bring them up to scratch, so that people can move into them?

Why cannot local authorities be given a guarantee of first refusal so that they can use the properties for homeless families? There would then be a direct link between cutting temporary accommodation bills and bringing the properties back into use.

What do we find for local authority tenants in the small print of the autumn statement? We find that council rents are to be forced up by 9 per cent. in the coming year—more than twice the rate of inflation. It will mean an average of £2·50 on everyone's rent. The Government then tell us that there is no problem of people being priced out of their homes. The measures in the autumn statement will have that effect and will force people into debt and insecurity. How can people exercise their rights if they find that they are increasingly in debt and unable to meet the primary demand to pay the rent? The Government fail to help not only those with mortgages, but those with rents.

There was no housing windfall in the autumn statement. Many homeless families, tragically, will still face a cold and bitter winter. There is no real evidence that the Government take the housing crisis seriously. Perhaps in the coming months they will listen to the lobby of the tenants and of the churches which is coming to the House. In the meantime, the autumn statement is part of the Government's clear strategy of simply putting off what they cannot bear to face today because it is politically embarrassing. We are not being presented with a new policy. It is simply a time-buying exercise to get the Government into the calmer waters of less hostile headlines.

As homelessness and unemployment inexorably rise, the Government's pitiful failure to recognise and to take seriously the scale of the housing crisis will become plainer for all to see. We intend to keep the spotlight on the Government's lack of housing policy. We continue to monitor initiatives that constantly prove ineffectual. We shall continue to press for emergency measures to tackle street homelessness not only in London but elsewhere. I remind the Minister that rough sleeping is no longer confined to London.

We shall press for real measures to revive the housing market and we shall continue to demand that people have the right to rent. We shall harass the Government in detail until our society is a lot closer to ensuring that everyone's right to a decent, appropriate and affordable home is realised. The Minister's great claims today for his Government's minuscule measures will not even stand the test of this Parliament.

Mr. Jonathan Evans (Brecon and Radnor): I am pleased to have the opportunity to follow the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle). I noticed that the words "welcome" and "glad" passed his lips. However, the tone was rather different. It was a speech by a rather lugubrious hon. Member. In terms of visual aspect, he was the nearest thing to Clement Freud.

I can understand why the hon. Gentleman was so gloomy. He appears to be an aficionado of "Black Dog" in the Mail on Sunday—his required Sunday reading, at least according to his speech in the Committee considering the Housing and Urban Development Bill. Last Tuesday, he gave us a warning about what was likely to happen the following Thursday when the Chancellor made his autumn statement. He quoted "Black Dog", saying:

> "'There is worrying news about Sir George Young the affable Housing Minister, whose budget has reportedly vanished in this autumn's draconian spending round.'" [Official Report, Standing Committee B; 10 November [illegible]92; c. 3.]

The hon. Gentleman then quoted more from that article. I can understand why the hon. Gentleman was so gloomy. He has found that the budget of my hon. Friend the Minister has not evaporated. Instead, it has been considerably expanded and I welcome that. I particularly welcome the extra funding that has been made available in Wales. Some £38 million of extra funding will be used by local authorities and Housing for Wales and to assist the work of housing associations.

I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has already said that he will discuss that allocation with the chairman of Housing for Wales and that wide-ranging discussions will take place about how that money can be spent because we must ensure that the money is spent wisely. In that regard, I want to raise some concerns with my hon. Friend the Minister.

It is important that the money should not be used as a catalyst for mortgage lenders to take further action in cases where they are staying their hands in respect of repossessions. The hon. Member for Leeds, West referred to the deterioration of properties which have come on to the market. If the money was to be spent solely on purchase and rehabilitation of those properties, it is important that we consider the taxation rules.

When I was involved with Housing for Wales, I was concerned about the fact that there was a shift towards new build away from the rehabilitation of property. That shift occurred because 17·5 per cent. VAT is added to the cost of the rehabilitation of property. It would be deeply damaging if much of the new funding was leaked away in that fashion. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider that point in the discussions with the Housing Corporation and the local authorities when they assess how the funding can be used.

I am also anxious that the rural housing problem should be recognised in Wales and elsewhere. So often when we discuss homelessness the problem is referred to in the context of cardboard city and images of people in desperate circumstances sleeping in the shop doorways of many of our major cities. Many of the problems are being addressed by initiatives referred to by my hon. Friend the Minister. However, as a result of those stark images, we sometimes lose contact with the fact that there is also a rural housing crisis. The problem of people who earn the lowest wages and live in rural areas is pushed into the background.

I am pleased to say that in Wales at least that problem has been recognised. Twenty-eight per cent. of the funding to housing associations in Wales is given to associations that work in rural areas and perhaps that lesson could be followed in England. Some of the Welsh initiatives will avoid situations that have occurred in towns because it has been recognised that the funding should be invested on the basis of local needs.

Although councils may have ideas about local housing needs, sometimes the people who live in the villages have the best means of identifying the local housing needs. That is why several initiatives have been started in Wales which draw together local needs surveys. They have identified problems in relation to housing which the local housing authorities may not have recognised in some parts of the Principality.

Once the problems have been identified, there is investment, but not in those vast council estates—the monoliths of municipal socialism of the past as I like to describe them. Instead, perhaps between two and eight houses are built in a village and they become part of the village. They do not become ghettoes. Those houses are not just part of the community; they are attractive to local people and young people can stay, live and work in the communities in which they have been raised.

Initiatives have also been taken on a national level, and also in Wales, to bring into use the empty accommodation above shops. That is a worthwhile initiative for which funding has been made available and it is quite apart from general support made available for the vital renting and shared ownership programme.

My hon. Friend the Minister outlined the steps being taken to attempt to deal with rough sleeping in our cities. I particularly welcome my hon. Friend's attempt to reduce the figures in terms of the use of bed-and-breakfast accommodation for so many families. Before I came to the House, and subsequently in articles that I have written on the issue, I have stated that it is unacceptable for a Government who have been in office for 13 years still to have so many people, even on today's figures, living in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. That is not something with which I want to be associated and I know that my hon. Friend the Minister does not wish to be associated with it either.

More than that, the provision of bed-and-breakfast accommodation does not make economic sense. All the surveys show that it can cost between twice and three times as much to accommodate people in those absolutely unacceptable conditions than if we were to house them properly in the first place. I welcome the steps that have been taken to reduce the proportion, as my hon. Friend the Minister said, from 24 per cent. to 18 per cent. During the many years that I will be a Member of this place, I hope that we will ensure that the figure is reduced substantially —and the earlier the better.

I hope that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) will not take offence when I say that he adopted a sanctimonious approach. At one point, he seemed to say that the Government should simply be building more houses. That may be a disservice to him, but I do not believe that simply more housebuilding is what is needed. On the contrary, it seems that we have sufficient properties.

It is well known that there are about 750,000 empty properties in private and public hands. We can all argue about the accuracy of the figures and we often hear all sorts of figures bandied around the House. However, we might agree that about 150,000 families are currently accepted as being homeless by local authorities. In such circumstances, we should urgently seek a marriage between the two sets of figures.

According to the figures that I have seen, 9·7 per cent. of public housing in Liverpool appears to be empty. It is unacceptable that there are local authorities—including authorities which at least two hon. Members in the Chamber now represent—in which the amount of council house rents outstanding is colossal. The highest amount outstanding is in the constituency of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey. According to my figures, there are some £35 million of uncollected council house rents in the hon. Gentleman's authority.

I know that it is said that the cause of such outstanding rents is that people are in desperate financial circumstances and they cannot afford to pay the rents. I notice that the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) is in the Chamber. He will be aware that his local authority, within which many people face strained financial circumstances, has performed much better in terms of collecting council house rents than Southwark and Bermondsey or Greenwich.

Mr. Raynsford: Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that there is a serious problem in respect of people being able to afford rent or mortgages in the rented and privately-owned sectors? Does he accept that mortgage arrears have increased dramatically, as have rent arrears? When the Government propose to increase rents in council properties by on average 9 per cent., when they expect public sector workers to accept a maximum 1·5 per cent. pay increase, does the hon. Gentleman accept that that is a recipe for further increases in arrears?

Mr. Evans: I made a misjudgment. I thought that the hon. Gentleman was about to explain why Greenwich had an outstanding figure of 25 per cent. in council house rents —about £13 million. I was hoping that the hon. Gentleman would be able to tell us how many houses in his constituency might be built for that sum.

Mr. Charles Hendry (High Peak): Has my hon. Friend noted the correlation between councils that are dilatory at collecting rents and those that have bad records in respect of occupied housing and the number of vacancies in boroughs such as Southwark? Southwark is the fourth worst borough in London in terms of vacancies. One of the few councils with a worse record for vacancies is the Liberal Democrat-controlled borough of Tower Hamlets.

Mr. Evans: I also have made that correlation. I represent the largest constituency in Wales—I think that it is also the largest constituency in England and Wales—and we have managed, through all local authorities in Wales, many of which are controlled by friends of the Labour party, to keep down the number of public housing voids. The figures that I was able to gain from the Welsh Office in a parliamentary answer only last week show that there is a direct balance between housing association voids and council house voids of 1·2 per cent. in Wales. When we compare that with the situation in which there have been up to 10 per cent. voids in some local authority areas in England, we see that far more needs to be done than just throwing money at the problem.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I agree. The hon. Gentleman will imagine that, for obvious reasons, I am critical of my local authority, but one thing that he may not know, which is relevant and has been raised with Ministers, is that there is an unfair method of calculating the amount needed per unit of property, which is called the management and maintenance allowance, across different authorities. For no current, valid reason there is a differential allowance—government to local authority money—which means that boroughs such as Southwark get far less than otherwise identical boroughs with the same housing needs.

Mr. Evans: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. I am sure that he would not wish to excuse his local authority's performance in terms of that staggering figure of outstanding council house rents, particularly when he so graphically illustrates the housing problem in London.

Ms. Glenda Jackson: The hon. Gentleman has spent some time being highly critical of local authorities. I should like to give him an example of what is happening in the private rented sector in London. In one case, a young woman found a room for herself in a house where the rent was £45 a week. She would have had to claim housing benefit to pay it. Her landlord suggested that, as she was claiming housing benefit, they should bump up the rent to £60 and split the difference. She refused to do that and is therefore homeless.

Another case involves a young couple, one of whom was a student. Her boyfriend became ill. When their landlord discovered that they would be reliant on housing benefit, they were asked to leave. That is yet another example within the private sector. Local authorities are saints in comparison.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Before the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) continues, let me say that interventions are becoming progressively longer. That is not confined to one side; I make the observation to all.

Mr. Evans: I am obliged for your guidance, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am trying to be as generous as possible to Opposition Members.

I certainly do not defend the activities of landlords who behave in the way that the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms. Jackson) has outlined. She appears to have in her hand a document which presents some detail of that case, but it seems to me as a lawyer that the first case that she outlined is one in which the involvement of the police should be considered at an early point. It clearly was an invitation to participate in a criminal offence.

Ms. Jackson rose——

Mr. Evans: I shall give way just for clarification and then I shall make progress.

Ms. Jackson: A lawyer would realise that any case requires evidence.

Mr. Evans: I am sure that the hon. Lady has not been putting points to me without evidence. I rather hoped that she put her case with evidence to support her assertion. I shall now make progress.

It has become clear that it is the Government's responsibility to ensure that we improve the supply and condition of our rented housing stock. Quite apart from the other choices and availability that there may be of different tenures, that has to be a cardinal point. The Government, sometimes in the face of substantial opposition, have given positive support to housing associations, and they deserve congratulations for that. In the course of that work they have had to attempt to deal with a manifest distortion in the rented housing sector. I refer in particular to the way in which the private rented sector, sometimes because of the abuse that is piled on many landlords who have attempted to operate within the private sector, has declined substantially. That has been regarded with some sadness by hon. Members.

It must be recognised that if there are three quarters of a million empty properties, although many are in the public sector, a large proportion of them are in the private sector. One would wish those properties to be brought into better use. One factor that must be borne in mind when we consider the Opposition's figures is that the Government have given substantial support through the housing benefits system.

I note the point that was made by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, but, according to figures that I obtained from the Library this morning, in the past year £5·9 billion in support was given. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) is not terribly happy about that because, in seminars and conferences around the country, he has been saying that that is manifestly dreadful and stupid. Taken together with the other amounts of support in terms of the Government's house building programme, there is substantial assistance—up to 18 per cent. of the public sector borrowing requirement, according to the figures that I saw today.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey referred to such evidence and said that mortgage tax relief is a bad thing. The hon. Member for Greenwich shares that view. The proportion of support available under mortgage tax relief has substantially eroded over the years, and that must be recognised. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey is shaking his head, but that is absolutely true. Inflation and tax decreases have substantially eroded that benefit, as a result of which it is fairly likely in the current year that the amount of support available through housing benefit will overtake the support that is given under mortgage tax relief. At the moment, 69 per cent. of households in Wales are receiving support through the housing benefit structure initially directly from the Government and then from local authorities.

Hon. Members recognise that there is a housing crisis in this country—I hope that I made that clear at the beginning of my speech. If there were no crisis there would not be a need for all the steps that the Government have taken to address the problem. My hon. Friend the Minister is regarded throughout the country as a person who genuinely recognises the scale of the problem. Many of the initiatives over the past few years are directly as a result of the pressure and influence that he has been able to bring to bear. I am absolutely sure that, with my hon. Friend in charge of our housing programme, we have a policy that all our colleagues can support.

Ms. Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): Although I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate, I do not welcome the fact that for the fourth time in this Parliament we are debating the issue of homelessness. I look forward to the day when homelessness will have no place in this Chamber or in the cities and towns of this country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) has referred to homelessness as a scar on the face of society. While agreeing wholeheartedly with his sentiment, I disagree with his analogy, because over time scars heal, but during this Government's tenure of office the number of households accepted as homeless has tripled, to stand at 150,000. That represents 400,000 adults and children. According to the Shelter briefing, which I am sure all hon. Members received in time for the autumn statement, almost 63,000 of those families will spend this Christmas in unsuitable temporary housing, such as bed and breakfast hotels and local authority hostels.

There are enough learned documents around to prove the dangers for children in bed and breakfasts—quite apart from the economic costs. In London, the cost of keeping a family in bed and breakfasts is estimated at £14,500 a year. The damage done to children is almost inestimable. Children in bed and breakfasts tend to catch illnesses far more easily and to have greater difficulty in learning and in creating real social relationships. The borough in which my constituency lies has 1,900 families with no homes of their own; that figure does not include the number forced to use voluntary hostels or squats or cardboard boxes for shelter.

There is no doubt that the plight of the homeless is a matter of concern to hon. Members on both sides of the House, but a former leader of the Conservative party once said that it is not enough for people merely to say that they care; their actions must support their words. The Government's actions so far have failed to alleviate, let alone eradicate, the evil of homelessness.

Last week, the Chancellor of the Exchequer unveiled a number of proposals in his autumn statement designed to boost the housing sector—proposals to which the Minister referred today. One proposal was to purchase 20,000 empty homes. Another was that councils would be allowed to spend the capital receipts that they earn between now and December 1993. That was done, the Chancellor said, to make a real contribution to housing families in need.

What was the background against which the announcement was made? Twenty thousand homes are to be purchased, but last year 75,000 homes were repossessed. Capital receipts will be released from now until December 1993, but more than £8 billion in capital receipts have already been accumulated. So the Government can buy 20,000 homes, yet they allow the seizure of 75,000.

This is a time of deep recession, when people are much concerned that they may have no jobs, when—to quote Shelter—the rate of mortgage repossessions in England alone is running at 200 a day and when loans more than 12 months in arrears had risen by June 1992 by almost 25 per cent. to more than 110,000. So the Government, on the most optimistic estimate, are giving £1·75 billion in capital receipts but are blocking the £8 billion that councils have already raised from the right to buy.

On top of all this, the Government tell councils, which have the prime responsibility for housing those in need, that they will give them less money next year to discharge their duties than they did this year—that has always been the trend while the Conservative party has been in power. Spending on housing in real terms fell from £11·6 billion in 1978-79 to £5·5 billion in 1991-92—a reduction of £6·1 billion.

The Government claim that they care about the homeless, but in the next breath they say that it is not for central Government to generate the growth in the housing sector which the homeless so desperately need and in their third breath they announce that they will bring in spending measures that will prevent local government from generating growth.

Homelessness under this Government has become an epidemic, and it is eating away at the fabric of society. How much potential is wasted in the doorways of the shops lining the Strand? How many doctors, teachers and business men could have grown—could still grow—out of the people who have no home of their own and hence no opportunity? What can be said of a Government who deny them that opportunity?

The Conservative manifesto states:

> "The opportunity to own a home and pass it on is one of the most important rights an individual has in a free society."

But what of those denied the right to live in a home, never mind own one? A right to clean, decent, affordable housing should be guaranteed, and if all else fails it is incumbent on the Government to safeguard that right. If solving the problem of homelessness means Government intervention before lunch, breakfast and dinner, so be it. Homelessness will not be solved by the reintroduction of restrictions on capital receipts, due to come into effect in December 1993. Nor will it be solved by the restrictions on council spending due to come into effect in April 1993. Nor will it be solved by unemployment, by recession or by the slump to which no end is in sight——

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Jackson: I shall shortly have finished my speech.

The glossy brochure in my hand is not, it may surprise my hon. Friends to hear, a charter produced by the Government. It is called, "The London Day Centres Directory: Services for Homeless People". As Conservative Members can see, it has many pages and many more sub-divisions. Instead of tackling the basic problem of homelessness and our inadequate housing stock, we are being directed to manage homelessness—to find it acceptable and to tolerate it. Many people have asked me why homelessness and the problem of housing are not higher up the political agenda——

Mr. Evans: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Jackson: I say that these issues are high up the political agenda—we will all see how high as Christmas approaches. For a few weeks before Christmas, local and national newspapers will publish schemes under which the homeless will be taken off the streets and put in damp, drafty vaults under bridges. There they will be fed turkey dinners on paper plates and there they will toast each other in champagne from polystyrene cups. Come Boxing day they will become invisible again.

I urge the Government to set in train before Christmas real measures that will make this glossy brochure utterly irrelevant by this time next year.

Mr. Evans: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not clear whether the hon. Lady is giving way.

Ms. Jackson: I have concluded my speech.

5.37 pm

Mr. Gary Streeter (Plymouth, Sutton): This will be the fifth time I have spoken since becoming a Member inApril. By some strange coincidence, you, Madam Deputy Speaker, have been in the Chair on each occasion. I do not presume to detect any connection beyond the fact that we represent neighbouring seats.

I was interested to hear the excellent remarks by my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans), who said that he foresaw many happy years in the House for himself. Given that he has a majority of 130, one can only conclude that that was an example of great confidence—admirable confidence.

I congratulate the Government on the excellent measures in the autumn statement to help boost the housing market and meet housing need. We all want everyone to have a decent home at an affordable price, and it is encouraging that the Government have introduced more measures to meet that end.

I refer first to the £750 million to be provided for housing associations to buy up an estimated 20,000 repossessed properties in the next 12 months, to convert them to homes for rent. That will be an important measure to free the housing market, which has been bogged down during the past two years. The Government have taken an incisive and imaginative measure to get the market moving again at the lower end, by removing 20,000 empty and repossessed properties from the market. I support that excellent measure, as it will help to stimulate the housing market.

I welcome the reduction of the interest rate to 7 per cent.—as low as I can remember during my working life—which is an excellent boost for the property market. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister is listening——

Mr. Baldry: Yes, I am.

Mr. Streeter: I am sure that my hon. Friend is—I did not wish to infer otherwise. I thought that he might have nodded off and that perhaps the headphones were his personal stereo. I hope that he will speak severely to building societies that fail to pass on the benefits of lower interest rates for several months. Recently, the Halifax announced that it would pass on the benefit in January. I must declare an interest, as it is lending me a small amount of money. Why cannot the Halifax pass on the benefit of that rate reduction in December?

Building societies and banks have a lot to answer for in failing to pass on interest rate reductions early enough, and we shall hear more about banks in the Adjournment debate tonight. I hope that the Government will get tough with those building societies and banks that fail quickly to pass on the reductions.

Excellent deals are available in the market place for first-time buyers and people who want to move house, who will be able to borrow money at advantageous rates. I scanned the Sunday newspapers and found that one could get a loan on a fixed rate of interest for seven years—long enough to tide us over the next upturn in the property cycle which is bound to come—at 8·25 per cent. Anyone who wants to plan ahead with certainty can take the sort of packages on offer at 8·25 per cent. There has never been a better time to buy a property, and I hope that that message is getting across to home owners and first-time buyers.

Even estate agents have begun to report an upturn in activity during the past few days, which is greatly to be welcomed. We hear much about the difficulties that home owners have suffered during the past two years—about negative equity and repossessions. Those are real problems, but it is not right for us to concentrate on a short-term problem and to allow it to negate a long-term benefit.

There is no doubt that home ownership remains the aspiration of the vast majority of families, and so it should be. In the long term, home ownership is a great asset to any person or family. It is undoubtedly the single biggest asset that most people have, and is to be encouraged. I welcome Government measures to encourage it and the forthcoming rent-into-mortgage scheme which will extend the choice of home ownership to another layer of the population.

I also welcome the capital receipts initiative, announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his excellent statement on Thursday. I am not the only one to welcome it. On Friday 13 November, a report was published in the Plymouth Western Evening Herald—an excellent local newspaper—which stated:

> "Plymouth could be in for a £2 million windfall from council house sales, courtesy of Chancellor Norman Lamont it emerged today. City Housing Chairman Pat Kelly gave a cautious welcome to Mr. Lamont's announcement yesterday that councils can now spend all the money they make from selling land and houses. Mr. Kelly said, 'I have done some sums which indicate we could generate between £1·5 million and £2 million from the sale of about 100 council houses that we have in the pipeline'."

That is a cautious welcome from a left-wing Labour-controlled authority, which is no friend of our party or of the homeless. By May 1991, when I ceased—by the will of the people—to be the housing chairman in Plymouth, I had already set up many deals between the council and housing associations, which the local authority instantly froze for ideological reasons. It preferred to keep people waiting on the streets and in bed-and-breakfast accommodation, rather than to deal with evil housing associations, which it saw as the wicked private sector. That was an absolute disgrace. That same council has welcomed the statement by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on capital receipts, estimating that it will release up to £2 million during the next 14 months, which will enable the council to build up to 100 council houses. That is a measure of the support that my right hon. Friend's excellent initiative has in this country. A cautious welcome from the left-wing Plymouth city council is the highest accolade.

I welcome the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) to the Opposition Front Bench, although he is no longer in the Chamber, and I listened to his speech with interest. I am pleased that he intends to press for measures to improve housing, and I offer to accompany him on his trips around Labour-controlled local authorities—I am sure that that was what he had in mind—to urge them to get their act together, to collect rents, carry out repairs, utilise voids and deal with housing associations rather than turning their backs on them.

Mr. George Howarth: Does the hon. Gentleman care to name one Labour authority that turns its back on housing associations?

Mr. Streeter: I have already named Plymouth city council, which turned its back on housing associations for 18 months, hoping to keep all the land in its ownership so that it could build council houses, knowing that it would never have the money to do so.

Mr. Howarth rose——

Mr. Streeter: No, I must move on. I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman.

I welcome the fact that the hon. Member for Leeds, West at long last understands the need to press for measures to improve the housing stock—doubtless by putting pressure on Labour-controlled authorities.

In addition to the Chancellor's excellent statement about capital receipts on Thursday, I welcome the fact that he has been able to maintain the Housing Corporation's budget for the next three years and even to add to it. That is greatly to be welcomed. Housing associations in Plymouth are planning to build more than 250 houses in the next 12 months and the 100 houses that the city council may be able to add to that will be an excellent step towards meeting the needs of the homeless. I welcome the fact that the budget has been not cut but augmented. No doubt that owes much to the Government's commitment to the homeless.

The Government should encourage councils to consider not merely selling houses or land to release capital receipts to spend on housing. Plymouth Pavilions is a leisure and conference complex, which was built by the local authority at a cost of £25 million and which is running at a loss of £1·5 million per annum. Local authorities should not run such centres. If that complex were sold to the private sector, it would make a profit, and release money which could be spent on noteworthy assets and meritworthy schemes in Plymouth. I suggest that local authorities should consider such sales. The Government can only create a framework and it is for local authorities to deal with their housing stock, and to suggest initiatives to take full advantage of the excellent leadership given by the Government.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) spoke about releasing the £5·5 billion currently held by local authorities; he referred to those funds as "historic capital receipts". But the motion does not say how local authorities would deal with the shortfall in their general funds which spending that money would create. The interest currently accruing on those capital receipts comes from the general fund of local authorities throughout the country. If that money were spent, the interest would not enter the general fund and the shortfall would have to be covered by community charge payers. The hon. Gentleman did not mention that. If he is committed to that course of action, I invite him to make it perfectly clear in the leaflets that will no doubt flood the land in the run-up to the county council elections next May that it is Liberal Democrat policy to spend those capital receipts and to double community charges throughout the country, massively increasing the council tax. That will allow voters at the county council elections to decide whether they wish to follow such a policy.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's accusation is that we have a simple view, which I hope that he, as a former local government councillor, supports. Each local council should have the freedom to spend all its capital receipts or not. That decision should not be imposed by central Government.

Mr. Streeter: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention. I take it as a confirmation that the Liberal Democrats will be courageous enough to spell out in its election material the implications not only of 1p in the pound for education but of doubling the community charge to pay for capital receipts.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Liberal Democrats also want to abolish capping, which would increase last year's community charge or next year's council tax, placing a further burden on home owners?

Mr. Streeter: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is of great concern that those Liberal Democrat policies slip through the net because no one takes the party seriously enough to read its manifestos and see what its policies are. Most people would be alarmed at the prospect of those dreadful policies.

The Government are committed to ensuring that local authorities give value for money in their management of public sector housing. That is vital if we are to resolve housing issues. We should remember that 4·2 million household units owned by local authorities are still let in the public sector. The best way to improve the condition of housing stock and the plight of the homeless is to persuade local authorities to become increasingly efficient. I welcome the measures which the Government have pursued for many years to drive local authority housing departments towards greater efficiency.

The compulsory competitive tendering measures shortly to be introduced are welcome, but they do not go far enough. One of the biggest problems of housing departments in managing housing stock is the fact that they are bogged down by local authority culture. Legal, treasury and general administrative services supplied to housing departments throughout the country are a major impediment to efficiency.

Will my hon. Friend the Minister consider the point that I made in my maiden speech—it now seems a long time ago—about independently managed local authority companies buying in services from wherever they wish, at the best price that they can find, whenever they want them? They would buy in repair, legal, financial and every other service, rather than being suffocated as they are now by local authority culture, which most housing departments must suffer. CCT is an excellent measure that will introduce efficiency into housing departments. But it will not help housing management to escape the icy grip of local authority culture, and I hope that the Government will look again at that point.

[Mr. Streeter]

It has been said that the Government's proposals will result in a 9 per cent. increase in council rents. The average council rent in Plymouth is just less than £25 a week. From the way in which Opposition Members react when the matter is discussed in the House, one would think that we were talking about £125 a week. I believe that £25 still provides excellent value for money and that 9 per cent. on £25 is not a draconian increase. Moreover, housing benefit exists to support those who cannot afford to pay it.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Streeter: I am just winding down, so I shall not give way.

It is wrong to suggest that the Government are introducing measures that will penalise council tenants. However, I urge them to look again at the most effective way of encouraging local authorities to run housing associations.

I reject the motion put forward by the Liberal Democrats and support the Government's valiant attempts to make affordable housing appropriate and within the reach of everyone in the nation.

5.55 pm

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): I wish to take up a point made by the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter). He should not try—in the House or elsewhere—to characterise Labour-controlled local authorities or any other local authorities as being generally obstructive towards housing associations. I am familiar with how Labour-controlled local authorities and housing associations operate, and it simply is not true to say that Labour-controlled authorities have a general policy of obstructing housing associations. I am not familiar with his example of Plymouth council, but as a general principle it is not the case. I expect that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans), who has some experience in these matters, will confirm that that is the case in Wales.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The hon. Gentleman will concede, however, that even I know of instances where some authorities take such a hostile line.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton was trying to establish the fact that Labour-controlled authorities have such a general policy, and that simply is not true. That is the only rebuttal that I care to make of his speech.

May I say a few words about the consequences of the autumn statement for housing policy? We need, first, to consider the Government's diagnosis of the problems in the housing market and, secondly, to look specifically at how their proposed remedies follow the diagnosis. The generally accepted diagnosis, which even Ministers may accept, is that there is a double problem of overhang in the housing market. On the one hand, a debt overhang is causing considerable hardship to families but is also acting as a brake on the housing market. On the other hand, there is an overhang caused by the number of properties on the market that cannot be sold because of general market conditions. Those two problems feed off each other: the glut of properties on the market causes problems for people who wish to sell and their debt therefore mounts up. Part of that equation is the effect of falling prices—the negative equity that has already been mentioned. That is the broad diagnosis of the problem.

I shall not go into the problems of homelessness, which have been more than adequately dealt with by my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms. Jackson) and others. I wish to concentrate on the narrow area that is of immense importance to the development and execution of housing policy in the next year or so.

Two remedies are proposed. First, £750 million is allegedly being made available to the Housing Corporation to enable housing associations to acquire, it is said, 20,000 additional properties. Secondly, the Government will grant permission to use capital receipts between now and the end of next year. According to the Housing Corporation press release issued on Thursday, £600 million is being made directly available to that programme and another £150 million will be directed from capital receipts.

In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) and to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), the Minister said that additional money would be available over the period covered by the press release. I have not had the opportunity to make a precise calculation, but the amount available during the 12 months of the scheme will be more than £200 million. However, it will be available in principle only.

On Friday, I spent a good deal of time telephoning a wide range of contacts in the housing association movement. Some of them are directly employed by associations, some are consultants, and some have general expertise in housing finance. I do not claim that it was a scientific survey, but it led me to the view that for two reasons the scheme will not work. First, considerable delays will necessarily be imposed on housing associations because of the negotiations and surveys that must take place before any property is acquired. Unless the associations can buy huge portfolios of properties by way of auction or some such scheme, much time and resources will need to be spent carrying out the necessary searches and surveys and in conducting negotiations. I spoke to a surveyor who carried out some preliminary work of that nature. He told me that the repair bill to make a property fit for habitation and available for rent is likely to be between £5,000 and £10,000.

A substantial amount of public money is used to fund the housing association grants system and those associations have to go through all the proper procedures to acquire property. That will take time. Secondly, they have to identify the extent of the necessary repairs, and if they are very expensive the transaction may have to be abandoned. Given a tolerance level of plus or minus 20 per cent., I predict that the 20,000 target will not be achieved. I could go further and say that it is unlikely that the Government will achieve 2,000 units within the time available. That will result in a huge difference between the actual cost and the money that the Government have identified for the programme. Much but not all of that money has already been taken from the Housing Corporation's agreed development programmes for the next two years. If I am right and there is a substantial underspend in the programme, will the money be put back into the corporation's agreed development programme over the next two years? I shall give way to the Minister if he wishes to give that assurance.

Mr. Baldry: I have every confidence that the Housing Corporation and the housing associations will be able to meet the target that we have set for them.

Mr. Howarth: In that case, I conclude that if the scheme fails to meet the target of 20,000 properties, the corporation's agreed programme for the next two years will have had money taken away from it and not spent. The overall impact on the construction industry will therefore be negative rather than positive.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Even if the hon. Gentleman's worst fears were realised in a short time, he will know from his knowledge of housing associations that they are currently working on cash-limited allocations for years ahead. If it is a matter of spending money, it should not be difficult to advance programmes that have already been planned or to make off-the-shelf purchases.

Mr. Howarth: That may well be the case, but it was not my point. In his intervention the Minister did not make it clear that the resources will be returned to the Housing Corporation's programme over the next two years. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) may dissent from the specifics of my prediction but, given his knowledge of the Housing Corporation, he would probably accept its generality. If my prediction is correct, the impact on construction will be negative.

The second part of the programme announced in the autumn statement was that local authorities will be allowed to spend capital receipts that they accrue during the 12 or 13-month time slot. The matter is notoriously unpredictable. In his speech, the Minister used submissions by local authorities for credit approval bids to assess the amount of money that would be available. I think that I am right in assuming that. I do not know how one assesses the accuracy of those bids because they are always best guesses. However, I know from experience in my constituency and elsewhere that the market is in such an appalling state that many potential buyers of land and council properties—of which about 40 per cent. have probably been sold—are wary about entering it. I suspect that even local authorities did not anticipate the depths to which the market would sink. The Government's assessment will turn out to be extremely optimistic.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Many people are not willing to exercise their right to buy council properties or properties in the private sector because they fear redundancy and unemployment, a cloud that is hanging over hundreds of thousands or millions of people.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend makes a most important point in justifying my argument. Confidence in the market by builders, developers and potential purchasers simply does not exist. I would be delighted if the autumn statement and subsequent pronouncements from the Department of the Environment and the Housing Corporation boosted confidence. However, the proposed programmes do not contain sufficient substance to inject such confidence into the market.

Another point arises out of the autumn statement. In this, I support what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West from the Front Bench. By reducing the housing associations' grant percentage to 67 per cent., the Government are hoping—this is an arguable point—to raise additional private finance and thereby to expand the amount of programme money that will be available. In other words, they hope to make the available public money go further.

My fear is that, rather than achieving that, it will have one of two effects. First, it could make it more and more difficult, in each given scheme that a housing association considers, to arrive at a combination of private finance and grant that will result in affordable rents. I know that, even at higher levels of grant, housing associations are having difficulty making that equation work.

If submissions from housing associations, through the National Federation of Housing Associations and others, prove to the Minister that this will create problems, I hope that he will listen to those representations and find a compromise solution to enable the programme that we all want to see in place go ahead. I hope that he does not get tied down to the figure as the last word when it may turn out to cause a problem.

The other possible consequence that I fear is that housing associations will be obliged, if they try to stick rigidly to that percentage, to drive down standards so as to make the equation work. We know from the example of local authority housing in the 1960s and 1970s the consequence of allowing standards to slip. It creates expensive long-term problems that are the source of great misery to many people.

I had hoped to say more, but I shall cut my remarks short as several hon. Members still wish to speak. I hope that the expectations that the Government have created through the Chancellor's announcement can be met, but I strongly fear that they cannot. After all the hype and the fuss over the past week have died down, if it proves, as I fear that it will, that the problems built into that announcement overwhelm the projects that have been set in train, I hope that, as quickly as possible, the Government will think again. I hope that the Minister will listen to the submissions that are bound to come from housing associations and others and will be willing to modify the details so that the Government's objectives —rather than the hype—can be met.

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): For a variety of reasons, I have no hesitation in supporting the Government amendment. Some of the major points missed by Opposition Members include the important one that, since the Conservative party came into power in 1979, we have changed the nature of the housing market and the link with councils. The base line has changed so radically that many Opposition Members have been left behind. The changes are not only in the position of councils but in the expectations of individuals. The simple fact that well in excess of 60 per cent. of the population own their own homes is a significant factor. It means that people are determined to take decisions about their own lives into their own hands and to get away from the problems resulting from the bad running of estates by local authorities.

The Government have recently made some significant commitments. I congratulate them on their stated hope to exceed the commitment to build 53,000 houses. Over the period that we have been in power, of the 6 million householders who have bought their own homes, about 1·4 million have done so under the right-to-buy scheme, of which all of us are justifiably proud.

[Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith]

I shall not speak for too long as many others wish to speak, but I wish to dwell on the subject of the housing action trust scheme, introduced by the Government. For a while, it was faltering as councils opposed it. In my area, the tenants in Waltham Forest gave it their full support. The Conservative party should thank them, because more than 70 per cent. of them voted in favour of taking their housing estates out of the control of local authorities and instead to put them in the hands of a housing action trust. It is important to bear that in mind because that is the key to the issue. We have here people whose lives have been blighted by some of the worst-run estates in central London and who chose, in significant numbers, to get away from that.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the hon. Gentleman recognise—the Minister will, as he was aware of this—that the tenants in Waltham Forest voted for the housing action trust only when they had been given a clear and categoric guarantee that they could return to local authority control after the properties had been renovated?

Mr. Duncan-Smith: When I go around the estates, I am told that the tenants have no wish to see the properties return to local authority control. The record of the local authority in running the estates, particularly Chingford Hall estate, which is in my constituency, was appalling. One has only to walk around the estate to see that it has been left in rack and ruin and that it is falling to pieces, to such an extent that the housing action trust will take down most of the estate and rebuild houses that will be perfect for people who wish to live there in comfort.

Mr. Raynsford: The tenants still wish the properties to return to the local council.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: They do not wish that.

When I have visited the housing action trust for Chingford Hall estate, I have found that people are buoyed up with enthusiasm about the scheme—I know that my hon. Friend the Minister can attest to that as he recently visited the area. Furthermore, those who run it, both from the Hoe street headquarters and from Chingford Hall estate itself, show what can happen when people are in charge who want to do something for those who live on an estate and want to help them to solve some of the worse problems. That is a great bonus, and shows how a Conservative policy is working well.

In support of Conservative policies over the past 12 years or so, particularly now, it must also be said that Government expenditure on housing is a significant £8·5 billion. That includes £2·3 billion for the Housing Corporation, £1·5 billion for local authorities and £3·7 billion for housing revenue account subsidy. That shows clearly the Government's commitment to housing.

Others have talked at great length about homelessness, but the Government's record on that, particularly their recent record, is one on which they can stand up and be counted. Single Homelessness in London, in its recent annual report, stated:

> "Extra resources which the rough sleepers' initiative and the homeless mentally ill initiative are providing a welcome recognition by central Government of the scale of the problem in central London."

That is significant.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister has spoken already about those two initiatives, but I shall highlight some points about them. Some £96 million will be provided for the rough sleepers initiative and that should give 2,900 spaces in permanent or leased accommodation and 900 in hostels and emergency accommodation. Some £20 million will be made available over the three years for the mentally ill initiative, to develop a new housing advisory service.

I support the amendment and the Government's housing policy. Building on what has been achieved over the past 12 years, it will take us more and more down to the level of individuals looking after themselves while those who cannot are supported and directed through group initiatives and housing associations rather than through councils.

Mr. Paul Tyler (Cornwall, North): I shall make a brief contribution because I suspect that others wish to speak before the winding-up speeches.

There has been an unusual degree of three-party agreement today. My colleagues and I did not expect to find ourselves in agreement with the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter), who offered words of wisdom to lenders. They must watch their reputations carefully in the coming weeks to see that they pass on the interest rate cuts that they have now been permitted.

I was also extremely surprised to find that I agreed with the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) who made an eloquent plea on behalf of rural areas. When I worked for Shelter in the south-west, my primary work was centred on Plymouth—the city represented by you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and the hon. Member for Sutton. If I still had that job, however, it would now take me as much to the rural areas and the market towns as to the large cities. There are rough speakers—I mean sleepers—in almost every market town; there may be rough speakers, too, at some hours of the night, it depends on when one disturbs them. When I spent time on a sleep-out, I was staggered to find how many full-time professional rough sleepers there were compared with a once-or-twice amateur like me.

The rural areas face a serious homeless problem. The excellent work conducted by Glen Bramley and his team at Bristol university in 1990 and 1991 has shown that up to one third of new households in the rural areas require rented accommodation. Those people will not be accommodated through the right-to-buy provisions or as a result of liberating the now frozen owner-occupied market. More than half of those newly formed households simply cannot afford the full value of anything on the market, even now with so many depressed house prices.

The work undertaken by Action for Communities in Rural England—ACRE—estimates that about 377,000 homes will be required either immediately or in the next five years in rural areas. Recently, I visited rural areas in north Yorkshire, Cumbria, Scotland and in my home area of Cornwall. It is clear to me that we must have a continual programme to provide rented accommodation of all sorts for those communities.

In recent years, the Minister has not shown himself to be dogmatic about the split between the rented and owner-occupied sector. He is a man of great stature, because he listens to both sides of the House on this subject

[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear".] I agree with the Minister's colleagues. In the months ahead, we look to him to be flexible and to ensure that if the new programmes are not successful he will be prepared to argue with his colleagues at the Department and in the Cabinet for a bigger slice of the cake for those who seek rented accommodation.

The study undertaken by the Department of the Environment of communities with populations of fewer than 3,000 has revealed that they will need far more new homes than are currently proposed. In the housing association rental programmes for 1991-92 and for 1992-93, the DOE figure show that 2,436 additional housing units will be provided under the supplementary credit approval scheme. That number will be insufficient to meet the needs of those areas. In Cambridgeshire, for example, only 106 new units will become available; in Cheshire, Cumbria and Cornwall the numbers available will be 38, 51 and 78 respectively. Those numbers are a drop in the ocean. When one considers all the forms of social mix and occupation that make up the rural areas, I cannot believe that the vast majority will be able to make the dramatic shift from the rented to owner-occupied sector—their needs cannot be met.

Good work has been done by the House-Builders Federation, the Association of District Councils and others to try to find ways in which matters can be improved, but the social and housing mixture is extremely difficult to achieve for legal, funding and planning reasons.

In the Chancellor's statement last week some limited help was offered to the hard-pressed building industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) has already drawn attention to the problems of that industry. It is labour intensive and if more money had been made available to it immediately, that could have had a major impact not only on the housing problem but on the jobless totals in many areas.

The disappointment felt at the inability to invest the historic receipts from council house sales is particularly great in rural areas, because many authorities there have few suitable properties still for sale. In the present depressed state of the rural economy, even fewer authorities expect their tenants to be able to exercise their right to buy. I note what the Minister said about Rita, but she will have to work extremely hard in the coming months if an effective equalisation of opportunities is to be offered to people in rural areas.

As the Minister will know, there has been cross-party support in the south-west—I am surprised that the hon. Member for Sutton did not refer to this—for the campaign by The Western Morning News to obtain a phased release of council house receipts. That approach would be a much more sane and effective way in which to achieve the investment in housing that is required in the rural south-west.

The rural areas have one national champion when it comes to job opportunities, help for small businesses and housing—the Rural Development Commission. That excellent body has recently produced an excellent report entitled "Homelessness in Rural Areas". It undertook special studies of Derbyshire, Hertfordshire, Shropshire, Northumberland, Lincolnshire and north Cornwall.

In the particular section relating to my area of the country, that exhaustive report showed that 90 per cent. of applicants for housing had incomes of less than £10,000 a year, 63 per cent. had incomes of less than £6,000 and 36 per cent. relied solely on pensions or benefits. The waiting list in the area has grown at the rate of 80 individuals or families a month. In recent months, repossessions have had a marked effect on the problem.

One would think that the Rural Development Commission, given its excellent pioneering work—which I acknowledge happens to be of particular interest to my constituency—would be given additional funds to help it to meet its housing responsibilities. But what did we find in the autumn statement? Its modest budget of some £40 million is to be cut by £2 million. That organisation is the only one that can effectively try to overcome the homeless problem in some of the lowest income areas, but its budget is to be cut. It is a sad day when such effective organisations, with such small means, find that they are at the mercy of the Chancellor's axe.

When the Prime Minister, who represents a rural constituency, took over from someone whose suburbanity was a terrible example to us all, some of us hoped that the country areas would get a fair crack of the whip. We have had a sad few days since the autumn statement because, once again, the rural areas will be deprived of expert help, limited though it was, which it received and which was designed to try to ensure that they got a fair slice of the housing action.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): It is clear from the speeches of the hon. Members for Cornwall, North (Mr. Tyler) and for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) that this subject is becoming less and less of a purely party political issue. The hon. Member for Knowsley, North was keen to emphasise that Labour authorities have now come round to the idea of housing associations, and the hon. Member for Cornwall, North even paid warm tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister. I take it as progress that other parties are coming round to our way of thinking.

Colchester borough council is a hung council that takes a non-party political approach to its small but acute homelessness problem. It is one of the key issues in my constituency and the reason for that is simple: the vast majority of people live in excellent housing, which makes it all the more unacceptable that an albeit tiny minority should be excluded from that element of prosperity. All parties on the council are determined to resolve the problem and are committed to using housing associations to achieve that end. There is a remarkable lack of party dogma.

My hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale) and I have been invited to attend a meeting with the council on Friday to discuss how to make further progress. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister, in the spirit of political co-operation between all the parties, to approve an application for additional credit under the Government's estate action programme.

I shall be brief so that the replies can commence. I had intended to comment in detail on housing need in Colchester and what is already being achieved by housing associations. In summary, a total of £15 million is being spent, with £8 million coming from the Housing Corporation. Considerable progress is being made. The estate action programme on the Greenstead estate involves 3,200 properties and a £2 million programme of mainly flats and maisonettes. The problems are familiar and it is worth emphasising that not all acute housing problems are in our inner cities; there are just as many in the surrounding towns and the rural areas.

The environment has deteriorated and, for no apparent reason, vandalism and crime are on the increase. The people on the Greenstead estate have an undeserved reputation. They want to improve their area. I know that many of those people are as decent and law-abiding as any anywhere in the constituency and they deserve better. The council has developed plans in close co-operation with the estate's residents and there is evidence of a strong desire for greater self-determination and for the area to recover its standing. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider the application favourably.

There are also certain actions that we can urge the council to take. It could sell its assets and make use of the proposals in the autumn statement. It could sell the bus company and Colchester Contract Services to raise the necessary capital. All those issues and many others will be discussed at the meeting on Friday.

I commend the Government amendment to the House.

Mr. Nigel Jones (Cheltenham): It is a great pleasure for me to have the opportunity to reply to the debate. It has been a good debate. However, I am disappointed that only a few hon. Members have attended it. I hope that it is not a signal to the wider audience that the House does not take seriously the subject of homelessness and the housing crisis. It is a matter that we should take very seriously. My hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said that a home is a right, not a concession.

Many people in my constituency and elsewhere fear buying houses while there is a lack of confidence in the housing market. They have three main fears. The first is that prices will continue to fall—and over the past two months there have been large falls. Secondly, there is the continuing fear of unemployment—and a report published today shows that 46 per cent. of people fear that they could lose their jobs. Thirdly, there is a fear of negative equity—and my hon. Friend said that one in seven households currently live in a property worth less than the mortgage.

One Conservative Member accused the Liberal Democrats of wanting to abolish mortgage interest tax relief. My hon. Friend dealt with that suggestion so firmly that Conservative Members did not mention it again. I want to lay the matter firmly to rest. Our manifesto at the general election said that we would > "introduce housing cost relief weighted towards those most in need and available to house buyers and renters. This will replace mortgage tax relief for future home buyers . . . People holding mortgages will be protected: they will have the choice of moving to housing cost relief or continuing to receive mortgage interest tax relief."

I hope that that clarifies the matter for Conservative Members, who clearly have not read our manifesto. I must admit that I have not read the Conservative party manifesto, but I prefer non-fiction.

I was grateful for some of the Minister's comments. I am enjoying working alongside him and other familiar faces on the Committee considering the Housing and Urban Development Bill. I am sure that we will be on that Committee for a number of months to come, so it is important that we maintain good relations.

I welcomed the Minister's comment that no one should have to sleep rough, but I question the cut in funds for the rough sleeping initiative which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey pointed out, was announced on Thursday. I am concerned about the provision in the autumn statement of £750 million to buy 20,000 vacant houses. I take seriously the comments of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) about delays and the Government's possible lack of ability to meet that target. The key intervention was that by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford), who pointed out that, during the time it takes to buy those 20,000 homes, it is likely that there will be more than 20,000 further repossessions. The scheme is a drop in the ocean.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) said that, on the 1979 basis for calculating unemployment, the true unemployment figure is now in excess of 4 million. It is right to link the unemployment rate with the number of houses on the market and the number of people in financial difficulty. The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the curious logic in the Housing and Urban Development Bill—which we shall seek to amend—where the Government propose to take away the rights of tenants through compulsory competitive tendering.

When the Minister replies, will he deal with the point about accumulated receipts of £5·5 billion? It is the crux of the matter. It is well known that the best and most sure way out of a recession is through the construction industry. A phased relief of £5·5 billion in councils' bank accounts throughout the country would get the building industry back to work, with all that that means.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jones: I will not give way as I am short of time and I have a great deal of ground to cover.

If that £5·5 billion were released in a phased way, it would enable houses currently requiring repairs to be brought back into use. It would allow housing associations and councils to make an impact on their waiting lists. It would also put back in work many of those in the construction industry who have lost their jobs.

A family who recently visited my constituency surgery believed that the way to instant riches was to buy their council house, so in 1987 they voted Conservative and bought their property the following year. The husband was a skilled bricklayer, but in 1989 he lost his job and the family home was repossessed.

That family found themselves again on the local council's books, and the home that they occupied as council tenants for 11 years was left empty. Every Sunday, the family used to visit their old house and look through the front windows of the property that was once their home. If they had not believed Conservative party propaganda, they would still be contented council tenants.

That family was placed in bed-and-breakfast accommodation, which had a serious effect on their health, for 56 weeks—at a cost to the council of £18,000. That is the economics of the situation.

Mr. Stephen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way now?

Mr. Jones: No, because I have much more ground to cover.

The most remarkable contribution in today's debate was that of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr.

Evans). Many of his comments might lead one to think that he had a place on this side of the House. I agree with him that local authorities must be efficient in collecting rent and in turning round property. I pay tribute to Cheltenham local authority, which has cut the time between lets from seven weeks to four weeks and is reducing it still further. As a consequence, the number of families in bed-and-breakfast accommodation has also fallen and continues to do so. I point out that the council is controlled by Liberal Democrats, and that is Liberal Democrat policy in action.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms. Jackson) said that she would like to see £1·75 billion of receipts released. She is right to argue that, though I believe—because I was absent from the Chamber—that the hon. Lady confused some of her figures.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor summed up the situation when he asserted that there is a housing crisis and that after 13 years in power it is unacceptable that under the Government there are so many individuals and families in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. I am sure that everyone on this side of the House agrees with that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey said that the purpose of housing policy is to provide a decent home for everyone, on a tenure of their choice, and at a price that they can afford. By any measure, the Government have failed to do that. The autumn statement does not address the issue. As the hon. Member for Leeds, West said, the autumn statement is a snowflake on an iceberg. I urge right hon. and hon. Members to reject the Government amendment and to support our motion.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): As Liberal Democrats appear to have spent most of the weekend trying to change the topic of today's debate, I have little doubt that they now regret choosing the subject of housing. Even as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House was announcing last Thursday the business of the House for this week, a headline in the Evening Standard was proclaiming "Billions to boost housing". A front page article reported:

> "Chancellor Norman Lamont pumped billions into the housing industry today to spearhead his drive for the economic recovery of Britain."

Even Labour Members were compelled to acknowledge that, as a result of the autumn statement, there will be more money for housing than was set out in our general election manifesto.

Government spending plans provide for all the commitments in our manifesto to be met, including more housing action trusts and continuing help for rough sleepers—and I may explain to the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) that £86 million for the rough-sleeper programme that was not there before is not a cut. There will be further large-scale voluntary transfers of council housing and increased output of social housing.

Capital spending on housing funded through the Housing Corporation increased this year by £600 million to produce an immediate boost to the housing market, and nearly £6 billion will be spent over the next three years. We estimate that that will enable substantially more than the 153,000 homes forecast in our manifesto to be provided over that three-year period—and the Government, rightly, will be looking to lever in more private finance in support of the £7·5 billion of public capital spending to be made this year and over the public expenditure survey period. That is expected to produce a total of £10·5 billion of spending on new social housing across four years for people in need.

Anyone reading the speech by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) would be disappointed. It contained no new ideas or suggestions, but was just a clutch of recycled speeches and other people's press releases. The hon. Member for Cheltenham regretted the paucity of attendance for this debate, and I agree. Three out of the motion's six sponsors have failed to make an appearance, such is their considerable interest in housing matters. It would be interesting to know where the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), and the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) might be. Perhaps they hoped that they would be successful in changing the topic of today's debate.

The absence of new ideas and lack of interest from the Opposition Benches is not surprising. It is often the case that, when Opposition parties have local responsibilities for housing, their record is truly appalling. Five per cent. of Hackney's housing stock—2,000 homes—stands empty and a further 1,200 homes are illegally occupied. The council has no clue who lives in those properties. That council has 3,200 empty or illegally-occupied properties, but its homeless total is just under 2,000. That council could house them all and still have some change.

The Liberals are no better. Tower Hamlets has a 4·5 per cent. void rate, or 1,895 houses. That is rather more than the total of 1,669 persons that council had in temporary accommodation at the last count.

The 1990 auditor's report described Islington council as "incompetent". He mentioned eight flats leased from private owners to alleviate homelessness that the council had left empty for one and a half years. A report by a Queen's Counsel commented that the council had

> "the cash office staffed by the innumerate, the filing done by the disorganised, and the reception in the care of the surly and charmless."

Basil Fawlty on the rates.

Islington council also paid a firm to maintain communal television aerials in a block of council flats that has been demolished 10 years previously, and £25,000 on constructing a 40-yard cycle track the wrong way down a one-way street. Islington council also had £10 million of usable capital housing receipts but spent it elsewhere.

As was made clear by the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle)—whom we welcome to the Dispatch Box for the first time—Labour is still confused about its approach to capital receipts. As Inside Housing reported in a recent issue:

> "In the run-up to the election, Clive Soley ran into trouble with the leadership when he was quoted as saying that a redefinition of the public sector borrowing requirement, taking council capital receipts out of the calculation, was on the party's agenda. Mr. Battle is obviously keen to avoid similar problems. Redefinition of the PSBR, which could theoretically release capital receipts for housing, is clearly not something Mr. Battle is prepared to argue for today. 'Those are the arguments that the Treasury team are going to have to sort out, not me as the Housing spokesman. At the moment, redefinition is not on Labour's agenda. It is not one of my priorities.' And when asked for clarification today, he said that that approach still stands."

[Mr. Tony Baldry]

We welcome the opportunity given by today's debate to make clear our commitment to the promotion of greater owner-occupation, the widening of choice for tenants and an increase in the number of homes available for rent.

Mr. Stephen: Does my hon. Friend agree that there would be no capital receipts from council house sales if Labour and the Liberal Democrats had had their way, because there would have been no council house sales?

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend has made a good point: there would be little choice and opportunity in housing if the Opposition had had their way.

Our housing policies are good news for tenants, because they provide an opportunity and choice——

Mr. Pike: I assure the Minister that our position on the public sector borrowing requirement and on capital receipts is quite clear. In view of the Government's expenditure plans—announced last week by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—may I ask why it is all right for them to take into account over the next few years the use of capital receipts gained from the sale of public assets? What will the Government do when they have no more public assets to sell?

Mr. Baldry: The hon. Gentleman has made a brave attempt to rescue his hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West. His hon. Friend failed earlier today, and the hon. Gentleman has failed now.

As I have said, our housing policies are good news for tenants. They provide more opportunity and more choice. Let me add that the proposed increase contained in next year's rent guidelines is less, in cash terms, than last year's increase. We are revolutionising the management of council housing and flats; we are giving tenants new rights, such as the right to improve and an improved right to repair; we are continuing to invest millions of pounds in estate action—and in housing action trusts, which concentrate resources on the worst council estates. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) that I will give careful attention to his request for further implementation of the estate action programme in his area. I am sure that his local authority, like every other, will want to take full advantage of the opportunities provided by the capital partnership scheme.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) has direct experience of tenants' aspirations in his constituency and nearby. He reinforced the welcome given by those tenants for Government initiatives such as the establishment of housing action trusts—initiatives that Labour voted against, campaigned against and would have denied tenants. Only our policies are good news for tenants; only our policies provide choice.

Mr. George Howarth: Earlier, I asked the Minister a question which he failed to answer. Let me ask it again. If the money that has been targeted at the Housing Corporation with a view to the acquisition of 20,000 properties fails to materialise, will the Minister ensure that the underspend is carried forward into the following two years—from which much of it has been taken?

Mr. Baldry: The hon. Gentleman's speech would have done Cassandra proud. I shall deal with it in a moment.

Our policies are good news for home owners. Following a further fall in interest rates, the cost of home loans is now at a 20-year low. Barratt Homes has announced a 30-year mortgage rate low of 6·5 per cent.; the majority of Abbey National mortgage customers will be paying their lowest-ever rate by Christmas; housing-market experts now expect loans to dip below 6 per cent., especially for first-time buyers. Little wonder that the chief executive of the Halifax building society stated, immediately after the autumn statement, that the 7 per cent. bank base rate was "very good news for the housing market—it is what we have been calling for".

As my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter) rightly pointed out, building societies should pass on the benefit of interest-rate cuts to home owners in lower mortgage rates as soon as possible. I am glad to say that, when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment met mortgage lenders this morning, all the mortgage lenders confirmed that they would play a full and constructive part in the initiative for the purchase of empty properties.

The housing market will also be helped by the Chancellor's £750 million package to enable housing associations to buy some 20,000 empty homes, including new homes and repossessed properties. That, in turn, will provide houses for families in great need. The £750 million will benefit the housing market by helping those in housing need, making it easier for some people to move and giving relief to mortgage lenders. The prospect of 20,000 families in housing need being housed sooner rather than later must be good news.

As the chairman of the Housing Corporation, Sir Christopher Benson, has observed, this "has given the Housing Corporation the opportunity they are seeking—to help the revival of the housing market and to help people in housing need."

Let me tell the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) that building societies are queueing up to start positive negotiations with housing associations, to enable them to meet our target of 20,000 as soon as possible.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister misrepresented the truth about which of my colleagues were present earlier. Quite apart from that, however, does he accept that he has not delivered the sort of response that people outside expect? First, it may be a token of the Government's commitment that none of the amendment's signatories has been present for any of the debate—including the Secretary of State for the Environment, who is responsible for housing. Secondly, although we accept, along with others outside the House, that welcome measures were announced on Thursday, those measures are nothing in comparison with the scale of the current housing problem; and that is what the Minister has so far failed to recognise.

Mr. Baldry: The hon. Gentleman has expressed regret about Conservative attendance. He should look first to his own Benches: he will note that a significant number of the motion's sponsors are not present on what is, after all, a Liberal Democrat Supply day, having spent most of the weekend trying to persuade the House authorities to change the topic of the debate to anything other than housing.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) reminded us that the autumn statement provided not just more money for England, but more money for Scotland and Wales. Wales is being provided with £38 million to purchase repossessed properties. Yes, we will rise to the challenge presented by rural housing: the capital partnership scheme will give us an opportunity to work together with more rural local authorities, presenting rural housing initiatives and responding to local housing needs.

Let me tell the hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Tyler) that rural areas have a champion: the Government. Our manifesto commitment to spend nearly £6 billion through the Housing Corporation to provide 153,000 homes over the next few years will be more than that. We now expect the Housing Corporation to provide some 165,000 further homes to rent. Local authorities will be able to use 100 per cent. of capital receipts, obtained between now and 1 December 1993. We anticipate that that will release at least £1 billion for spending on housing.

We have launched the capital partnership scheme to reinforce local authorities' incentives to spend their money on areas such as housing, which will be of lasting benefit to their communities. The scheme will be worth up to £600 million next year. An increase in Housing Corporation spending to well over £2 billion this year, together with further leverage of private finance, is expected to provide some £10·5 billion of public and private spending on new social housing.

We are investing in housing, and we are enabling others to do so. The money invested will allow us to tackle rundown council housing; it will provide new opportunities to help families on local authority waiting lists, and will enable more to be done for the homeless; and it will help and encourage the construction industry.

We are a Government committed to tackling the problem of homelessness: a Government determined to continue to take action to ensure that no one in our society needs to sleep rough, and determined that every family should have a decent home in which to live. The initiatives that we are implementing, the policies that we have announced and the money that we have made available are good news for families in need of housing, good news for tenants of rundown social housing, good news for the house-building industry and good news for the housing market. I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to support the amendment.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Robert G. Hughes and Mr. Andrew Mackay.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved:

That this House notes the Government's continuing commitment to housing policies designed to ensure that a decent home is within reach of every family, and in particular to promoting the growth of owner-occupation, widening choice for tenants, and improving value-for-money and targeting of public expenditure; and especially welcomes the measures announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Autumn Statement which—consistently with the need to maintain tight control of public spending in the interests of the economy and the taxpayer—will contribute to stabilising the housing market, will increase the supply of social housing thereby helping homeless families, and will promote investment in renovation of run-down council estates.

Former Yugoslavia

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.11 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): I beg to move,

That this House regrets that the response of the European Community, and notably Her Majesty's Government, since it has assumed the Presidency, to the crisis in former Yugoslavia has been too little and too late; is appalled by the continuing slaughter in Bosnia-Herzegovina; is deeply concerned about the impact of winter in Sarajevo and other cities, where failure to protect and stockpile food will be paid for in lives; condemns the barbaric policy of ethnic cleansing; considers that the first priority must be to suppress the ferocity of the fighting by taking over the air space above Bosnia-Herzegovina under UN mandate and if necessary using it to prevent the use of heavy weapons and aircraft for offensive purposes; calls for the effective policing of the Danube to enforce sanctions; congratulates British troops on humanitarian protection for relief convoys; insists however that they must have full capacity for retaliation including, if necessary, air cover; insists that Her Majesty's Government must respond much more generously to the refugee problem, both financially and in the numbers accepted; is deeply concerned that the conflict may soon spread to Kosovo and Macedonia; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to co-ordinate a European Community wide strategy for refugees as proposed by Germany and for further urgent and appropriate action.

I suspect that many people in Europe allowed themselves a period of self-congratulation immediately after the break-up of the Warsaw pact, when the cold war came to an end and, in particular, when European countries participated successfully in the United Nations operation in the middle east to expel Saddam Hussein from Kuwait. But the sense of complacency that these events may have created has been rudely interrupted by the break-up of Yugoslavia into its historical components, fuelled by ethnic hatred of the most virulent kind. On our television screens, atrocity piled on atrocity, inhumanity, barbarism and cruelty have been commonplace.

Which of us can be content with the response of the international community? Which of us believes that Europe has done all that it can? Does any hon. Member feel no sense of shame about our niggardly attitude to refugees?

British troops are at last arriving in Bosnia, but it is right to ask ourselves in what circumstances they do so and for what purpose.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned refugees, and I share his views on visa restrictions. Is he aware that many hon. Members—certainly myself—have been repeatedly ringing the Home Secretary's Private Office and the Under-Secretary's Private Office about the 180 refugees who are isolated and some of whose children may die? In view of the ambiguous nature of the decision about whether to allow them to enter and all the other facts, should not those 180 refugees be allowed to come here as quickly as possible for the most humanitarian reasons?

Mr. Campbell: The hon. Gentleman makes a most eloquent plea, and I shall put it in context.

Let us consider how many refugees we are being asked to take compared with the numbers that countries surrounding Yugoslavia have felt obliged to take. Is not it time for a generous response from the United Kingdom? I suspect that it would do us much good in the international community. It would do us much good in Europe if some of our partners felt that we were as willing to assume these burdens as they have been. I think in particular of the burden that Germany has assumed and of some of the social difficulties that have resulted. It is a moment for some warmth of spirit, but so far we have seen little evidence of it from Ministers.

Our troops have gone to keep the peace. It is a peacekeeping operation, but we must ask ourselves what peace there is to keep. The decision to send British troops was taken many weeks ago, yet some of the concerns that were expressed in early September still have not been adequately met. I assert, I believe without contradiction, that we have no right to place brave men and women in circumstances where they risk their lives without giving them the clearest possible military objectives, the equipment and numbers to meet those objectives and, if necessary, naval and air support. It is said that our troops are in Yugoslavia for a humanitarian purpose—to assist the United Nations in ensuring that aid gets through. Those are desirable motives, but they are not clear-cut military objectives.

There has been much debate about the precise terms of the rules of engagement. I would not ask the Minister of State for the Armed Forces to be express about the terms of the rules of engagement—those who know about these matters know that it is by no means sensible to narrate in detail the terms of engagement—but I must ask him to confirm that the rules of engagement, as framed, conform to the nature of the military task that we are asking our troops to undertake.

It is one thing to issue rules of engagement based on self-defence and on negotiating a right of passage for convoys, but it is a quite different thing when, as happened at the weekend, United Kingdom forces are considered for the escort of refugees. Under what rules of engagement would our troops have conducted that exercise? If refugees in the charge of United Kingdom troops were fired upon, it seems self-evident that the troops would have returned fire. Would that be consistent with the rules of engagement under which they would have had to operate if the task of escorting refugees had been assigned to them?

We have sent to Bosnia Senator tanks and Warrior infantry fighting vehicles, but why did it take so long for those vehicles to get there? Why are men and vehicles having to familiarise themselves in winter conditions? How much easier it would have been if troops and their equipment had been deployed earlier.

You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will have heard colourful stories in the aftermath of the Gulf war about the performance of some British Army vehicles and how some of them were kept going only by cannibalising others in Europe to the extent that, as has been said, perhaps somewhat flippantly, there were hardly half a dozen decent tanks left in Europe. We must have guarantees about the availability of spare parts and the nature of the maintenance of vehicles, on which the lives of our troops depend.

I must ask the Minister—and I do so with some reticence because these are issues that people are reluctant to discuss openly and in public—what assessment has been made about the possibility of casualties? Will all medical evacuations be effected using Sea King helicopters, which have now been deployed offshore? If that is the case, what assessment has been made of the capability of that aircraft to fly in all circumstances in the Yugoslavian winter?

There are more fundamental questions. On what basis was the number of 1,800 arrived at? What assessment of the task was made in advance of a decision about those numbers? Is it true, as some with confidence have asserted, that the size of the force that the United Kingdom should deploy was determined before the nature of the task had been properly defined? What prompted the increase from 1,800 to the present figure of 2,400? Will the Minister tell the House whether there are any plans to send more troops?

If I recall correctly, the Secretary of State for Defence said to the Defence Select Committee that the initial deployment was for six months and that there might be a further six months of deployment, but that thereafter the matter would have to be reconsidered. If that is the case, are there any plans to send more troops?

What contingency plans are being discussed if, for example, as is not beyond the bounds of possibility, the United Nations were to take the view that the mass evacuation of refugees was necessary? Would the British troops, sent for humanitarian purposes to safeguard the passage of convoys, be turned to other tasks such as guarding airfields or similar tasks? If that is contemplated, are we satisfied that the equipment with which they have been provided is adequate for that purpose?

When Vitez was chosen, it was some way back from the fighting. Now it is right in the middle of the fighting. What consequences will that have for the nature of the operations that British troops are able to carry out? In recent weeks, Canadian, French and Spanish troops have been prevented by irregulars from reaching the areas assigned to them by the United Nations so that deployment, according to United Nations resolution 776, has not yet been achieved.

In the context of the weekend, we must ask how far our troops are empowered to go. I put the matter in a way that is not unnecessarily fanciful. If a drunken militia man with a Kalashnikov stands in the way of a convoy threatening to fire on those who are guarding it, can he stop it, or are our troops empowered to take such steps as they believe necessary to secure the safe passage of that convoy? I ask that question for the following reason.

With the onset of winter, when the lives of many people will be at stake, there is bound to be far greater pressure to get access with food and supplies to those who are in need. Let us remember that it was only when winter came to the people of northern Iraq that public opinion and international opinion were prompted to take the necessary steps. If people are dying in the snow in Bosnia, there may be pressure on us here. That will be nothing compared with the pressure on our troops who will feel compelled to take the steps necessary to ensure that food and supplies get to those who need them most.

In the winter conditions, access to our troops will be more difficult. What steps will be taken to ensure logistical supplies to our troops? Someone who claims some expertise in the matter put it to me the other day that, in the winter in Yugoslavia, British troops might find themselves concentrating almost exclusively on achieving sufficient logistical support to maintain themselves, never mind distributing food and supplies to those who required them.

[Mr. Campbell]

Let us consider the question of command and control. There are reports that there is some friction between the senior United Kingdom commander and General Morillon. It was always going to be a delicate relationship for reasons that those who understand the politics of NATO will clearly appreciate. Are we satisfied that that relationship is now on a proper military footing? The Minister has an obligation to confirm to the House that the Government are satisfied at the highest level that the command and control arrangements are properly drawn up for the most effective use of our troops and for the best protection that is available to them.

I turn to the question of air power. When the Secretary of State for Defence appeared before the Defence Select Committee, he was reticent when the point was put to him. I ask the Minister a direct question: if the United Kingdom commander on the ground needs air power to protect the lives of those under his command, will he have it? Have the arrangements been made? I do not ask the Minister to tell us from where or in what form—that information would necessarily require to be kept restricted. However, the House and the troops are entitled to know whether and in what circumstances they will have available to them the resources of the Alliance to protect them. I put the matter bluntly once more: if the commander on the ground needs to call down air strikes to protect United Kingdom troops, will he be able to do so? It is a straightforward question which deserves a straightforward answer.

In the context of air power, we know that the Serbs have used military aircraft. The United Nations has responded to that by declaring an air exclusion zone, but, contrary to the air exclusion zone we have established over southern Iraq, we have not yet willed the means to enforce such an exclusion zone in Yugoslavia. What use is an air exclusion zone unless it is enforceable? Will the Government today pledge themselves to ensure that the proper means of enforcing that relevant United Nations resolution will now be obtained?

It is uncharacteristic for such an operation to be carried on without a substantial contribution from the United States. Perhaps the fact that the United States has been locked in a seemingly interminable presidential election has had some influence on the nature and degree of its commitment. It is well known that the intelligence-gathering capability of the United States is second to none. I ask the Minister a direct question: can he tell the House whether, as a contribution to the United Kingdom's efforts in Yugoslavia, the United Kingdom is able to call on the intelligence-gathering efforts of the United States?

I am aware that I have concentrated on what some might think to be domestic military considerations. I hope that I may be excused. I do not lose sight of the scale of the problem, nor does the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, who estimates that 400,000 people could perish in Bosnia this winter. I want the United Kingdom troops to help to prevent that, but I want them to have every possible assistance as they try to do so.

As we say on every such occasion in the House, we know that we have professional, versatile and committed forces. We owe them a duty not to expose them to unnecessary risk. My questions this evening go right to the heart of the role and of the effectiveness of United Kingdom forces in Bosnia. The more effective they can be, the more likely it is that the people of that troubled country will have a chance of survival.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Archie Hamilton): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"congratulates the European Community and notably Her Majesty's Government in its capacity as Presidency on its unremitting work for a solution of the crisis in the former Yugoslavia; is appalled by the continuing slaughter in Bosnia-Herzegovina; is deeply concerned about the impact of winter in Sarajevo and other cities and the need to ensure the safe passage of relief supplies to them; expresses its warm support for the work of British troops in providing protective support for relief convoys and is reassured to know that they will have the full right to self-defence; condemns the barbarous policy of ethnic cleansing; calls for the effective policing of the Danube to enforce sanctions; welcomes Her Majesty's Government's response to the refugee problem; is deeply concerned that the conflict may spread to Kosovo and Macedonia; and makes clear its strong support for the work of the international conference on the former Yugoslavia under the leadership of Lord Owen and Mr. Cyrus Vance."

The House will recall the Adjournment debate on 25 September when my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence set out the Government's response to the troubles that continue to beset the former Yugoslavia, as part of a wider effort by the international community. Attention was focused especially on developments in Bosnia where the conflict has been extremely bloody and seemingly intractable.

We can all agree that the overarching need is for a negotiated, political solution to the conflict. We cannot impose peace on Bosnia militarily—nor should we try; there is no military solution to the problem. The House is well aware of the continuing work of the international conference on the former Yugoslavia in Geneva, which is continuing to draw together the efforts of the European Community and the United Nations in close liaison, building on and following up the achievements of the London conference and bringing together the key leaders on whom all hopes of a settlement depend. Under its co-chairmen, Cyrus Vance and Lord Owen, the conference is pursuing a comprehensive programme of work aimed at helping the parties make progress towards a solution. That work must be made to succeed. Without a solution which the parties arrive at of their own free will, there will be no end to the tragedy that is Yugoslavia and no peace for the people of Bosnia.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Before the Minister develops his speech, will he answer the question reflected in the exchange between my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) about the position of the 183 people, predominantly women and children, who have applied for visas to visit the United Kingdom? Have those applications been granted or refused, or has no decision yet been taken?

Mr. Hamilton: No decision has been taken on that. The hon. Gentleman will have to await further announcements from my right hon. Friends on that matter. However, it is worth making the point that, since the conflict began in Yugoslavia, more than 40,000 Yugoslav nationals have arrived in this country already.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I want to comment on this point because a bus from just outside my constituency has been turned back. I remind the Minister that, as the hon. Members for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) have said, these people are predominantly women and children. One child has a tumour which needs almost immediate surgery to save its life. Those people have been sitting on buses in miserable, cold conditions. I believe that the Home Office has been considering the matter since Friday.

For goodness sake, surely it is time that a decision was taken. If the Home Office cannot take a decision tonight, when on earth will it take one?

Mr. Hamilton: I have been helped out by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office and I can now tell the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) what the position is. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department reviewed the applications for visas from that group of refugees this afternoon. He decided that six refugees with family ties in the United Kingdom should be granted visas. The two medical cases are still under review. The rest of the group will be refused visas to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Madden: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I raised this matter with Madam Speaker this afternoon and complained about a number of parliamentary questions that I had tabled for answer on Thursday which have not been answered and to which I have not even received holding replies. I received replies just a few minutes ago and they reveal that the situation is being handled in an extraordinary way. Those men, women and children have applied for visitor visas to visit the United Kingdom. However, for some extraordinary reason, the normal procedure has been hijacked by the Home Office. As we have just heard, the Home Secretary has taken an extremely long time to consider the applications.

I understand from the Minister's mumbled reply that the bulk of the applications have been refused. My point of order which is directly for you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, is that normally, under an application for a visitor visa, the Foreign Office and entry clearance officers at our post in Vienna will consider the application. Why they have been referred in this case alone to London and to the Home Office I do not know. However, it is disgraceful. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, who is in the Chamber, should be——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order for the Chair and I suspect that the hon. Gentleman appreciates that. No doubt Ministers will have taken note of what he said.

Mr. Madden: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department very conveniently slipped a piece of paper to the Minister of State for the Armed Forces. Will the Minister from the Home Department be able to intervene in the debate to tell us why on this occasion the Home Office has hijacked the normal procedures, thereby denying those men, women and children an opportunity——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman appreciates that that is not a point of order for the Chair. As I have said, no doubt the Government Front Bench will have heard what he said.

Mr. Hamilton: That is right.

Ms. Liz Lynne (Rochdale): Further to the other points raised, I understand that the refugee organisation based in Leeds sought advice from the Home Office before it sent the coaches. Two of the coaches were taken from Rochdale to the Austrian-Slovenian border. They have now returned. However, all assurances were sought from the Home Office. The Minister should make a statement to explain why Home Office Ministers said on Thursday in the House that visas will be required, but arrangements were made before Thursday.

Mr. Hamilton: Those questions should really be referred to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. I do not think that I can be expected to answer them. However, I tried to help the House on the matter.

Mr. Winnick: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hamilton: No, I must make progress.

Progress is slow and attended by setbacks, as we always knew it would be, but there are encouraging developments. The new constitutional proposals for Bosnia tabled by Cyrus Vance and Lord Owen provide an excellent basis for negotiation. Discussions on a new constitution continue with all the parties in Geneva, despite the initial negative reaction from the Bosnian Serbs. We hope also that the parties will live up to the ceasefire agreement reached on 10 November by the Muslim, Croat and Serb military commanders under the auspices of the Geneva conference mixed military working group, although experience tells us that there are likely to be setbacks. Crucially, the agreements reached at the London conference and being reached, or still to be reached, in Geneva continue to provide benchmarks against which the parties' actions, and their willingness to pursue peace, can be judged.

Where the parties fall short, intense pressure needs to be applied. But that pressure must offer the prospect of an eventual solution, by making the warring sides see where their true interests lie. Military intervention of any kind offers no such prospect. Tighter sanctions if necessary, coupled with the effective enforcement of the arms embargo against the whole of the former Yugoslavia, must continue to be the main vehicle for bringing pressure to bear. Those measures will take time before they are truly effective, but I am confident that, despite sporadic reports of sanctions-busting, the tightening noose of the trade embargo will increasingly threaten any remaining economic and political stability in Serbia. Already shortages of essential materials have resulted in unemployment rising by 60 per cent. and inflation spiralling upwards.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): If the Minister is confident that those sanctions will have that kind of effect, how does he explain the fact that newspapers have reported today that petrol queues in Belgrade are almost non-existent and that a Community member, Greece, is colluding with sanctions-busting? If that is the case, how can the Minister possibly be so confident that sanctions over time will have any effect on the Serbian Government?

Mr. Hamilton: Sanctions are already having some effect. They are creating the most immense problems for the Serbian economy and will continue to do that. However, I take the hon. Gentleman's point. They must be made to work more effectively and that is how we must judge them. Measures are being taken to ensure that the sanctions work better.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): I would be grateful if my right hon. Friend the Minister could help me because I am puzzled. If what my right hon. Friend says is right, all the Serbian people—the good, bad and indifferent—are being slowly strangled to death. Would it not have been better to have done many months ago what many of us wanted and had one or two strikes at military targets within Serbia?

Mr. Hamilton: I shall refer to air strikes. However, the answer to my hon. Friend is that that would not have been right. If there had been strikes, the UN troops of whatever nationality would have been seen to be the enemy. We do not want that. We are not in the business of going to war with the Serbs. We are trying to do what we can to help with humanitarian relief. We do not want there to be a situation in which the only thing upon which the warring factions can agree is that the people in blue berets are the enemy and should be ambushed and shot at at every available opportunity.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Is the Minister aware of statements by Lord Owen that the military activity in Bosnia is being conducted not from Serbia, but by the Bosnian Serbs themselves? In fact, intervention on a military scale from Serbia has already ceased. Attacks upon military targets in Serbia would inevitably involve civilian casualties and drive the Serb population more and more into the hands of the extremists in Serbia.

Mr. Hamilton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. That is absolutely true. We do not want to be in conflict with anybody in Serbia, in Bosnia or in any other parts of the former Yugoslavia. We are trying to negotiate humanitarian convoys through and to give protection to our troops who are involved in that. We do not intend to go to war with any of the factions in the former Yugoslavia. Indeed, it would be very regrettable if we got to the stage where we were involved in out-and-out conflict.

Ms. Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hamilton: I am sorry, I shall not give way. I must make progress or I shall never finish my speech.

The United Kingdom has taken the lead in providing technical assistance to the neighbouring countries where the sanctions have to be made to bite. The pressures brought to bear by sanctions will need to be increased further if Belgrade does not take action to halt and reverse the expansionist policies of the Bosnian Serbs in accordance with the commitments made at the London conference. We shall ensure that this is kept firmly on the agenda.

It is self-evident that an end to the fighting in Bosnia cannot be brought about by military intervention, given the nature of the conflict.

Mr. Cormack: My right hon. Friend the Minister is contradicting himself. A few moments ago, in response to an intervention, he agreed that the Bosnian Serbs are no longer being egged on by the Serbs in Serbia. He now says that they are, which I believe to be the case. It cannot be both.

Mr. Hamilton: I was agreeing with the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) that we do not want to become involved in conflict or fighting with any of the factions in Bosnia. I was not particularly agreeing with his point about the Bosnian Serbs, but we are not in the business of air strikes or getting involved in military action against any of the warring factions there.

Ms. Hoey: Does the Minister agree that, if any arms embargo is to work, it must start with a level playing field? Any arms embargo when Bosnians do not have arms and the Serbians do must mean that those who already have arms will use them to massacre the minority of the people in Bosnia who have no arms and who have not been allowed to acquire them by the international community.

Mr. Hamilton: I am not suggesting that we should supply arms to the Bosnian Muslims to even the playing field. I do not think that many people would sympathise with that. It would merely lead to an arms build-up right across the former Yugoslavia, which would not help anybody.

There is no single aggressor and no single front line. In Bosnia we are dealing with Serb against Croat, Muslim against Serb, and Croat against Muslim, not just within one country but within districts, towns and villages, within streets and even mixed blocks of flats. A massive armed intervention might suppress the violence for a time, but it would achieve no permanent result. It could not force people to live together in peace; its withdrawal would be the signal for a resumption of the conflict.

I do not believe that any hon. Member here today espouses that course of action. We could not achieve our lasting aim, and we would run the risk of launching our troops into a bloody civil war, from which withdrawal would be much easier said than done.

A lesser intervention would be unlikely to suppress the violence even temporarily. Domination of Bosnia airspace, a suggestion put forward in the motion and raised by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), would achieve little. The fighting in Bosnia is taking place on the ground, by small groups and individuals who live and operate among civilians—the very people whom we are trying to assist and who would be most at risk from an aerial offensive. Indeed, many of those fighting are civilians who have taken up arms.

Even if the use of air power against the warring factions seemed justified, targets would be very hard to identify, both because of the mountainous heavily wooded terrain and because much of the fighting is done with small, highly mobile weapons such as rifles and machine guns, mortars, hand-held rocket launchers and air-defence weapons. Air strikes against such targets would be likely to add to the casualties without stopping the fighting. And, of course, it would put an immediate end to the humanitarian activities of the Red Cross and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. They could not continue to operate convoys under such conditions, nor could our troops continue to provide protection for them. We would no longer be regarded as impartial.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Is the Minister saying that the heavy artillery tanks and guns which ring Sarajevo, for example, cannot be targeted?

Mr. Hamilton: I am saying that they can very easily be moved at night and put into areas where there are schools, convents and so on. If one tried to take them out from the air, one would cause enormous civilian casualties. I think that we have learnt that lesson from previous conflicts.

But of course we cannot stand by and watch the appalling suffering which is already manifest in Bosnia and threatens to engulf the republic as winter approaches. Britain is playing a leading role in international efforts to bring relief to the civilian populations. We have given our full support to the extension of the mandate of the UN protection force—UNPROFOR—in the former Yugoslavia so that the force can provide protective support for humanitarian convoys throughout Bosnia. As the House knows, a British battalion group has been deployed for that purpose. Together with battalions from France, Canada and Spain, and support units from the Netherlands, Belgium, Denmark, Norway, the United States of America and Portugal, it will form part of a new Bosnia command under Major General Philippe Morillon. Their task will be, as we have described earlier, to escort relief convoys, on the basis of negotiated passage, to where they are needed. I am glad to have this opportunity to inform the House about progress with the deployment.

I should like to take up the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East about the delay. The reason was that it took time to get the ships to take out the Warrior armoured personnel carriers and it took time for reconnaissances to be made of the area before the troops arrived there.

The last of the battalion group arrived in theatre today and will shortly be operational. The deployment has been a phased one involving 10 ships, including Royal Fleet Auxiliaries and merchant shipping, transporting vehicles and equipment, and 55 flights transporting personnel. That has been a substantial and complex undertaking which has been achieved smoothly and promptly with the professionalism that we rightly expect from the armed forces. We have been most grateful to the United States Government for their assistance in this process through the provision of the entire airlift for our troops.

The total number of British personnel being deployed is about 2,400 initially, including headquarters troops. The reconnaissance confirmed our earlier planning figure of 1,800 personnel for the battalion group, but there will still be a short term need for some 400 extra men and women, mainly Royal Engineers, to provide support services in the initial stages of the deployment, such as accommodation and sanitation, electricity and water, reflecting the physical damage which has been sustained by so much of the fabric of Bosnia during the past months of conflict.

Following further examination of the medical support for the battalion, we have decided to provide a helicopter casualty evacuation capability in theatre, and have deployed four Royal Navy Sea King aircraft for this purpose. They will operate initially from Royal Fleet Auxiliary Argus off Split, transferring to a base ashore when conditions permit. The provision of that capability involves 100 personnel, excluding the Argus crew. The helicopters will be used for casualty evacuation when that is judged to be preferable to evacuation by road.

The United Kingdom contingent will be operating in central and north-east Bosnia, with its headquarters at Vitez and logistic bases at Split, Tomislavgrad and Gorni Vakuf. That represents a change from the UN's earlier plan for our battalion, when it was envisaged that aid might be escorted into north-east Bosnia from Serbia in the east. The reconnaissance showed that that would involve the need to cross too many front lines. It was decided that the delivery of aid would need to go with the ethnic grain to the greatest possible extent, not against it. The French and Canadian battalions reached similar conclusions in their own reconnaissances.

We shall be contributing about 65 personnel to the two-star headquarters and about 180 to the national one-star headquarters in Split. Both are providing an essential contribution to the overall UN operation.

The battalion is well equipped for its role, with personal weapons carried by individual service men, and the Warrior and Scimitar armoured vehicles with their 30 mm Rarden cannon. Ninety-six such vehicles have been deployed. The battalion has its integral mortars and anti-tank weapons readily available should the need arise. Our assessment is that those equipments will be sufficient to meet the battalion's needs. And our troops will have the right to defend themselves as well as the means to do so. I can confirm that they will be operating under what are effectively British rules of engagement. I hope that that answers the point that was raised by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East. If anyone were in any doubt as to the effectiveness of those rules, I would draw his attention to an incident which occurred on Saturday 7 November, when a British reconnaissance party travelling in four Land Rovers from Vitez towards Tuzla returned fire when it came under small-arms and, possibly, mortar fire from unidentified assailants.

But we must also remember that the battalion's task is not a projection of force. This is a humanitarian mission and it is no part of the plan for the force to fight its way through opposition in order to deliver its aid. There will be no tanks, artillery or combat air support. That would profoundly alter the essence of the operation. Our troops are there to help bring relief to the suffering, not to add to the fighting. Their rules of engagement allow them to fire in self-defence. Retaliation is expressly forbidden.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: In the event that British troops find themselves in circumstances in which, for their own protection, it is the view of the senior commander that air strikes are necessary, will they be available to him to call down?

Mr. Hamilton: No, they will not. I had hoped to make that clear. That sort of asset will not be available. If the troops find themselves under heavy attack they must use their weapons of self-defence to fight their way out. They must retreat from their positions, or drive through using their self-protection weapons. If they find themselves in this position, that will mean that their negotiated passage has failed—the parties to some agreement have reneged on that agreement. It will mean in effect that the negotiated agreements have come apart. If the troops cannot get an agreement from the warring factions, they will not start out in the first place.

Though the battalion's relief operation is only now about to begin in earnest, with the arrival of the main contingent of the Cheshires, the Royal Irish and the

[Mr. Hamilton]

Lancers and their armoured vehicles, the advance parties of the British contingent have been active in preparing for the task, reconnoitring and preparing routes, establishing bases and getting round the table with local people to ensure that, so far as possible, our contingent gains the co-operation, understanding and respect of all the parties. They have also made a start on the humanitarian task. Over the weekend of 31 October to 1 November they escorted a UNHCR convoy carrying 86 pallets of relief supplies from Split to Vitez, in the aftermath of the fall to the Serbs of the town of Jajce, and the consequent flow of tens of thousands of refugees towards Travnik.

RAF participation in the relief flights to Sarajevo resumed on 10 October, in the light of assurances by the parties about the safety of humanitarian flights. Since the start of the operation in July, the RAF Hercules have flown 205 missions to Sarajevo and have delivered 2,812·5 tonnes of aid. An RN ship is taking part in the NATO and WEU naval monitoring operations in the Adriatic, which are monitoring compliance with the arms embargo against the whole of the former Yugoslavia and the trade sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro. We are also taking part in the operation by the NATO airborne early warning force to support the naval monitoring forces and to monitor compliance with the no-fly zone in Bosnia imposed in Security Council resolution 781.

As well as providing a battalion group, Britain is contributing to the humanitarian effort in many other forms. Our financial contribution is substantial: over £70 million so far, some £41 million of which has been channelled through the European Community and the remainder through the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other international and British relief agencies. All our assistance is carried out in co-operation with international agencies working throughout the area—in particular UNHCR, which is co-ordinating the international community's response to the crisis. Our immediate priority is to provide food and shelter for refugees over this winter. The items for which our funds have been used include 43 trucks and support vehicles and staff operating as part of the UNHCR road delivery operation, running two or three convoys a week to Sarajevo and other areas; £2·6 million worth of medical supplies provided to the World Health Organisation and UNHCR; the provision of specialist personnel, such as medical advisers, logisticians to help plan and operate road convoys and manage the airlift, road engineers and radio operators, and mining and power teams. Our funds have also provided £3 million for the restoration of nine centres to provide winter shelter for up to 20,000 people in the Vitez-Travnik-Zenica area, where the number of refugees has increased following recent fighting.

We are also playing an active part, as president of the EC, in creating a European Community task force for the former Yugoslavia, and have provided and paid for the head of the task force and three other key staff.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): What action are the Government taking to ensure that the almost 2 million refugees who are being driven out of their homes by massacres and ethnic cleansing and who are still in parts of former Yugoslavia will be able to return home? Have the Government finally abandoned their idea of safe havens? There are none inside Bosnia-Herzegovina. If so, what alternative plans do the Government have to ensure that at least most of those people can eventually return home, bearing in mind that the Government are unwilling to enforce any of their humanitarian efforts against Serbian military attack?

Mr. Hamilton: That is a matter of great concern to the United Nations, and it has been discussed in Geneva. The United Nations has always taken the view that it is much better to try to provide a safe haven in the areas from which people originally come than to remove them from the country. Some areas of Bosnia are certainly much safer than others. Our troops will try to remove people from the areas where their lives are most threatened to areas which are relatively safer. The United Nations has always taken this view so that people can return whence they came when the fighting is, as we hope, finally over.

Mr. Meacher: The Minister's answer is manifestly unsatisfactory. I recently spent a week in Yugoslavia. The only area that is "safe" for the 43 per cent. of the population who are Muslims—they form the largest group —is the central corridor, whose size is rapidly being diminished with every day's fighting—as witness the significant recent fall of Jajce. The only other safe part is the tiny pocket of north-west Bosnia known as Bihac.

The Minister must get himself better briefed, because what he is saying does not relate to what is happening on the ground.

Mr. Hamilton: If the hon. Gentleman is trying to persuade the House that there is some simple solution to finding safe havens for 2 million refugees, he is misleading the House. This is an intractable problem, but everything possible will be done to try to help these people reach areas safer than the ones from which they are fleeing. I do not pretend that there is a straightforward solution; nor should the hon. Gentleman.

Finally, though the Government continue to believe that the solution to the refugee problem does not lie in the dispersal of refugees across Europe, we have made clear our commitment to take into this country a share of the highest priority cases. We have already responded to a request of this nature from the International Committee of the Red Cross.

These are the concrete actions that the British Government are taking to help the people of Bosnia, both in the immediate future and for the longer term. My hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and I welcome the opportunity to restate our policy to the House tonight.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): I am sure that all hon. Members have been appalled by some of the answers given by the Minister of State tonight. I should like to deal with some of the questions to which he seemed unable to provide the answers.

The main purpose of any action that we take is to bring the fighting to an end and to get food to the civilian population, both in their homes and in the refugee camps and concentration camps. Some of the Minister's answers leave much to be desired.

The Minister has not dealt with the issue of our acceptance, or non-acceptance, of refugees and the Government seem to be confused about their policy on refugees. That was highlighted recently by the tragic case mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), of the eight-month-old baby who desperately requires emergency surgery, in which the Foreign Office and the Home Office seem to have their lines crossed. Surely we can ask Ministers to consider urgently the possibility of establishing some form of hotline to enable people who are most in need of urgent medical treatment to receive it.

The Minister was asked whether a decision had been made about the refugees who are waiting in buses to come to this country. He gave the shameful answer that six have been allowed in. He tried to redress that shameful statement by saying that we must accept that there are 40,000 Yugoslavs in this country already. They have probably been here since the last war.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I meant that 40,000 refugees had been brought in to the United Kingdom since the conflict began.

Mr. Rogers: I am prepared to be corrected on that, but the Minister should have made it more clear. Whether we accept large numbers or not, we are adopting a shameful role. It is all right for the Minister to argue that it is better to keep people as close to their homes as possible, both partially to negate the aim of ethnic cleansing and to allow for a return when conditions allow. However, that argument was based on the assumption—highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher)—that the refugees will return to their homes fairly quickly. The likelihood of a quick return is rapidly fading and we must tackle the problem in that context and not the one in which it was originally set.

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Does the hon. Gentleman recall that, on the two most successful occasions on which large numbers from Mozambique camped in Malawi and when people from Afghanistan camped in northern Pakistan, the refugees remained in those camps for many years with international and medical support but returned to their homelands with the conclusion of the internal conflicts? Does not the hon. Gentleman consider that that is the most successful way to deal with large numbers of refugees and that that might prove to be the best way to deal with them on this occasion?

Mr. Rogers: The cases that the hon. Gentleman illustrated were completely different from the situation in Yugoslavia. He was talking about two simple political conflicts: once the political situation was resolved, people were able to return. We are talking about an area where ethnic divisions run deep and have been exacerbated during the past few months. No one in his right mind can think that all the refugees—there are about 700,000 in Croatia—are likely to return to Bosnia in the medium term at least. We ought to agree that we cannot allow those people—they are mainly women and children—to live for ever in a limbo or never-never land of camp existence. It is shameful for a civilised country to turn its back on such a problem. Shame on the Government for not dealing with it properly.

If it were felt that we could not accept large numbers of refugees, surely we should increase financial help for countries that are prepared to shoulder their burdens.

Mr. Winnick: Opposition Members at least agree with my hon. Friend. Does he accept that the announcement regarding those 180 refugees was totally unsatisfactory? The Minister is not connected with the Home Office, and he was must reluctant to answer questions on the issues. Should not the Home Secretary come to the House on Tuesday to explain why his Department, and presumably he himself, have taken such a decision? There is mounting concern. Although the war cannot be helped, it does not alter the fact that a relatively small group of people have been caught in a diplomatic battle about whether Austria or Britain will accept them. Many of them are children and are very young and they are living in buses in an isolated place. Surely the least we could do is accept them, instead of which apparently only eight are to be allowed into this country.

Mr. Rogers: I understood that it was only six. I agree, and I am sure that my hon. Friend will press that matter with the Home Secretary.

Mr. Madden: Before my hon. Friend leaves that subject, can he cast any light on why the Foreign Office should abdicate its responsibility on this occasion? In other countries where visa arrangements are in force, entry clearance officers at British overseas posts consider visa applications. Why on earth did not the British post in Vienna decide to issue visit visas to that wretched group of people, who are seeking only to visit the United Kingdom? They are not seeking political asylum or refuge, but merely a six-month stay.

Mr. Rogers: I agree. Perhaps, after the debate, the Minister will be shamed into dealing with that problem urgently tomorrow.

One of the most crucial and agonising decisions to be taken at United Nations, European and local levels is whether we should deploy more military force in the former Yugoslavia. When we contemplate the increase in suffering for the civilian population during the next few months, the decision becomes more acute. As my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said on 25 September:

> "We support the deployment of British troops under UN auspices."—[Official Report, 25 September 1992; Vol. 212, c. 132.]

However, we have consistently argued about the precise role of the British troops in Bosnia, and the rules of engagement under which they will operate, as was highlighted by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) and my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), the Opposition defence spokesman, in the debate on 25 September.

That role has not been clearly explained to the House, although I was encouraged by the remarks of the Minister of State for the Armed Forces—the first time that I have been encouraged in four years of shadowing him in the defence team—to the Select Committee on Defence, when he said:

> "If ever we are going to commit our young servicemen into these situations we must be sure that they have not only the necessary equipment to defend themselves but also allow them to use that equipment."

I am disappointed in the Minister's reply to the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East, who asked whether commanders could call up air strikes. He said, "No, they couldn't." The other part of his answer was more significant: he said, "We don't have the capability."

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

Mr. Rogers: If the Minister looks at the record, he will see that he said, "They did not have them available anyhow". I presume that he meant that the commanders do not have the capability.

Mr. Hamilton: I have to put the record straight, as I have heard enough rubbish from the hon. Gentleman so far. I said that they would not have that capability in theatre, not that they would not have it at all. I want to make it clear that the capability to launch air strikes will not be available to our troops in Bosnia.

Mr. Rogers: I am used to the right hon. Gentleman's personal insults. Other hon. Members will recall that three years ago I accused him, during defence debates, of being part of the conspiracy to export arms to Iraq. I was told that I was making poisonous accusations—not by the Minister, but by Mr. Alan Clark. I was told that I was talking complete nonsense. I am probably one of the few Members of Parliament who can say tonight, with absolute certainty, "I told you so." Even the right hon. Gentleman's insults will not prevent me from speaking the truth.

To return to the issue of troops in Yugoslavia, British troops will be exposed and if the capability is not in the theatre, is it not about time the Minister of State for the Armed Forces put it there?

Mr. Hamilton indicated dissent.

Mr. Rogers: If the Minister is prepared to say that if young British service men come under attack from overwhelming forces he will allow Harriers and Tornados to sit there unused, that will not go down well outside the House. I accept that we do not want to use excessive force; but surely in such a critical situation it should be considered, at least as an option. The Minister shuts his mind to the problem, as he so often does.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the mere fact that the capability was available and could be called on could be a considerable deterrent?

Mr. Rogers: Indeed; I am glad that the hon. and learned Gentleman points that out. For years, the Government have said that deterrence is the basis of their military philosophy, but now deterrence goes out of the window. Perhaps that is because they are under so much pressure that they cannot think straight.

If we are to increase military intervention in the area, it must be done on the basis that the only way to obtain peace is to separate the warring factions by deploying a superior ground force or using air power to take out Serbian heavy weapons, thus creating a more level playing field, as the Bosnians have requested.

The decision on whether those options are feasible could be left to the generals—as a politician, I should hate to interfere in such a decision—but there seems to be an enormous difference even between the generals. Some say that two or three divisions, amounting to 30,000 to 40,000 men, combined with maritime air cover, would be needed and others say that some 500,000 or even more men would be necessary to maintain peace. The opinion on the required force levels seems to depend on whether one supports intervention.

We should be under no illusion because, as soon as either of those enhanced force options is used, the humanitarian assistance presently deployed will go out of the window. I agree with that part of the Minister's speech. If it reaches the point where we are involved in a war, it could have the opposite effect of what we are trying to do in other respects. No one could believe that the Serbs would sit back and accept that form of intervention. Whatever intervention is used, whether air strikes or ground forces, the present suffering among the civilian population will be as nothing compared to the direct and indirect suffering that will result from aggressive military intervention.

Even assuming that such intervention is feasible and effective, what happens next? Are we prepared to maintain a standing army in the area indefinitely? As soon as we pull it out, we all know that the fighting will start again.

For some people, military intervention may be morally desirable at this stage, but I doubt whether it is a solution to the complex problems, which, as the Minister rightly said, can only be resolved politically.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): Will my hon. Friend comment on the Minister's reference to safe havens, which seems to be his only practical suggestion to deal with the refugee problem? Is not the basis of any idea of safe havens that they be safe? They cannot be safe in Bosnia if they are protected only by Bosnians who are not well armed, so if safe havens are to be a policy, should not that policy be safeguarded by United Nations troops?

Mr. Rogers: I must confess that I cannot give an expert opinion on the safe havens issue, which was dealt with by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West. I understand from my hon. Friend that the geographical location of safe havens will be extremely difficult in Bosnia and they may not be available as an option to save lives.

Apart from using large-scale military force, only one other practical measure is available to us—sanctions. That is why I welcome, in the Government amendment, the reference to sanctions and the Minister's statement that the Government will at last tighten up on them. They are supposed to have been in place for months and the Minister has virtually acknowledged that they have not been maintained.

In the past few weeks, I have heard people say that sanctions do not work. Normally, they say that as a preface to arguing for armed intervention. They are absolutely right—sanctions do not work if they are not enforced. We are seeing a flagrant breach of sanctions that were first agreed by the European Community and then reinforced by resolution 713 and subsequent resolutions of the UN Security Council. The bans on trade and the supply of weapons have been continually ignored. Mandatory sanctions have not been taken seriously and there is ample evidence that convoys of barges are using the Danube to take strategic materials into Serbia, as well as using land routes from the south and east.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) said in an intervention, today's Financial Times contains an article by Laura Sibler on how sanctions are being busted and strategic materials are getting through to Serbia. It is no good thinking that we are not involved in or responsible for that matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) raised that matter with the Department of Trade and Industry and was told that import-export trade statistics for the Yugoslav republics were not even available. I understood that we were at least monitoring trade, even if we were doing nothing to stop it. I hope that, in a couple of years' time, the ex-Prime Minister and ex-Defence Ministers will not say, "It is nothing to do with me, guvnor. Don't blame me, because I didn't know anything about it. Nobody told me" —just as they are now saying about the arms deals with Iraq.

We have held the European Community presidency for the past six months and have been in a unique position to insist that sanctions be enforced and properly monitored. But, yet again, the Government have failed lamentably. If sanctions are not given a chance to work, the argument against military intervention is substantially weakened. The crux of the matter is that if we allow those war profiteers to make their pound of flesh out of innocent civilians now, pretty soon they will make a pound of flesh out of British troops, too. We want the mandatory sanctions against Serbia to be enforced rigorously by a more effective monitoring of the River Danube and other land access routes into Serbia.

However difficult it may be to enforce sanctions, it will be much easier than attempting to apply a military solution. Even a ring of steel would be a much cheaper option than the cost of placing an army in Bosnia, not only financially but in the saving of human life and misery.

The heart of the matter is the intended acquisition of land by force, the physical and ethnic cleansing of areas ahead of a peace settlement. The acquisition of land of recognised neighbouring sovereign states is against the prime underlying ethics of civilised relationships and international law. That is why we must continually make it clear that boundaries between states or new states created by ethnic cleansing will not be internationally recognised. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) said last August, a state based on such an obscene and uncivilised policy should be treated as an outlawed state and should be given no legitimacy in the world community.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Most hon. Members would echo the concluding words of the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), although for reasons that I shall seek to explain some other parts of his speech were less easy to agree with. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) who opened the debate performed a signal service for the House with an admirable speech. He and his colleagues are to be congratulated on choosing this horrific subject for their Supply day debate.

When we turn our attention, as we do all too rarely, to the disintegration of the former Yugoslavia, I feel an overwhelming sadness. All hon. Members have certain events seared into their memories. Some of my formative searing experiences were as a small boy seeing the Pathé news reels of Belsen and as a sixth former seeing the dreadful carnage in Budapest in 1956 and feeling at the time that everything possible must be done to ensure that such events never recur to deface the European continent. In the former Yugoslavia we are seeing a re-run of events as horrific as both of those.

No one could have been unmoved on reading the terrible accounts relayed by extraordinarily brave journalists from the former Yugoslavia. It is fitting for the House to pay tribute to those journalists, many of whom have lost their lives in bringing home to us what has been going on. The free world's response has been inadequate. I have felt that from the time before the Serbian forces started to shell Dubrovnik about a year ago. I felt then, and I feel now, that firm and concerted action might well have prevented the events in Bosnia. Some of us said that those events could and would take place but certain actions were ruled out.

The hon. Member for Rhondda spoke appositely about deterrence. A country with a weapon or a force that is viewed as a deterrent does not announce to the world that it will never use it. That was my party's consistent criticism of Labour's position on the nuclear deterrent. It was not that we were warmongers or that we viewed with anything other then abhorrence the possibility of using it, but we did not rule that out. Unfortunately, when Milosevic and his warlords in and outside Serbia got to work, the west—the free world, including the European Community—ruled out force.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) speaks with great knowledge and authority about Serbia, but I would say to him that if we had been prepared to bomb munition factories and take some tough, surgical action against Serbia about a year ago and had mounted a naval blockade of Dubrovnik, we might have avoided the subsequent carnage. I make no apology for saying that again.

We cannot undo what has been done, but surely we can learn some lessons, one of which is to eschew ambivalence. It is incomprehensible for any member of the Government to speak as if there can be neutrality between a fire brigade and a fire or between an aggressor and those who are being victimised. I do not suggest that no atrocities have been committed by Croatians or Bosnians because there is evidence of some, but the overwhelming evidence is that the massacres, the carnage and the destruction of a nation's heritage in Croatia and Bosnia have been the work of the Serbs.

Last week I attended a concert in the Royal Festival hall in aid of Dubrovnik. More than 3,000 people came to show their dismay at the destruction of one of Europe's prime cultural sites. Who destroyed it? It was not the Croatians. Serbia has persistently been the aggressor. Again I make no apology for referring to the video that was sent to us about eight weeks ago. It came from a rather improbable source which I think was the Sunday Sport. That video made the most appalling viewing. It showed trays of young men's genitals, and a woman being disembowelled to find out whether she was pregnant with a boy or girl. It is horrible to speak about such things, but one must do so to bring home the enormity of such happenings.

We cannot and should not for a moment seek to suggest that there is any equality of culpability between the Serbs and the rest because there is not. I am sure that many people in Serbia are as appalled and disgusted as hon. Members at the events there. Many of them would like to replace their present regime with one approximating to the system that we enjoy. However, the Serbian regime is culpable. That is why I find it so difficult to understand why we are unable to guarantee an air exclusion zone.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East asked some extremely pertinent questions. While I have great regard and affection for my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces who responded, I do not think that his response was adequate. It was a case of ruling something out, and we should not do that. The UN peacekeeping force includes our young men.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): My hon. Friend may be confusing two different propositions. The proposition advanced by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) dealt with the deployment of aircraft in support of the United Kingdom troops in Bosnia. My hon. Friend speaks about an air exclusion zone, which is a quite different proposition. I shall refer to it in my winding-up speech.

Mr. Cormack: I was happy to give way but my right hon. and learned Friend intervened a little too early. The point made several times in the debate is that British troops are on the ground in Bosnia as part of the UN force. A few weeks ago we were told that only 1,800 would be required, but that estimate has been increased by almost 1,000 to 2,658 according to the latest figures. If that force is subjected to unprovoked air aggression, it must be defended from the air and not left to defend itself from the ground.

Mr. Hogg: I think that that is a slightly different issue and I am sorry that there is confusion. Perhaps I am responsible for it. A breach of the United Nations resolution on a no-fly zone would raise different questions. I do not think that the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East raised that matter, but I shall deal with it in my winding-up speech. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces was entirely right in what he said about United Kingdom forces and prospective air power. There is a different answer if the Serbs use air power in breach of the United Nations Security Council resolution.

Mr. Cormack: If there is a different answer to be given, I am mightily relieved. What I believe to be clear, and what seemed clear in what the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East said, is that it is crucial that our forces are given every necessary protection. If my right hon. and learned Friend is saying that that is the case, I thank him for it, and I am delighted by it.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his polite observations about me. I made two points about air power. First, as the United Nations has declared an air exclusion zone but has not yet willed the means to enforce it, I asked whether it makes any sense to have a zone that one is not willing to enforce. Secondly, I asked whether, if the lives of those in the British force were at risk, the senior commander would have the right to call down air forces to protect it.

Mr. Cormack: I concur with the hon. and learned Gentleman's two points. It seems that we now have at least a partial assurance on one of them from my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister. As he said, he will develop that point when he winds up, and I am sure that we shall all be listening with great interest to what he has to say.

Mr. Hogg: I should rather say it later.

Mr. Cormack: I should prefer that as well, having already given way three times in quick succession. The House would be at one in expecting that the United Nations, having willed the troops on the ground, would will the means to defend them. I think also that the House would be at one in expecting any British commander to have flexible options, and not be leading his troops with one arm tied behind his back.

Mr. Macdonald: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cormack: I shall give way once more, but interventions make for long speeches.

Mr. Macdonald: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, because this is an important point. I understand that the Government are now saying that, whereas British forces on the ground would not be able to call in air support to defend themselves from attack on the ground, they would be able to call in air support to protect themselves from attack from the air, such attack being in breach of the United Nations exclusion zone. One wonders whether that principle could be extended to the civilian populations on the ground to protect them from attack from the air.

Mr. Cormack: The hon. Gentleman moves us on, and I am glad to be moved on. I hope that we shall have a clear, definitive answer, deployed with all the forensic skills for which my right hon. and learned Friend is renowned, when he winds up. I agree with the hon. Gentleman and I would go on to say that there is still an overwhelming case for using strategic strikes against the aggressor, in the air or in Serbia. We should not rule that out.

I return to the deterrent point. We should not tell any potential enemies that we shall rule out anything. We should keep them guessing. We should continue to apply sanctions and try to make them as effective as possible as quickly as possible. We should try to deal with the Danube problem—a very real problem. After all, we did not rule out that option—indeed, we deployed it fairly quickly—when another sovereign state was overwhelmed in July 1990. Whether we like it or not, Bosnia was recognised as a sovereign state. There are those in the House—I pay proper tribute to them—who did not like that fact. Nevertheless, it has been so recognised, since the beginning of this year, by all the countries of the European Community and many beyond.

Therefore, we have an obligation to do something to ensure that this new nation, which we have recognised, is not completely dismembered. It is already pretty close to being dismembered. The figures are horrendous—2 million refugees, and people who are not given to exaggeration talk of perhaps 400,000 perishing in the ice and snow this year. If that happens, as it so easily could, it will be a damning indictment of us all.

My right hon. and learned Friend should not close his eyes, nationally, as part of the European Community or as part of the United Nations. I am not talking about massive involvement. I have never done so, and nor have people like the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), who is nodding now. I am talking about the sort of action that Lord Owen was advocating until the very day that he became the United Nations mediator. I am talking about the sort of action advocated by Baroness Thatcher of Kesteven, to whom my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces was such an assiduous Parliamentary Private Secretary for so long.

I urge my right hon. and learned Friend not to rule out that option entirely. What is happening in Bosnia is utterly shameful. Both the motion tabled by the Liberal Democrats and the Government amendment refer to Kosovo and Macedonia. We all know that terrible things are happening in Kosovo, as they are in Macedonia, although what is happening in Kosovo has been more widely reported. People are being excluded from their schools and colleges, being harried from their homes and being ill treated. The cauldron is boiling and it might boil over. If it did, we could find ourselves facing a full-scale Balkan war, a war that could involve Albania, Bulgaria and two NATO countries—Greece and Turkey—on opposite sides.

We must not rule out any option because, above all, that war is what we must deter. We cannot bring back the tens of thousands who have already been slaughtered or massacred. We cannot restore the tens of thousands maimed. We cannot, overnight, put together the families that have been shattered and dispersed. But we can do something to deter the warlords and others from plunging Macedonia and Kosovo into similar hardship and strife.

Mr. Rogers: The hon. Gentleman said earlier that we should anticipate these conflicts and perhaps, if we had done so, they might not have escalated as they have in Bosnia. As I understand it, there are eight missions in Bosnia, including those from Norway and the United States. Would it not be appropriate—and perhaps the Minister can deal with this point—to put more missions and more monitoring in the area and perhaps to anticipate the problems that the hon. Gentleman is so graphically describing?

Mr. Cormack: That might well be the case. Firmness and resolution in dealing with the acute problem before us now will be the best deterrent to those who are tempted to tread this appalling path to devastation and destruction.

It is not just that. Those people, many of whom thought before the war broke out that they had been liberated from communism and totalitarianism, looked to the free world. They aspired to what they thought were the values that had been withheld from them. The problem is not just there. As we speak, all over the former Soviet Union there are cauldrons simmering—for example, terrible things are happening in Georgia, although we do not see them nightly on our television screens.

The firmness, resolve and effectiveness with which the European Community and the free world in general deal with the problem of the former Yugoslavia will have a significant effect on what does or does not happen elsewhere. The world is a far more dangerous place than it was before the wall and the iron curtain came down. I rejoice that they are down and that the cold war is ended.

But the new situation calls for great statesmanship, vision and resolution. Although I pay tribute to what Ministers have sought to do, we have not been effective enough and there is no point in pretending that we have. I hope that a stiffening of resolve will emerge from this debate.

It is also important to consider the position of the British infantry. I make no apology for raising this matter, which I touched upon in September. We are extremely fortunate in the way in which we are served by our armed forces. Their versatility, professionalism and cool courage is an example to us all, yet they are thin on the ground. Since "Options for Change" was published, many of us, some with a territorial interest—I do not apologise for my interest in the Staffordshire Regiment—have said time and again that we are stretching the infantry too far. That fear has been backed up by military men of immense experience and prestige, as was illustrated by the recent letter to The Times from Field Marshal Lord Bramall.

In September we were told that the number of men to be sent to Yugoslavia would be limited to 1,800; 2,658 troops are now there. I do not object to that. It might be necessary to increase that number to 3,000 and I would not object to that either. But we have Northern Ireland, and events in this capital city at the weekend have reminded us that that problem will not go away. There are other trouble spots in the world.

We will not lightly be forgiven if we deprive ourselves of the means of defence, but the infantry is being stretched to a dangerous degree. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence will review this issue. He has already said that he will if circumstances change and, through my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, I should like to tell him that those circumstances have changed, are changing, and will continue to do so. I make no apology for urging, once more, that reconsideration.

Apart from the expressions of total revulsion and absolute sympathy, I hope that what comes out of this debate will be a determination to do everything that we can to bring this conflict to a close. I agree with the hon. Member for Rhondda that we cannot do that by massive intervention on the ground, and I have not advocated and will not advocate that, but we can do it by a demonstration of resolve and by a refusal to forgo weapons that we have every right to consider using. I hope that when my right hon. and learned Friend replies to the debate he will recognise that.

Ms. Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): I agree with practically everything that the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) said. At the risk of upsetting some of my colleagues, I congratulate the Liberal Democrats on using this opportunity to discuss this serious topic.

Terrible events are taking place in the heart of Europe, and I was appalled not just at the banality of the Government's amendment, but by the speech of the Minister of State for the Armed Forces. There was a note of complacency in it and an almost total acceptance not just of what has happened but of what is likely to happen in the coming months in Yugoslavia. We as politicians, not just of the House, but of the European Community and the world, must take collective blame for what has happened. We must accept that blame because we have stood by, as a nation, and watched nothing less than the extinction of another nation and its cultural identity, the nation of Bosnia.

More than one third of a million civilians are trapped in Sarajevo alone, without food, electricity or running water. We all know that they are dying daily, and we must recognise that, apart from fine words, fine intentions and some belated military help with humanitarian aid, they are dying because this country and the rest of the EC have refused to intervene. I do not believe that we have used our position as a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council to support the initiatives aimed at confronting Serbian militarism.

[Ms. Kate Hoey]

Consider the publicity that was devoted to the London peace conference in August and what was supposed to come out of it. At that conference the Prime Minister named Serbia as the chief instigator of atrocities and territorial aggression in the region. He claimed success in reaching specific agreements that guaranteed the integrity and security of Bosnia and its people. What has happened to those agreements? We were told that the sieges of towns and cities would be soon lifted, but that has not happened. We were told that there would be international supervision of the use of heavy weapons, but that has not happened. We were also told that there would be a ban on military flights, but no air exclusion zone has been observed. The promise to enforce sanctions on the Danube has not been fulfilled.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On the question of the air exclusion zone, we have no evidence of any combat mission having been flown since 12 October. We believe that, at the moment at least, the no-flight regime has been observed for combat missions.

Ms. Hoey: The Minister may say that, but that is not exactly what has happened. I believe that the air exclusion zone has not been monitored and has not been observed.

The agreement on the creation of an international criminal court has not been realised. I accept that some civilians have been released from detention camps, but just as some have been released, some have been imprisoned. We heard many fine words at that peace conference, but we have seen little action. In some ways Britain has even obstructed the UN in carrying out initiatives aimed at enforcing the agreements reached in London.

A lot of the blame must rest with the Foreign Office, which has continued to portray this conflict as a civil war and promoted the myth that all sides are equally to blame. I agree with the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South that anyone who has studied what has happened cannot fail to say that the blame must lie with the Serbians. There have been atrocities committed on all sides, but the systematic atrocities carried out by the Serbians must be recognised.

Civilians will get hurt in all wars, but all the evidence points to the fact that the Serbians have a deliberate and calculated policy of targeting civilians. Their policy is to kill them in sufficient numbers to make others run away. I do not believe that that is war; it is terrorism on a scale unprecedented in Europe since the Nazis.

It is equally clear that journalists have been targeted by the Serbians. I am sure that all hon. Members would want to pay tribute to the fine work done by television and newspaper journalists. Without their reports we would be unaware of some of the terrible atrocities that have occurred.

If we allow Bosnia-Herzegovina to be destroyed, I believe that all hope for the survival of democracy and decency in that part of the world will end. Britain has some responsibility and must take action; there is still much to be done. I may be out of line with some of my Front-Bench colleagues, but I believe that Britain should act to lift the UN arms embargo on Bosnia. I do not believe that it is right that Bosnians are dying because they have no weapons to defend themselves. They are literally being killed because they have no opportunity to get the weapons that they need to defend themselves. There is no point in sending in the military to ensure that food aid gets through to the people of Sarajevo only for those people to be killed a few days later. We should get the United Nations to lift the arms embargo on Bosnia.

We should be pressing for selective air strikes against the artillery and other heavy weapons of the former Yugoslav army. I agree that we do not want a wholesale military presence in the area, but, as other hon. Members have said, if when we saw the pictures of what was happening in Dubrovnik selective action had been taken, that might have deterred the Serbians from doing what they then did in Sarajevo. If we do not learn a lesson from that, there will be an escalation in the conflict in that area. I am also worried about what is happening in Kosovo. If the Serbians knew that we were prepared to take action, it might deter them from going further.

The greatest priority is to save the citizens in Sarajevo. That is essential for the survival of Bosnia's physical and cultural identity. Last year, almost 30 per cent. of Bosnians married people from different religious groups. That is good evidence of the tolerance that has sustained Bosnia's character and identity for centuries. It must be protected from the nationalism and ethnic cleansing that threaten not only that region but the peace and security of Europe.

Will the Minister say how much more Serbian aggression the Government will allow before they are prepared to take action? I supported our actions in the Gulf war in support of Kuwait, so I cannot justify Britain doing nothing about what is happening in central Europe. I hope that the debate will bring to the forefront the need for action. We must not sit back and allow more people to die. If we do not take action, in a year's time the conflict will spread throughout Europe. We could stop that happening, but currently the Government are refusing to do so.

Will the Minister answer some of the questions asked by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) which were not answered by the Minister of State for the Armed Forces? I hope that the debate will bring us a little nearer to the end of a conflict that we cannot allow to continue.

8.52 pm

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): Although I agree with most of what has been said about the dreadful conflict in the former Yugoslavia, I want to concentrate my remarks on the refugees issue. I am concerned that we are thinking only about refugees in the former Yugoslavia and not taking the wider context into account. The problems in that area are repeated throughout the world, so it is wrong that the House should concentrate on the Yugoslav refugees.

What about the Sikhs in the Punjab, where there is also ethnic cleansing and the worst sort of brutality? To follow on the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), there is also murder, rape and pillage in the Punjab. Other than when I have raised the matter through Adjournment debates, I cannot remember the issue being raised on the Floor of the House, and certainly not by either of the two main Opposition parties. I remind the House that all that is happening in a former Commonwealth country which has a direct relationship with us. It is not a country in Europe which, if I may put it this way, has no direct connection with Britain.

The worldwide problems are caused by civil wars. I understand that there are currently 44 conflicts throughout the world. The problems of refugees arise from the economic chaos that is rife the length and breadth of Africa. Many African countries are former Commonwealth countries, but no one is as concerned about them as about Yugoslavia.

Many people are moving around the world in search of safer and better lives, but that is not the reason for our refugee legislation. There are problems in Romania, Iran, Iraq, Vietnam, Afghanistan, Somalia, Zaire, Uganda and Sri Lanka—and of course, the whole of the Soviet Union is breaking up. Countries are worried about refugees. France is worried about Algeria and Spain about north Africa and the border that allows refugees directly to enter Spain. Portugal is worried about the refugee problem in Macau, where people can apply for a full European passport. Germany has a problem because 250,000 refugees arrived there last year and a further 500,000 are expected this year from eastern Europe, Turkey, Afghanistan, Africa and, now, the former Yugoslavia. The anger of Germans has nothing to do with Nazi thugs—everyone is opposed to them.

Sir Russell Johnston: Surely there is a difference between economic refugees, of which the hon. Gentleman rightly says there are many, and people who have been burnt out of their homes.

Mr. Dicks: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point, but as I said earlier, people are suffering those same conditions in the Punjab, yet there is apparently no concern in the House about that. The Government show no concern about it in their relationship with India. It has been happening since long before the events in the former Yugoslavia, but no one cares. People are concerned about the former Yugoslavia—it is the in thing. I have almost 10,000 Sikhs in my constituency who ask, "Why the concern? We know what is happening in Yugoslavia and we do not want it to continue, but where is the concern about what has happened to our relatives in our country?"

If the refugees going to Germany are granted asylum status, they can move wherever they wish around the EEC. They could come to Britain if they so wanted—and many of those seeking that status in Europe might want to do that. We must consider the position facing Britain before we think of taking hundreds, thousands or even millions of refugees.

It takes up to three years to determine a claim. Between 1984 and 1990, 2,700 people from India applied for asylum. None was granted it because apparently none qualified, but 47 per cent.—more than 1,200—were allowed to stay because it took so long to process their applications. That can only encourage people to apply for asylum and to make bogus applications.

There are already some 4,200 people from Somalia in this country of whom 665 are seeking asylum status. Those 4,200 people came here as visitors or students. I am sure that the House is aware of the fact that, whatever the circumstances, they will not be sent back. I find that rather surprising. There were 50,000 applications for asylum in Britain last year and there could be even more this year.

During the past two years 106 unaccompanied children arrived at Heathrow in my borough of Hillingdon, which has had to find them accommodation and educate and feed them. So far, it has cost my local authority £1 million, but there has been no help from the Government.

On the specific matter of the former Yugoslavia, a parliamentary answer shows that in the year ending August 1992, 50,800 people from that area were given leave to enter Britain, mainly as visitors or students—but with the implicit understanding that they would not be sent back. A further 500 have applied for asylum. That makes nearly 52,000 refugees already from the former Yugoslavia who have nipped in rather quietly knowing that, whatever happens, they will not have to return.

I appeared on a television programme with a 19-year-old refugee who said, "I don't want to go back home. I get £30 a week and my accommodation paid for. I will not return, even if the situation changes." Who can blame him? He was allowed entry for a course that he has now given up, and he just wants to stay.

I hate to use the word "do-gooders" in this context, but one must question the actions of those who believe that it is a good idea to take empty coaches to a border and to return to Britain with refugees. I thought that a refugee was someone who sought refuge—and that the first place to do that was immediately outside the troubled area. However, some people are bussing refugees through two or three countries, which causes problems for others. One newspaper report states:

> "Dover, perhaps unusually, has never had a major refugee problem. But three weeks ago 250 people arrived in a convoy of coaches from Bosnia, brought by a voluntary group based in Leeds."

Two days before they arrived, the authorities were told that they were going to apply for political asylum, and that entitled them to the full range of benefits—housing, social security, health and legal aid. A council spokesman said:

> "It is all very laudable for these people to bring people in, but they haven't thought out who will foot the bill."

The Sikhs in my constituency might well say, "This seems to be the game to play now. We will charter a plane to India and bring out a few thousand Sikhs over a period of time." Another interested group might say, "The real issue is Somalia, so we will take a plane there and bring out some refugees." Another group could say, "We will take a few coaches to eastern Europe and bring refugees back to Dover."

If such people arrive at a port, existing law on asylum allows them entry. The individuals who bussed refugees in from Bosnia have been in touch with the Home Office, and it is sending extra staff to the ports to cope with the situation. Laudable though such actions by do-gooders and members of the chattering classes may be, they have not thought through the consequences if every group having an interest abroad starts to do the same.

With the exception of one child who is likely to be adopted by an eminent ITN reporter, refugees will not be sent to Surrey, Berkshire, Buckinghamshire or Hampshire. Instead, they will stay near their port of entry and move to inner-city areas that already have problems. Local authorities will have to cope and local residents—through direct taxes and the council tax—will have to pay the bill.

Most right hon. and hon. Members have problems with housing waiting lists in their constituencies. I certainly do. When refugees arrive, my constituents say, "Hang on, Mr. Dicks—we have been waiting for years for a transfer or for accommodation. We feel sorry for refugees, but they should be helped nearer their own countries and not be brought to Britain to occupy accommodation meant for us." It may be wonderful to drop refugees off at Dover or Leeds and let someone else take responsibility for them, but all right hon. and hon. Members have an obligation to their constituents. They must always come first and last. I would not mind so much if there were any spare facilities.

As to the churches and vicars who encourage such action, how many of them are using their church halls to accommodate refugees, and how many archbishops have handed over their palaces for that purpose? I shall be surprised and delighted if one of them is accommodating a refugee family. I make this challenge to the Church—before it starts saying all those wonderful words, it should open its doors first and feed and clothe the refugees, and then it will not be denying a citizen of this country his or her right to housing.

We should seriously consider redrafting the 1951 United Nations convention on refugees, because it was never designed to cope with the present situation or with economic refugees from Vietnam and Africa. Neither was it meant to cope with thousands of refugees from the former Yugoslavia and the former Soviet Union. That convention was never meant to put pressure on the developed world. Its wording and the responsibilities that it imparts are out of date. I want the Government to persuade the United Nations to rewrite that convention, to control not just the arrival of refugees but their departure.

Those who, in their unworldly way, encourage refugees to come to this country should also be prohibited by legislation from encouraging people to seek refuge here after travelling through two or three other countries, when there may be safe refuge just outside their own borders. People must be told that they cannot continue to exercise their conscience and make themselves feel good when sitting by the fire at night—not taking anyone in themselves, but expecting everyone else to do so.

We should certainly provide help and support in the countries concerned and just outside their borders. The safe haven concept is best, and we must do all that we can to encourage it. If neighbouring countries want to take in thousands of refugees that is their business, not ours.

The people of Britain have had enough: they have done their share. They are saying, "Hang on—are we going to be a soft touch again?" Everyone else wants to shout about it; as I have said, the chattering classes want to do something. But the working-class chap in the street, who pays his taxes, wonders what the hell is going on in this country. It seems to him that every time there is a problem somewhere and people want to move from that area—for whatever reason—good old Britain is the place for them to go.

My young daughter, her husband and their three children must be pushed down the waiting list because of the stupid Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, and the fact that having to cope with refugees means that newcomers are placed at the top of the list. Old-age pensioners in my constituency could do with a bigger pension, but have had to accept increases in line with inflation; meanwhile people come here from nowhere, and are literally given everything that they require to live a good life. I am not saying that there is not a reason for that, but let it not happen in this part of the world again. Let us be realistic: we have done our share. We are not a soft touch. We are not the dustbin of the world, to which people should come when everything else has gone wrong.

If the Government and the House continue to take the same view, we are likely to see the same dreadful developments that have been seen in Germany. Thank God we have no Le Pen in this country now. Many people are saying that they are sick and tired of being taken for a ride, and, if we continue to allow refugees to enter this country—as I have said, they go to the tough working-class areas around the ports and in the inner cities—we shall experience the civil strife that has taken place in Germany, France and Italy. I do not want that, but the only way to stop it is to control what is happening, rather than saying, "Wonderful Britain must open all the doors and let everyone in."

9.5 pm

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) and his colleagues on arranging this evening's debate. I am sorry that more debates have not taken place on the issue.

As time is now short, I shall concentrate on the key points. According to the motion, the record of the European Community and the Foreign Office on Yugoslavia has consistently been "too little and too late".

That is putting it mildly. In my view, the actions of the Foreign Office and the Community in the earlier stages of the crisis contributed significantly to the outbreak of fighting, to its continuation and to the form that it took. People could see what would happen in Bosnia from the moment that trouble started in Knin and around Krajina: it was obvious and predictable. Rather than preventing it, however, we took action that, if anything, encouraged it.

We see the same picture of people sitting back and waiting for the next conflict to erupt when we look at reports of pressure on Muslims in Sandzak, troubles in Kosovo and continuing problems throughout Macedonia. The tinder is there; but, rather than defusing the situation, we seem to be sitting back. I am particularly concerned about Macedonia, which is currently in limbo. We seem to have put it on ice, as it were, so that it can sit and wait until its neighbours are ready to carve it up.

Before war broke out in Bosnia, Milosevic clearly signalled his desire to do a deal with his neighbours to carve up Bosnia. Now he is signalling his desire to do the same with Macedonia. What will we do about that? At present, the Macedonian administration satisfied the normal criteria for recognition, and it is clear that Macedonia would be recognised but for the problems caused by the Greeks. The Greeks had some legitimate concerns, which have been met. What concerns us now is Greek ambition, together with Serb and, perhaps, Bulgarian ambition. We should seriously consider recognising Macedonia; if we are not prepared to do that, we should make it abundantly clear that we will not tolerate any forcible intervention by other parties in Macedonia. We should make our feelings very clear to the Greeks.

We have intervened in Bosnia rather belatedly, and I am concerned about the manner of our intervention. The present intervention strikes me as incoherent. United Nations troops could have been sent in in the normal way to supervise agreed ceasefire lines. At the other end of the scale, we could have intervened to impose our will on the situation by compelling the combatants to move back to the lines that we considered appropriate. We are told, however, that that is not what is happening. It seems that we are intervening somewhere in the middle, but the position is not entirely clear. We are deceiving ourselves if we imagine that our current intervention is, or can be, limited to so-called humanitarian work.

Sieges are taking place everywhere. To supply food to besieged people is intervention on behalf of the besieged persons and will be perceived by the besiegers as the provision of military aid. In some circumstances, food is a weapon. Our intervention, therefore, is effectively on one side. We pretend to ourselves that we are not intervening. That is foolish and is likely to end in greater trouble.

We cannot, however, walk away from the problem. We cannot allow the war to continue, sit back and let the people fight it out among themselves. That might have been okay in 1912 or 1913, but it is not okay in a world where there is the United Nations, and it is not okay in a Europe where there are the various agreements about the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe. I suppose that in some way we are trying to vindicate the CSCE.

The debate has concentrated so far on the means of exerting pressure, whether it be diplomatic, economic or limited military involvement. I agree with what was said by the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) about not forswearing certain action and making sure that there is a credible military capability available to be used, if only to keep people guessing.

We have to think hard about our objective. I said earlier that the intervention was incoherent. It does not seem to me to have any clear objective in mind. We must start to think about what our objective is and then work back from that to see what are the appropriate means of achieving it. Having a clear objective in this case means having a view about the desired outcome. Through this whole debate, the British Government and the other European Governments seem to have been incredibly coy about the desired outcome. That must be spelt out. We must be clear about it, and then we can look at the ways and means.

9.11 pm

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I welcome the fact that the debate is taking place. I welcome also the way in which it has been conducted—soberly and with considerable reflection. The debate has been distinguished by no rancour having been shown on either side of the House. That is important.

This is an emotional issue. I must declare right away that I support the Government amendment, but the motion reflects the tension and anger that we feel about the slaughter and atrocities in that region. It reflects our awareness of the impending horror of the forthcoming winter and the feeling of total revulsion about the continuation of ethnic cleansing.

At times, however, the House tries to blame the wrong party. It is easy to blame the Government, because they are there. Nevertheless, we bear in mind that the Government have agonised long and hard about how to perform our role in the Balkans. We are very much aware of the Prime Minister's anguish. He was anxious to make his contribution—hence the London peace conference. He made a firm stand by condemning Serbia for the atrocities. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was keen that Lord Carrington should play a role in the European Community peace initiative. He, of course, was followed by Lord Owen. The British Government were anxious to ensure that we provided an honourable deployment of troops.

It is remarkable that this country has contributed 2,600 troops to the area, out of a total force of 6,000. That is a larger share, in proportion to our responsibilities, than has been provided by any other country. That ought to be recognised when anybody suggests that the Government are taking no action, are flaccid and are unwilling to act.

I share everybody's concern about the refugee problem. We must remember that 40,000 refugees have already made their way to this country. I know that passions are aroused over refugees. I have declared in the House on a previous occasion that my mother is Serbian. I remember that after the last war Serbian refugees came to this country, fleeing from oppression and totalitarianism in communist Yugoslavia. So I know how important it is to ensure that we give refugees the right welcome.

I take issue with the Government on one matter: although it is quite honourable and correct to say that we must try to encourage refugees to stay close to their home country, we must recognise that there is no safe place for them to hide. It is foolhardy for us to put our heads in the ground and to imagine that if refugees stay there they will be safe later. It is not an easy problem and I am not offering any simple answers. Indeed, there are no simple answers, and it would be false of the Opposition to suggest that there are. We must show some flexibility.

Mr. Rogers: We are not suggesting that.

Lady Olga Maitland: None the less, that impression was given; forgive me if I got the wrong impression.

Mr. Rogers: I never suggested that there was an easy option. I told the Minister that I agreed entirely that the decisions that needed to be taken were extremely complicated and difficult. The hon. Lady is misrepresenting Labour's position.

Lady Olga Maitland: I thank the hon. Gentleman. At least we have been able to clear up the matter to some extent.

I support the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), who was concerned that in deploying our troops we were putting "Options for Change" under strain. I hope that "Options for Change" is not so set in concrete that we cannot take a more flexible view, should the need arise.

I pay tribute to our troops. I have heard wonderful reports of their enthusiasm, professionalism and desire to get up and go and to serve in a humanitarian role, which is a new role for them. Their role is not just to help aid get through to those who are desperate; their mere presence is a comfort to those who are under pressure and it is tempting for them to hope that our troops would open fire on their behalf. It is important that we keep a clear head about what we expect of our troops. We cannot confuse their humanitarian work with what I call their pro-active fighting work: the two do not mix. As hon. Members have said, if our troops were involved in more than self-defence, there would be consequences for the civilians whom they are trying to protect. It is easy to say, "We must do something and fight at all costs", but it is important to realise the consequences: for example, the Red Cross could not continue to supply aid, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees would be affected and there would be no one to protect the convoys.

It is important that we get our priorities right. The United Nations is saying, "Let us put lives before guns as we face a cold winter." We must also consider air strikes. What kind of air strikes are we talking about? Air strikes may encourage more fighting.

We definitely have not reached the point where we can say "No, never" to any other course of action. We must monitor the situation and reconsider it in six months. I take the point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South about the art and meaning of deterrence. History shows that it can work, and it could work again. The message that we must send to the Serbians is that unacceptable damage could be inflicted—I am not saying definitely, because that is the art of deterrence—and that, despite what they think, they may not get away with it so much in the future. That is an international decision, not a United Kingdom decision. We must realise that there are agonies that the whole Community will have to face.

I understand the sense of frustration. I remember that, when the first break-up of the former Yugoslavia began, my mother, who is a Serb and realistic about what is happening, said, "Remember 1914. It will all explode all over again. Somehow we shall have to alert people to the character of the Balkans. The people there are not logical as one would expect people in Europe to be. They have their own culture, their own anger and their own pain. Realise that it is not a problem that will just fade away".

One of the mistakes that we made is that we gave the wrong message to the aggressors in Serbia. We sent a message saying, "Perhaps you can get away with your ill-gotten gains." That is the responsibility of the international community and we now have to live with the consequences.

It is important that we back the new endeavours to impose sanctions. It is important that we ensure that they really work and that the Serbians feel the bite and the anger. We must ensure that the people of Yugoslavia realise that their government is at stake. It is important that we ensure that the sanctions work because they have failed so far. The United Nations has become a laughing stock in the sanctions-busting game. To see the Greek oil tankers trundling through is offensive to common decency. I welcome all the endeavours to bring the problem under control.

I conclude on the important point that a political solution is the only solution that will finally work in Yugoslavia. It is, therefore, important that we look hard and clearly at the man who is perpetrating the atrocities and at the man who is the oppressor—Slobodan Milosevic. Milosevic is now under pressure. There will be elections on 20 December. We in the west have a moral duty to back the pro-democracy movement—to back Milan Panic who has so bravely tried to stand up to the man who brought him into power in Yugoslavia.

We should give the pro-democracy movement the moral support it deserves. Representatives from DEPOS —the pro-democracy movement—are coming to London next week. We should be able to say, "Go back to Yugoslavia. You are not forgotten. We back you all the way." There is only one way in which to bring peace in the Balkans. We must ensure that Slobodan Milosevic cannot continue his evil work for the future.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I am sorry that the debate has been so short. We have heard some good speeches, but there is so much more to say and so many more questions to ask.

There are four differences between our motion and the Government amendment. The first is a question of emphasis. The Government congratulate themselves. We say that what they have done is too little and too late. The second is the question of military intervention, especially air strikes, to which various hon. Members have referred. The third is the question of air cover for our troops, in which we might include the issue of the so-called blockades or non-blockades in the Adriatic and on the Danube. The fourth is the question of refugees. I will deal with each in turn, taking up points made by hon. Members on the way. I will turn in conclusion to the question of Kosovo and Macedonia.

When we consider not simply the present dreadful position but the history of the European Community's involvement and the attitudes expressed by the British Government at various stages of the Yugoslavian tragedy, we must realise that to say that the House "congratulates" —the amendment says "notably" congratulates—the Government is extraordinary. The hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) made a quite excellent speech. In his downbeat way, he said that what the Government had done was really rather inadequate—and that was putting it very mildly.

From the very beginning, when I told the Minister of State in May 1991 that the European Community should perhaps take on a mediation role or even provide a peacekeeping force, the Minister said:

> "I do not think that the European Community should play such a role."—[Official Report, 22 May 1991; Vol. 191, c. 919.]

That did not show a great deal of foresight, and it was not very long afterwards that Lord Carrington was appointed.

The British Government also resisted the recognition of Slovenia and Croatia. They suggested that "premature" recognition would worsen the conflict. As Jonathan Eyal, director of studies at the Royal United Services Institute, wrote in The Independent today:

> "Croatia and Slovenia are independent only because they were prepared to fight for their freedom."

Let us face it: the Government—and the European Community—would certainly have been prepared to watch them being crushed by the JNA.

I respond badly to the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, who responded to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), talking once more about factions in what was Yugoslavia. That is a denial of what has happened over the past year and a half. The hon. Member for Staffordshire, South put it very clearly. Of course there have been atrocities by the Croats and there have been atrocities by the Muslims. However, there has been no concerted policy. As far as I am aware, there has been no siege of Serbian towns by Muslims or by Croats. As the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Ms. Hoey) put it extremely effectively, this has by and large been a Serbian war of aggression within Yugoslavia. To try to be even handed about the matter is not to face reality.

The Government amendment significantly does not refer to military intervention one way or the other. However, the Minister of State spoke about it at length. We argued for the use of air power to relieve the siege of Osijek in December 1991. It was clear then where the aggressors were and what they had. The Croats had no heavy guns, tanks or rockets. They were surrounded and were being pounded to pieces, as Vukovar already had been. It would have been possible to use air power then, and if we had used it there would have been no siege of Sarajevo.

Both the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South and the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) said that it was clear very early on to the Serbs that no one was prepared to act to stop them. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fife, North-East made that point when he intervened in the speech of the hon. Member for Rhondda. If one tells an aggressor, "We are not going to do anything to stop you", the aggressor will continue. That is straightforward and simple.

I appeared on one of those ITV "Comment" programmes on 10 June. I said that the situation in Sarajevo had to be stopped and my words echoed those of the hon. Member for Vauxhall. I said:

> "In Sarajevo, people are in the cellars, without electricity, water or food. If you have children, think of what that would be like . . . It is clear that Milosevic only understands force. I think the European Community through the UN now has no alternative but to consider this and most urgently. They should say to Milosevic, 'unless this siege is lifted and the shelling stopped within 48 hours, aircraft from the West will destroy these artillery positions'".

I am not saying that only now; I have said it before. If we had done that then, it would have stopped matters.

Even when we went to the G7 summit in July, only Britain was against even the consideration of military intervention. Mitterrand was in favour, despite the earlier support that the French gave the Serbs, and Kohl was in favour. All right, we know perfectly well that the Germans are excluded by their constitution from external involvement in that way, but they certainly showed in respect of the Gulf that they were prepared to pay, and that is going to change. That constitution was put on them by us, so let us not start blaming them for it.

On the closure of air space, as recently as 15 May the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs wrote to me, saying:

> "I do not think an aerial blockade of Serbia would be right."

That has been the pattern of "too little too late" all along. As has been said, we have, apparently, a holding closure of Bosnian air space. It has not been breached; I do not dispute that. However, we allowed the dropping of cluster bombs by the Bosnian-Serb air force on civilians, and I am sure that we could have prevented it.

Mr. Rogers: That was a point of difference between the Minister and myself. As I understand it, the Minister said that we do not have the capability in the theatre to take such action as is being proposed. The Government should address that matter urgently.

Sir Russell Johnston: I do not think that that is the case, but never mind. Nevertheless, we are now closing air space when that is much less relevant than it was. What is relevant is that, as various hon. Members have pointed out, with the breach of sea space in the Adriatic and up the Danube oil and military hardware have come, and what have we done about that? "Too little, too late" is a fair description. There is certainly no cause for congratulation, far less notable congratulation.

The Government's amendment

> "welcomes Her Majesty's Government's response to the refugee problem".

For a Government who have just introduced a visa system for Bosnia without even the means of getting visas, who have taken in only a comparatively small number and who have not made any direct contribution—although I accept that they have made a contribution through the European Community and refugee organisations to poor countries such as Croatia and Hungary who have taken in an enormous number, or, for that matter, given proper credit to the Federal Republic of Germany for its huge contribution of about 260,000 to 270,000—that is terribly complacent. Not much was said about what else would be done. "Sharing" is what we said. The Federal Republic of Germany, as the Minister knows, has suggested that the European Community, of which we are still the President, should try to work out some allocations.

The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) said that there are many refugees in many places all over the world. I know that. One cannot do everything, but that does not preclude the fact that we are concerned that people have been burnt out of their houses and are staggering helplessly through the snow. May I tell the hon. Gentleman what happens in the Federal Republic of Germany? He asked, "Where are they going to go? They are going to congregate around London." The Germans have constructed camps all over the federal republic, and they are related to the size of the towns in question so that the burden is not concentrated in one place. Central Government take responsibility rather than offload it on to the Lander Government. So the hon. Gentleman's was not a reasonable argument.

The hon. Member for Rhondda was right: the action that we are taking is not the action of a country which is rightly proud of its civilisation. The 186 people in buses, of which we are letting in six, who have been mentioned sum up how disgraceful this all is. Rightly, the debate has focused on such people, but they are a tiny drop in a great ocean of misery.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Fife, North-East —[HON. MEMBERS: "He is not right hon."] I am anticipating, perhaps. In any event, my hon. and learned Friend spoke of the dangers and challenges that face British troops. Neither he nor I understands why it is not possible to provide combat air cover, operating out of Italy. Not so long ago we were told that we could counteract vast hordes of Russians, pounding through central Europe. Now we cannot produce the aircraft to take out a few tanks. Strange.

I should like to know about the difference between the British role and that of the French. The British role seems to be exclusively to protect humanitarian convoys in dangerous circumstances brought about especially by the recent push by the Serbs. But in the little north-western enclave of Bihac the French are in the business of keeping out the Serbs—they appear to have a combat role there. That is puzzling, since I had thought that the role of all United Nations forces should be the same. I am not arguing against the French action: I just want to know what the difference is.

The siege of the great cities and the ethnic cleansing must be stopped, and if that means air strikes, so be it.

[Sir Russell Johnston]

Europe has been slow and fearful. My right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown)—he is sitting behind me: one should always be concerned if the leader is sitting behind one—and I visited the heights above Sarajevo and saw the gun emplacements. The Minister said that they could be moved. Of course, they could be, but they can also be pinpointed. The guns stand above the vast bowl in which Sarajevo lies, and I still think that action could be taken against them.

It is certainly hypocrisy to go on about the integrity of Bosnia while allowing it to be gutted. That integrity no longer exists—or hardly. The Evening Standard tonight says:

> "They were a pitiful sight on the road to Travnik, now the only town between the British base and Serbian positions. They were shelled as they tried to get through Turbe and . . . there were scores of casualties.
> Many herded their livestock as they ran. One farmer put a calf, wounded by shrapnel and apparently close to death, on a cart carrying his family."

That is what is happening. Certainly, it is all terribly difficult. There will soon be nothing left of Bosnia—there is little left already. We are already too late to stop many deaths in the besieged enclaves. The scale of the intervention is too limited, but we should still try.

There has been talk at the United Nations of a war crimes tribunal, but that has since disappeared from the agenda. What has happened to it?

The Government should forthwith review their policy on refugees. That means taking more of them than we have hitherto. We are taking proportionately far fewer than Sweden, Luxembourg and many other countries. That means taking more refugees, and producing more money to help, because a massive tragedy is taking place next door to us. The only sensible way forward is a sharing arrangement through the European Community.

Kosovo and Macedonia are certainly the next areas of great danger. In saying that I am not overlooking the difficulties of the Hungarians in Vojvodina. There are real difficulties there, and we recognise that, but we are not able to cover every issue this night.

Lord Owen's stance on Kosovo—which I heard him spell out on 3 October, when he addressed the Council of Europe, and which the Secretary of State subsequently confirmed, in a written answer to me on 19 October, as Government policy—is wrong. The stance is wrong in its practical consequences, and it is morally indefensible. To exclude the right of the 90 per cent. Albanian majority to self-determination if they want it after more than a decade of suppression by 8 per cent. of Serbs is not sustainable.

When I attended the unofficial election held by the Kosovan Albanians on 24 May—and spent an hour in a Serbian police station—I saw an admirable display of peaceful protest. I do not know how long that will hold. I do not think that it will be for long.

When I and my right hon. Friend the leader of the Liberal Democrats saw President Cosic of the rump Yugoslavia in Belgrade in August, we understood that he would accept United Nations monitors. Many more should be sent, and the Government should do something about that now.

When there is a final conference to resolve the issue, as there will be eventually, it should be made clear that the right of Kosovo to self-determination, if the people so wish, has to be accepted.

Macedonia should be recognised and given economic aid. It has taken the punishment of sanctions more than any of the other countries. It is untenable that Greece should be the country to stop that happening when the United States, at the United Nations meeting in New York last week, pinpointed Greece as massively breaching the oil embargo to Serbia and Montenegro. I am not merely saying this now—I said it in July: the Government are wrong in that.

I have two final, long-term questions; we should remember the long term. First, what is Government thinking on a European or Euro-United Nations peacekeeping force? The Bosnian problem will not be the last that we have to face in that area. The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs told me on 15 May:

> "I do not expect the fighting to end until the factions lose their appetite for war."

If one deals in that sort of futile hand-wringing that is okay, but I think that we should have some ideas about peacekeeping.

Secondly, last year, in the Council of Europe, I argued that its remit should be widened from individual to collective breaches of human rights; in other words, to create obligations in respect of minority groups. I understand that France, Spain and the United Kingdom have been particularly opposed to any moves in that direction. Why?

We shall divide the House tonight, but not because we want to. It is because we do not think that our country has acted as it should in a terrible crisis—it is our country and not merely the Government's, although I notice that they sometimes do not make much distinction—and we want to put on record our deep unhappiness.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): This is an important debate which deals with what is probably the greatest tragedy in post-war European history in which about 2,400 British soldiers are now engaged. It is a war in which tens of thousands have been killed, hundreds of thousands displaced, and serious crimes have been committed. We must concede that no early solution is in sight.

As is to be expected with such a motion, the debate has been wide-ranging and I am conscious that I cannot respond to all the points made. However, the debate could be reduced to three main themes: first, the general policy being pursued by the Government and other European Governments from the start of the crisis, when Slovenia and Croatia announced their independence, until now; secondly, the presence of British troops operating in what was Yugoslavia, the circumstances that surround their deployment, and how we can tackle the humanitarian crisis that they and we face; thirdly, how we hope to bring about a political settlement in what was Yugoslavia. In responding to the specific points raised by hon. Members, I shall try to remain within the framework that I have just identified.

I wish to consider the policy that has been pursued from the outbreak of the crisis until now and, in particular, to respond to some of the points made by my hon. and right hon. Friends. I shall deal with two points: first, the role of Serbia; and secondly, the suggestion that we should have used force in a pre-emptive way. My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Ms. Hoey) and others focused on those points.

It is absolutely clear that Serbia is primarily responsible for what has happened and is now happening in the former Yugoslavia. That is not to say that others have not committed atrocities but I concede that the primary responsibility lies with the Serbians in Serbia and Bosnia. However, we must keep in mind the important proviso that, although I regard Milosevic as a powerful influence behind what is happening in Bosnia, I believe that neither he nor Karadzic have total control over what is happening there. If one needed evidence of that, one could simply remark that the assurances that Milosevic gave regarding the removal of aircraft were not adhered to by General Mladic. Although Milosevic bears a great deal of responsibility and therefore so does Serbia, war lords in Bosnia are pursuing their own policies and objectives.

I do not believe that, by using the kind of military force that has been referred to, we would have stopped or could now stop the conflict. I accept that that could legitimately be disputed, and one can only give one's opinion. That is my opinion, partly because I do not think that Serbia is totally responsible for what is happening in Bosnia—separate leaders have separate policies—partly because the nature of the conflict does not admit of the military action in the middle east two years ago, and partly for the powerful reason that, once the United Nations has used force in that way, it will disqualify itself from the range of other functions that we all deem to be important, notably the supply of humanitarian aid and the brokering role.

Mr. Rogers: If the Minister is ascribing good intentions to Karadzic and Milosevic, the best thing to do is to get them to join us in putting down those warlords who seem to be out of their control.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman misinterprets me. I did not say that Karadzic or Milosevic have good intentions because I do not believe that for a moment. I do not think that they have total control over the warlords in Bosnia, many of whom have even worse intentions. That is a different point.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hogg: No. I should like to deal with the main issue raised by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) and I shall allow an intervention if it is material.

The hon. and learned Gentleman asked many important questions about troop deployment, air cover, exclusion zones, the size of the force and so on. The present force numbers 2,400 and not 2,600 but that is a small point. At present we have no intention of increasing that force and our deployment was for 12 months. We hope that at the end of that time it will be possible to stop the deployment, but we shall have to examine the situation in Bosnia at that time. Therefore, I cannot say whether we shall extend the deployment beyond the initial 12 months.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces dealt with the rules of engagement. Our soldiers will have the ability to defend themselves. They do not have to wait until they are fired upon, nor do they have to return similar fire because they have a range of heavy weapons that are known to the House. They will not have to seek authority up the line. The soldiers on the ground are authorised to use reasonable minimum force to defend themselves and—this answers another of the hon. and learned Gentleman's questions—those for whom they have a direct responsibility at that time.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East asked about air power. Two quite separate issues are involved and they were also mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack). I shall deal first with what I have been calling the air exclusion zone and then with the question whether United Kingdom troops will be able to call for air cover to resist ground attack. United Nations Security Council resolution 786 authorises the no-fly zone and provides for an increase in the United Nations peacekeeping force to monitor the bases. Those forces are being deployed and we have no evidence of any aircraft flying combat missions since 12 October.

What happens if Serbian forces fly combat missions in breach of the resolution? The answer is that we would have to return to the Security Council for an appropriate resolution. I cannot say what would emerge, but I should be rather surprised if the Security Council were not ready to authorise the use of force in those circumstances. The Serbs had better contemplate that for their own good and in the interests of everybody else.

I was asked about air power being available to United Kingdom ground forces. The purpose of the deployment is, of course, to carry out humanitarian functions. The two that I have in mind at the moment are the convoy of humanitarian supplies and, where appropriate, the escorting of refugees. As my right hon. Friend the Minister of State made plain, it is no function of the British forces to fight their way through obstacles. If it becomes too dangerous for British forces to operate, that is to say, if the level of risk is too high with regard to the objectives, they will be pulled back either to defensive positions or absolutely.

We have not provided air cover of the kind to which the hon. and learned Member referred because that is relevant only to the kind of operations on which our troops are not to be asked to embark. If it reaches that level of risk, they will be pulled back. There is another point. Air cover of the kind for which he is calling is appropriate only if it is continuous—that is to say, large numbers of aircraft flying up and down the column. That is not what we are contemplating. Moreover, says I, warming to my theme, the risk that we are facing is mortar fire or rocket attack from within urban areas. I cannot believe that Tornados or other aircraft are an appropriate response to that kind of risk.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Before the right hon. and learned Gentleman burns himself out, will he contemplate the following circumstances, which are not so extravagant as to be unreasonable? Let us imagine British troops engaged in the escort of refugees, as was proposed at the weekend. They are ambushed and encircled. Withdrawal in the terms used both by the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the Minister of State for the Armed Forces is not possible. In such circumstances, why should not the senior commander on the ground have available to him —not flying up and down the column—from nearby NATO air bases, forces from which he can call down air strikes so that he can effect the withdrawal that the Minister postulates?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. and learned Gentleman needs to contemplate another point. We are not in the business of fighting through obstacles. We are in the business of negotiating passage. Anything else is bound to fail because it will run to a war. Therefore, the British troops will have to assess in advance whether what they are contemplating doing can be done with reasonable safety having regard to the forces that are available. If they cannot do it, they will not do it.

Mr. Macdonald: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hogg: No. I cannot give way because I have only four minutes left.

I shall now address one or two specific points, of which perhaps the most important is sanctions. I think that the House misunderstands the position. Much of the sanctions regime has been very successful. Serbian trade is down 40 per cent., industrial production is down 50 per cent., unemployment is up 60 per cent. and inflation is acute. Therefore, the pressure on the Serbian economy is real, but that said, I accept that there has been a greater flow of oil and petrol into Serbia than we would wish. We are seeking to address that, in two ways.

First, and this is the product of the United Kingdom presidency, we are employing sanctions monitors in various adjoining countries. Secondly, and much more important, is the resolution being adopted today, which will deal with transhipment. There are two kinds of transhipment for these purposes—down the Danube, and through Serbia to other countries. Our purpose is to stop both and to enforce the provisions that will be contained in that regime. This will make a considerable difference to the availability of oil and petrol in Serbia. We shall come back to this if we deem it necessary because we must deny oil and petrol to the Serbian Government.

I shall deal now with the visas issue, which has troubled a number of right hon. and hon. Members for reasons that I well understand. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary made the position clear on 5 November. What we have decided is that, in common with all other EC countries of note, a visa regime is justified for the kind of reasons that my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) outlined. But at the same time we have said that there will be a regime for admitting persons to this country who are identified by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, UNHCR, and the International Committee of the Red Cross, the ICRC.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House congratulates the European Community and notably Her Majesty's Government in its capacity as Presidency on its unremitting work for a solution of the crisis in the former Yugoslavia; is appalled by the continuing slaughter in Bosnia-Herzegovina; is deeply concerned about the impact of winter in Sarajevo and other cities and the need to ensure the safe passage of relief supplies to them; expresses its warm support for the work of British troops in providing protective support for relief convoys and is reassured to know that they will have the full right to self-defence; condemns the barbarous policy of ethnic cleansing; calls for the effective policing of the Danube to enforce sanctions; welcomes Her Majesty's Government's response to the refugee problem; is deeply concerned that the conflict may spread to Kosovo and Macedonia; and makes clear its strong support for the work of the international conference on the former Yugoslavia under the leadership of Lord Owen and Mr. Cyrus Vance.

PETITION

Disabled Persons

10.12 pm

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): I present a petition signed by my constituent, Maureen Brownbridge, and 240 other residents of York and neighbouring areas. The petition is sponsored by Mencap, and seeks a change in the law to outlaw discrimination on the basis of people's disabilities —in the same way that other legislation prohibits discrimination on the grounds of gender or race.

The petition reads as follows:

> To the honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament Assembled. The humble petition of York area residents sheweth: That people who are disabled or perceived to be disabled (for whatever reason) are continually having to face widespread unjustifiable discrimination. That legislation is necessary to outlaw this discrimination. Therefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House introduce legislation to outlaw unjustifiable discrimination against people who are disabled or are perceived to be disabled as soon as possible. And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Michael Bates (Langbaurgh): I am grateful for the opportunity to talk about the banks' code of practice, and in particular about the speed and extent to which interest rate changes are being passed on to my constituents—especially businesses.

I believe that the policy presented over the past two or three years by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—a policy of reducing interest rates—represents the best way of stimulating economic activity. It is a welcome move, and has been supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House. Over the past two years, base rates have fallen from some 15 per cent. to 7 per cent., providing a welcome boost to industry, to small businesses and to the consumer.

Along with many of my hon. Friends—a handsome number of whom are present this evening—I am worried about the findings of a recent survey. The survey shows that, although base rates have fallen by some eight percentage points, the cost of borrowing for small businesses has fallen by only about 2·66 per cent. over the corresponding period. If we take the figure that is being widely used, each reduction of one percentage point in the base rate provides the economy with a £1 billion boost. It is also said that that produces a saving of some £200 million for small business.

Given that the survey is accurate—I have no reason to doubt that; the figures have been confirmed by people who have written to me from many parts of the country, and I am sure that my hon. Friends' mail bags contain the same information—the economy is being short-changed to the tune of some £5·5 billion in terms of interest rate reductions. That is twice the transport budget. Moreover, small business is being short-changed to the tune of some £1 billion. I want to make it clear to the banks and other lending institutions concerned that that apparently widespread practice is unacceptable.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): A small business in my constituency started up in 1990 paying interest at 3 per cent. over base rate in June that year. When it closed down in May 1992 and it looked into its charges a month later, it found that it had been paying up to 9·2 per cent. above base rate, having not been consulted by the banks involved. Much of the confusion involving businesses arises from the fact they simply do not know by how much the interest that they are paying exceeds the base rate. Ought not the banks to include in statements, on a regular basis, the amount of interest that they are charging businesses?

Mr. Bates: My hon. Friend has raised a pertinent point, with which I shall deal later. He speaks with great experience, having been in business himself and become acquainted with the problems encountered by small businesses in their relations with banks.

A constituent of mine, who runs a small business, received a letter from a bank, headed "Interest rate margins". It stated:

> "We are presently taking stock of the markedly adverse economic conditions with which all of the Banks are now having to contend, and we find that all of our major > competitors have been sharply increasing their interest rate margins across their lending books over the last year or so taking advantage of the fall in . . . rates . . . We . . . have found ourselves increasingly out of step, and belatedly and with a degree of regret we do feel that we now have to increase our lending margins".

When we hear from the bank chiefs, they tell us that that kind of thing does not happen now. They say that we now have banking codes of practice—even on banking charges. We see all that in nice advertisements on television. There is conclusive evidence, however—dating from only two weeks ago—that such activities are happening on an alarming scale. That evidence is backed up by the Federation of Small Business and by the Forum of Private Business, which regularly surveys some 20,000 private businesses up and down the country.

Two particular aspects in that letter cause concern. The first is the practice of applying fixed minimum lending rates—that is, above the minimum lending rate set by the Bank of England and subsequently agreed to by the high street banks. Fixed minimum lending rates can often be in the region of 10 or 11 per cent. today when bank rates should be 7 per cent. That is why many businesses are still paying 16 or 17 per cent. in interest rate charges even though base rates are 7 per cent. That is an extremely heavy burden to put on the backs of small businesses. As I said earlier, it is entirely unacceptable.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton): Does my hon. Friend agree that another burden that banks put on small businesses is that they often exercise the right to impose a floating charge on a loan? When businesses experience difficulties, therefore, the banks are able to pick and choose which assets should be liquidated, which results in many businesses that could have overcome their difficulties going bankrupt and having to be wound up.

Mr. Bates: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. She has made a valid point, which I know is the result of a great deal of experience and noble service with the Small Business Bureau.

My second point concerns interest rate differentials, from which we can draw another conclusion. Interest rate differentials are being used, in effect, as an insurance premium. The banks say openly that they assess risks and then increase the margin appropriately. That is a short-sighted view. If a small business borrowed a large amount of money and is therefore overdrawn at the bank, it is highly unlikely that the profitability of that business, or its chances of survival, would be improved by increasing the interest rate burden on it. We ought, surely, to be considering reducing the interest rate burden on that business. That is the best way to ensure that it stands the best chance of survival in our present difficulties and that it will be in existence in a few months' time to repay its loan and pay back some of the interest charges.

I was interested to learn today that one bank has announced that it is to abolish the practice of charging fixed interest rates and minimum lending rates. I am absolutely delighted that at the eleventh hour that bank has decided to do so. Far be it from me to suggest that nothing sobers the mind of a banker so much as the threat of adverse publicity, but if the threat of adverse publicity provokes banks to take positive action, many of my hon. Friends and I are more willing to make many more similar comments and remarks.

I have talked to a bank manager in my constituency who had worked there for 35 years—that was in the days when bank managers looked after businesses, as opposed to being financial services providers. He said that he used interest rate differentials for one purpose only: when there was an increase in the amount of administration in connection with the handling of the account. In relation to risk, he said that there were only two types of lending—good lending and bad lending, that one lends to the good and that one avoids the bad. That seems to me to be a breath of fresh air and a bit of common sense that could well be adopted by many of the banks in their present dealings with small businesses.

Small businesses face considerable problems in their dealings with the banks. In many cases, they are held over a barrel by the bank in question. Their ability to negotiate is severely constrained. Many high street banks behave somewhat like a cartel, in that they will not accept any movement in cases where there is an overdraft or a lending problem. Their ability to move or negotiate is virtually non-existent. It therefore falls upon elected officials, politicians, Ministers and the Government to express disapproval about such action at every opportunity so that the banks are provoked into action.

Mr. Gary Streeter (Plymouth, Sutton): Does my hon. Friend agree that a further disgrace is that small business men cannot telephone their bank manager or go to see him without being charged for the privilege and incurring an arrangement fee?

Mr. Bates: My hon. Friend makes a valid point about the excessive charges of banks. That takes us back to the point of bank charges not being thoroughly understood by the customer. Much more clarification, certainly for small business, is necessary.

Banks should realise that, by treating small businesses as equals and by entering into partnership with them, they could be of much assistance to those businesses and could help the economy to recover. That would be a welcome sign. Interest rates for credit card purchases are 26 to 30 per cent. What incentive is that to restore confidence in the high street, to bring customers back to high street shops, thereby encouraging and stimulating those necessary businesses?

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North-West): My hon. Friend will agree that the high street banks are flying in the face of Government policy by increasing their margins on loans. Does he agree that they are fuelling the recession by not financing perfectly sound economic proposals, in order to protect themselves, at a time when they should be expanding lending?

Mr. Bates: I agree with my hon. Friend. So many of the high street banks are behaving not like high street banks but like back street money lenders. That does no service to the banks or to their customers.

I ask my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to urge our right hon. Friend the Chancellor to call in the banks again to make their role in the economic recovery abundantly clear and to highlight the problems that have been experienced by small businesses. When my right hon. Friend the Chancellor last called in the banks, there was a flurry of activity, with hastily produced codes of practice and banking charters. I see no reason why we should not see a similar flurry of activity, which not only might benefit customers, small business and the economy but would do much to enhance in many people's eyes the tarnished reputation of many high street banks.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Anthony Nelson): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates) on an outstanding speech on a subject that is of much interest to hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): This is an extremely important debate that has attracted interest among many Conservative Members, yet if one looks across at the empty Benches opposite one sees that no Labour Member is present and only one Liberal Democrat. That is shameful, because Opposition Members talk about the recession, the pressure on employment and jobs, yet not one is present tonight.

Mr. Nelson: My hon. Friend is right. I was trying to be generous. The hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms. Lynne) is a worthy opponent and we are delighted that she is here today.

My hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh has tonight proved himself a doughty champion of small businesses. He has spoken for small businesses throughout the country—for the proprietors, for the directors and for the many who work for them. We all know from our constituencies that many of them have been through a tough time in the past couple of years. Many undoubtedly feel aggrieved on occasions about the treatment that they have received from the banks. We know that because people have written to us. My hon. Friend put the case so well this evening that I am sure that the message will go out to all the banks which are, I am sure, following this debate.

It is a sign of his power of persuasion and of the compelling arguments mustered by my hon. Friend that not only am I here, in a minor capacity, to answer the debate, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave undertakings to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee today, the Prime Minister has been making a speech on this very subject at the Mansion house tonight and, as my hon. Friend mentioned, a bank has already taken action. That is a remarkable response to my hon. Friend's initiative in obtaining this debate. I congratulate him wholeheartedly.

The interventions by my hon. Friends the Members for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning), for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter) and for Clwyd, North-West (Mr. Richards) were also extremely good. They reflected the widespread concern which is evident from the letters I receive as Economic Secretary and which goes well beyond the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh spoke about the economy and about small businesses being short changed. He spoke especially about his concern about the setting of fixed minimum lending rates. He said, rightly, that the banks must be the friends and not the foes of small businesses. He called for the banks to be called in, which is exactly what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced today to the Select Committee.

I know that there has been especial concern in recent weeks about reports that some banks have been failing to pass on to their small business customers the full benefits of the reductions in interest rates. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has already made plain his wish that the banks should pass on the benefit of interest rate cuts, not only to small business customers, but to all clients who borrow money. I am pleased to have the opportunity tonight to reiterate my right hon. Friend's views.

The exercise that the Treasury and the Bank of England conducted last year found that banks do pass on cuts automatically to customers whose borrowings are linked to base rate, although there was clear evidence that banks seek to widen margins if they feel that the risk—to—reward ratio has moved against them, when facilities come up for renewal or when customers seek to increase their loans. That is classic territory for commercial negotiation, and not for Government intervention.

Banks cannot be expected to lend unprofitably, but given that the recession has increased the risks for many small businesses, it is in neither side's interests for the burden on the customer to be increased to unsustainable levels. The price for borrowing must reflect the needs of both banks and customers, and both sides need to recognise that.

There is evidence that that recognition is happening. In the face of some fierce pressure from the media, NatWest and Barclays announced only last week that they were reducing the interest rate floors which they had previously included in lending agreements with small businesses. Although that is not an area in which the Government can take direct action, we take seriously the complaints that are levelled at the banks, even if they concern matters for the market to solve. As my right hon. Friend announced to the Select Committee this afternoon, he will ask the Bank of England to have another look at the area. He intends to go through it again himself with the chairmen of the individual banks. I hope that that satisfies my hon. Friend.

That said, there is evidence that market forces work, as the announcements by NatWest and Barclays show. Those are not the only recent examples.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): I hope that the Chancellor, in pressing the point on the banks, will also stress to them that we are increasingly entering a highly competitive European market and that British banks should consider how European banks treat their small business customers.

Mr. Nelson: My hon. Friend introduces a most important dimension into the debate and I am obliged to him. Incidentally, this is not the only occasion on which my hon. Friend has raised the issue. He has spoken of it on several other occasions and I am grateful for what he has reiterated tonight.

The issue of the banks' treatment of small businesses is not a new one. As part of last year's Treasury and Bank of England investigation into the subject, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor asked the chairmen of the major banks to consider drawing up a code for their small business customers. As my right hon. Friend made clear to the House in July last year, he had told the chairmen that the very least that customers had a right to expect from their banks was adherence to seven basic principles, which were: that the terms and conditions of accounts should be fair and reasonable; that the terms and conditions should be notified to customers in advance—a point made in an intervention this evening; that customers should be given a full written statement of the standard tariffs of charges applicable to their account; that they should be specifically warned in advance about any charges not covered by the standard tariff; that customers should be given a clear explanation of the basis on which interest is to be charged; that terms and conditions of an account—other than the interest rate—should not be altered without adequate prior notice in writing; finally, that customers should be given a clear explanation of how complaints may be made about decisions taken at local level.

The bank chairmen, in response, assured my right hon. Friend that those principles were already reflected in their existing policy, but undertook to see what more could be done. Since then, six banks have produced codes of banking practice for their business customers, and another, the Bank of Scotland, one covering all customers. All of them are clearly written in plain English and reflect the seven principles.

It was not my right hon. Friend's objective when he met the bank chairmen last year to persuade them to produce identical codes. Indeed, many of them are different. Business customers can now look at the services on offer and decide which best meets their needs.

Some of the letters I receive, however, have suggested that the Government should go further and carry out their own review of banks' codes—either because of complaints that particular banks regularly fail to live up to the terms of their codes or because the codes do not go far enough. I do not believe that that is a suitable job for the Government. Our role is to ensure that a framework is in place which encourages open competition and allows small business customers a choice. Having played a major role in encouraging banks to draw up their codes, the Government feel that customers themselves must make it clear to the banks if the codes do not meet their requirements.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION

Teacher Training Colleges

1. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement indicating Her Majesty's Government's firm proposals for the reform of teacher training colleges.

The Secretary of State for Education (Mr. John Patten): There is continuing unease and concern about the quality of some initial teacher training, which centres on whether some of the producers—the universities and colleges responsible for the training—are providing what the consumers—the schools—will need to achieve, which is higher standards. I announced in June a decisive shift to more school-based training for secondary teachers, following advice from the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education. My aim now is to make the training of primary teachers more school based and more closely related to the needs of schools and the requirements of the national curriculum.

Mr. Hawkins: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. His steps to make teacher training more school based will be welcomed especially by employers in my constituency and, I am sure, throughout the country. Will he consider going further and ensuring that all potential teachers, as part of their training, spend some time working with employers and finding out what it is like for people who work in personnel departments so as to ensure that they are aware of employers' needs in terms of the quality of products of secondary education?

Mr. Patten: That is a very interesting suggestion and I should like to take it up with members of the Confederation of British Industry and the Institute of Directors, with whom I have not discussed it before. A number of schools and groups of schools have told me that they would like to be put in sole charge of teacher training as they believe that they could do at least as good a job as many teacher training colleges in training young teachers at the chalk face.

Mr. Pickthall: Can the Secretary of State assure the House that a circular on changes to teacher education in the primary sector will be issued in the near future and that the consultation period—unlike that for circular 9/92 on the secondary sector—will be sufficient to allow colleges to plan for a smooth transition and to allow for proper consultation? Will he also assure the House that there will be no dilution of teacher education for the primary sector by reducing the subject content so as to make courses shorter and cheaper?

Mr. Patten: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's last question: I want primary school teacher training to be more rigorous, not less, and everything that we do will be to that end. I was slightly surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman suggest that the consultation period allowed for in the circular on secondary school teacher training was inadequate. That circular was widely welcomed—so widely, indeed, that I rather doubted the wisdom of the decision that I had taken. I shall take a decision on primary education as soon as possible. I am awaiting further advice from the National Curriculum Council and Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools.

European Drug Prevention Week

2. Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what rôle his Department will be playing in European Drug Prevention Week.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Schools (Mr. Eric Forth): We are publishing tomorrow a revised and updated version of the booklet, "Drug Misuse and the Young" to help education professionals to prevent and respond to drug misuse by young people. We are also funding a series of regional conferences for 14 to 19-year-olds to look at approaches and appropriate strategies to counter the harmful effects on health from drug misuse and to focus on healthy life styles.

Mr. Faber: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply and warmly welcome his Department's involvement in European Drug Prevention Week. It is a sad fact nowadays that drugs are increasingly available in schools, in the playground and at the school gate, and that the problem is increasingly affecting rural areas as well as inner cities and, tragically, primary as well as secondary schools. Will my hon. Friend continue to inform teachers of the problems to look out for and the steps to take early on to try to help children to avoid the dreadful scourge of drug abuse?

Mr. Forth: Indeed, and I commend to my hon. Friend and to the House the excellent booklet to be published tomorrow as it does most of what my hon. Friend asks. It is designed to help teachers and those working with young people to stop youngsters misusing drugs in any way possible. It outlines the part that the education service can play in prevention and gives specific advice, for example, on dealing with emergencies. It summarises the laws on drug abuse and provides a short factual account of the main types of drugs and their effects. I believe that it will be widely read and used and will be of great help in dealing with a most difficult and distressing problem.

Mr. Don Foster: Given the excellent work on drugs prevention by the health education co-ordinators, will the Minister reconsider his decision to end their grant from March 1993? If not, can he say what progress has been made on seeking joint funding with his colleagues at the Department of Health and the Home Office?

Mr. Forth: I have, of course, met representatives of the advisers and had discussions with them about the issue. I have undertaken to look into the very matter that the hon. Gentleman raises. I must stress some important aspects of which the hon. Gentleman will be aware. For instance, the funding of the initiative was always designed to be of limited duration. It was always understood that the responsibility for continuation would eventually come to rest—rightly, in my view—with the local education authorities. Since its inception great changes have taken place, not least that we now have embedded in the curriculum important elements—dealing with drugs, with substance abuse and with healthy life styles—which go a long way to dealing with the problem, so we can look forward to the future with some confidence in dealing with the whole area.

Mr. Rathbone: While welcoming the steps that the Department is taking in support of European Drug Prevention Week, which got off to an extremely good start with a conference this morning, may I add my emphasis to the question asked by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). When Home Office and Department of Health initiatives are given initial pump-priming finance, should not Government financial support continue while the troubles continue, as it is unlikely that local authorities will be able to find the funding to which the Minister refers?

My hon. Friend referred to the curriculum, but is he aware that the subject ranks very low in the curriculum and that individual schools will give priority to many other subjects well in advance of what he believes that the whole question of drug prevention should receive?

Mr. Forth: I am well aware of the long-standing, knowledgeable and dedicated interest that my hon. Friend takes in this whole area. He has made my right hon. Friend and me well aware of that frequently in recent months. I assure him that I acknowledge his position on the matter. I must ask him to appreciate, however, that when pump-priming money is provided and there is a clear understanding that at some stage it will have to come to an end and responsibility will have to pass on, it is not unreasonable for a Government Department to look at the matter in exactly that way. I believe that we now have sufficient experience of what has been done in the matter —and we have seen a sufficient change in circumstances and background—to justify the decision that we took, after careful consideration and with great difficulty, some time ago.

I cannot agree with my hon. Friend's view— "denigration" would be too strong a word—that somehow the position of the matter in the curriculum is a lowly one. The subject has an important and focal position in the curriculum and it is a matter to which all involved with the curriculum must give their fullest attention. That will be of great force in the years to come in helping young people in the education process to understand the nature of drugs and to help them to avoid abusing them.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: Does the Minister realise that his complacency will be alarming to many parents and teachers who are seriously worried about the drugs problem? Has not his Department stopped the £5 million grant to local authorities which was specifically for drug prevention? Will the Minister reconsider that budget? Unless local authorities are properly funded, the work will not continue and more of our children will fall foul of drug and solvent abuse.

Mr. Forth: I know that you, Madam Speaker, deplore excessive repetition and I should be guilty of that if I answered the hon. Lady in exactly the same way as I answered the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) and my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone). As the hon. Lady asked exactly the same question, however, so as not to be out of order I shall not repeat the reply.

Student Loans

3. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what information he has regarding the take-up rate of student loans in the current university year.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education (Mr. Nigel Forman): As at 13 November, 115,770 students had applied for a loan for the current academic year.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that all independent advice shows that there is a high level of overdrafts and bank loans, in addition to student loans, and real hardship in the student population? Will the Government admit that they have got it wrong on student loans, scrap them and go back to a proper system of grants?

Mr. Forman: The Government have no intention of scrapping student loans. They are a useful additional facility for students. There can be no generalised hardship because in the past four years for which we have figures —including the last academic year—fewer than two fifths of all students took up student loans.

Mr. Pawsey: Does my hon. Friend agree that if student loans were as unpopular as the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) implies, there would be fewer students in advanced education? Will my hon. Friend confirm that the number of students has increased from fewer than 700,000 to substantially more than 1 million and that the figures show that where previously one in eight people in the target group went into advanced education, now one in four does so?

Mr. Forman: My hon. Friend is right. During the period that student loans have been available, student participation in higher education has increased by one fifth. It is still rising and is due to rise by a further 13 per cent. in the next three years.

Mr. Steinberg: Is the Minister aware that student loans have not been taken up because many students are not prepared to put themselves into further debt? Is he further aware that a master at one of the colleges in my constituency told me that he had overhead a conversation between students with rich parents saying that they intended to use a student loan to go on a skiing holiday?

Mr. Forman: It is always unwise to rely on hearsay and overheard conversations. The conditions and terms of student loans through the Student Loans Company are the best deal in town and the most attractive form of finance available to students who wish to take out a loan.

Mr. Batiste: Is my hon. Friend aware that many students have taken out loans when they would not otherwise have wished to do so because a handful of local authorities, mostly Labour controlled, have been appallingly late in delivering their grants to them? Will he monitor the position carefully this year and ensure that there is no repetition of that problem?

Mr. Forman: Indeed, we pay very close attention to such matters. It is regrettable that many local authorities, especially Labour-controlled authorities, are slow in dealing with mandatory awards. We monitor the position carefully and we shall take swift action to deal with any abuses which arise.

Mr. Rooker: Does the Minister accept that for well-off students and families a student loan is a damned sight cheaper than using a credit card for a holiday and that that is an abuse of the system? Will he confirm that the Student Loans Company is seeking the services of debt collection agencies but so far has been unable to find anyone to do the work? Will he assure the House that if debt collection agencies are employed it will be done by competitive tendering and that in the interests of open government a list of agencies prepared to carry out such work will be placed in Hansard?

Mr. Forman: I have every confidence in Mr. Young and his team at the Student Loans Company. Their record has been very good. Their administrative costs are low and their record on getting payments in is extremely good.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Does my hon. Friend accept that those loans are much appreciated by the students of Lancaster university, 825 of whom have taken them up? Moreover, 10 people apply to Lancaster university for every place that is vacant. Could that be because of the wide range of imaginative research carried out there, the latest of which is on how to adapt military technology to civilian purposes in Russia—a project known as "swords into ploughshares"?

Mr. Forman: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for her sterling support of the university of Lancaster. I have visited that university, the records of which show how excellent it is.

National Curriculum

5. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will report on the progress of the implementation of the national curriculum.

Mr. Patten: The final subjects in the national curriculum—art, music and physical education—were introduced on time in September this year. That is in line with the timetable that we set in 1989 and have kept to ever since.

Mr. Robathan: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer. Will he further confirm that he has no intention of stopping the testing of seven-years-olds in our primary schools?

Mr. Patten: I have absolutely no intention whatever of stopping the successful tests of seven-year-olds in our schools. A very few people, harking back to the outdated theories of the 1960s which did so much damage to education in this country, have suggested that we should get rid of tests for seven-year-olds. What do they have to hide or to fear? We shall continue with the tests and we shall continue to see an improvement, for which I am grateful to the many hard-working school teachers. Her Majesty's inspectors of schools have said that last year's tests showed a marked improvement over those of the year before and that teachers had higher expectations of their pupils. The tests are excellent and much appreciated by parents.

Mr. Alfred Morris: Does the Minister agree that the pace of implementation of the national curriculum may depend in part on the Government's decisions about capital expenditure for 1993-94? With its huge problems of schools with basic needs, can we expect a generous settlement for Manchester?

Mr. Patten: On capital expenditure for maintaining schools, following last year's 15 per cent. increase in the amount of money available for schools, this year we have maintained the level of the capital programme. I recognise that implementation of the national curriculum is not always easy for our hard-working teachers, but I am glad that there is at least bipartisan agreement that the national curriculum introduced by the Conservatives is supported by both sides of the House.

Mr. Richards: How much money have local education authorities received in grants to help implement the national curriculum, and has that money been used to good effect?

Mr. Patten: Each year we have been giving several hundred million pounds to local education authorities, both in England and in Wales, my hon. Friend's area, to help implement the national curriculum. The fruits of some of those schools' labours will be clear tomorrow when, for the first time, the Government publish the A-level and GCSE results for every secondary school in the country. That will pinpoint attention where it is needed locally and on standards where they need to be improved. It is the biggest ever public information exercise. Once those new tables are launched, parents will expect them year by year in future, and they will get them year by year —and quite right, too.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: Does the Secretary of State not think it remarkable that he has managed to unite everyone in education, from the National Union of Teachers to the Girls' Schools Association in the independent sector, so that all are criticising his handling of the national curriculum and assessment procedures? Is it not about time that the Secretary of State started to listen to those parents and teachers who believe that the national curriculum is overloaded and too prescriptive? Should he not consult the Secretary of State for Scotland, who has just withdrawn proposals for the testing of seven-year-olds, which the right hon. Gentleman has just defended?

Mr. Patten: I meet teachers as I go around schools in this country. With my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Schools and the Minister of State, Baroness Blatch, we have visited 64 separate schools in the seven months since the general election. I have not visited one school where the head teacher or any classroom teacher has said that he or she does not support the national curriculum. There is a wide measure of agreement on that. I am delighted that the national curriculum is being delivered on time and will lead to improvements in standards. Was it not Matthew Arnold who talked about "the last enchantments of the Middle Age"?

It is right for many people to debate the national curriculum, and I do not dispute that there will always be lively debates on the subject, but there are faint echoes of the 1960s in what is being said by many people.

Grant-maintained Schools

6. Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has to change the electoral arrangements in parental ballots for grant-maintained status.

Mr. Forth: We have decided to introduce more flexibility to the electoral arrangements that apply in circumstances where a ballot is declared void and the governing body is required to hold the ballot again. We have therefore included in the Education Bill a provision that will, in certain circumstances, enable the Secretary of State to specify the effective date for determining the electoral roll in a reballot. That will ensure that the ballot can proceed on the basis of an up-to-date electoral roll.

Mr. Lewis: The Minister will be aware that there have been two ballots in my constituency where parents voted not to opt out. He will also know that those two thrusts for opting out were led by the head teacher and a small côterie of ill-motivated governors—[Interruption.] The Secretary of State and I have already clashed on the matter; he was wrong then and he would be wrong now. There is absolutely no need to point the finger at those involved with those successful ballots, which were conducted in an orderly and fair manner. The Secretary of State needs to look at the ballots that have been successful in his own terms. He will find that in those ballots the rules were bent, and it is to that fact that he should address his attention.

Mr. Forth: I do not know what the hon. Gentleman is being so sensitive about. He seems to be saying that he welcomes cases where parents have freely expressed in a ballot their desire to make the school grant maintained, but he also seems to say that he regrets those cases and would actively oppose that very procedure. That seems to be bordering on paranoia. The hon. Gentleman should lighten up a bit and accept the opinions of parents up and down the country, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I are happy to do.

Dame Jill Knight: Is my hon. Friend aware of the blatant ballot rigging, harassment and double dealing carried out in Birmingham by some Labour supporters who are trying to ensure that a school in my constituency, Lordswood girls school, does not become grant maintained? May I give him the evidence that I have received from girls, who speak in chorus about what has happened to their homes, and ask him to investigate the matter?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend highlights a disgraceful and distressing trend which has emerged of late and of which we in the Department for Education are obtaining increasing evidence: the deplorable behaviour of people involved in local education authorities up and down the country, and particularly in Birmingham. They use extremely unfair and unacceptable methods to seek to influence parents in the free expression of their view of grant-maintained status through the balloting procedure. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it absolutely clear that he will not accept such conduct and will take all available steps within the existing law to deal with it. We will also look at the Education Bill now in Committee to make sure that every possible step is taken to ensure that all balloting procedures are fair and free.

Mr. Eastham: Further to the Minister's remarks about grant-maintained schools, is he aware of the letter sent by the Department for Education on 3 November to chief education officers? Has he seen the replies to that letter, for instance, from the chief education officer of Manchester? He says that he finds the Department's letter most insulting and intimidating, and that he believes that some of the things that are going on with grant-maintained schools are quite unfair. In fact, we are not getting ballots at all, contrary to what the Minister says and contrary to the lies being told from the Dispatch Box. I shall publish the letter from the chief education officer——

Madam Speaker: Order. Did I understand the hon. Gentleman to use the phrase, "the lies being told from the Dispatch Box"? If so, I know that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw and refrain.

Mr. Eastham: I was talking about lines——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has been in this House a very long time, and he knows what I am getting at. He is an hon. Member, and I am sure that he will address the House correctly.

Mr. Eastham: I apologise, Madam Speaker, if I caused grave offence—none was intended. All I am trying to do is clarify some points which are disbelieved by the general public. Given some of the remarks by Ministers it is my intention, with the approval of the chief education officer of Manchester, to publish his letter.

Mr. Forth: I did not hear the hon. Gentleman withdraw his remarks, Madam Speaker, but that is a matter for you.

I am sure that most chief education officers have nothing to fear in this matter and can regard the letter accordingly. Chief education officers who have something to fear—if people such as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) can bring evidence to the Secretary of State that unacceptable or illegal activities have taken place—will find the full rigour of my Department and of the Secretary of State descending on their shoulders—I can promise the hon. Gentleman that.

Educational Psychology Services

7. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement on the workings and future of the educational psychology services.

Mr. Forth: Educational psychology services are the responsibility of local education authorities. This will remain the case under the Education Bill. Their services will be provided equally for grant-maintained and LEA-maintained school pupils.

Mr. Steen: I welcome choice and diversity in education, but many parents should be concerned about the erosion of the schools psychology service, in view of the dramatic changes taking place in both the funding and the management of schools.

Is the Minister aware of the recent audit report which states that the schools psychology service is extremely professional, is very well run, and provides good value for money? Will he avoid his officials persuading him otherwise?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend has an intimate knowledge of these matters, despite which I am sure that he will be entirely impartial in his assessment of their value. There can be no doubt in anyone's mind about the essential nature of and value provided by the educational psychology services, both now and under the continuing obligations laid on local education authorities in the Bill now in Committee. I expect educational psychology services to develop and change and to show flexibility as the Bill progresses. The treatment of special educational needs is strengthened under that Bill.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Does the Minister accept that there is real and widespread concern that the schools psychology service and other learning support services for children with special needs are under threat, and that some of those services have already been diminished by the impact of the Education Reform Act 1988? If he is not prepared to accept that from me, will he undertake a survey of local education authorities to find out what has happened to these services since 1988? If they have declined, will he take steps to put that right?

Mr. Forth: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman says. He does a great disservice to local education authorities and to professionals in educational psychology and other services in making such assertions. Local education authorities' statutory obligations are clear now and will continue to be clear under the Education Bill. It will be for local education authorities to ensure that they discharge their statutory obligations properly. That is what we shall be ensuring and I join the hon. Gentleman in looking to local education authorities to do just that.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Does my hon. Friend accept that educational psychologists undertake much preventive work which is often overlooked? Much as we all welcome my hon. Friend's important statement that local education authorities will continue to be responsible for educational psychology services, will he confirm that it is crucial to the future of the child statementing process that the psychology service should continue at its present level, if not at a greater level?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend is correct. He will know from the Education Bill now in Committee that we have sought to strengthen the provision for children with special educational needs. The statutory obligations on local education authorities continue, and we are strengthening, speeding up and making more specific the way in which they will work. I am confident that generally, and in terms of the role played by educational psychologists, that can only mean a great improvement in provision for pupils with special educational needs.

Discretionary Awards

8. Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement about the funding available in the next financial year to finance discretionary awards.

Mr. Forman: It is for each local education authority to determine its own policies and expenditure on discretionary awards in the light of local needs and priorities. In the financial year 1990-91, the latest year for which figures are available, authorities in England spent £216 million on discretionary awards. Details of next year's funding settlement for local authorities will be announced later this year.

Mrs. Jackson: Does the Minister agree that the restrictions on local authorities' resources are making it increasingly difficult for them to offer a proper service on discretionary awards, particularly to mature students? What advice would he give to one of my constituents, a mature working class student, who struggled for five years to obtain an excellent law degree only to find himself without financial resources for the Law Society's final course? Does he agree that, in the light of mounting concern about the white, male, middle-class, Oxbridge-educated, legal profession, it is high time that the Government made the final fourth year of the Law Society's course eligible for a mandatory grant and made available the resources for that?

Mr. Forman: That is heavy dose of special pleading from the hon. Lady. The resources available to local authorities under the education standard spending assessment are generous and will continue to be so. In the past full year for which figures are available, that sum was expanded by 7·4 per cent. and well-run local authorities should be able to finance an adequate level of discretionary awards within that sum.

Mr. Marland: Is my hon. Friend aware that there is also considerable concern in Gloucestershire about the lack of money available for discretionary awards? That is in no small way due to the appalling way in which Liberal councillors in Gloucestershire have managed the county council's finances, not least in trying to buy votes in the Cheltenham area before the last general election. But the more sensible councillors in Gloucestershire county council feel that the standard spending assessment for education may have been slewed against Gloucestershire when compared with those of Oxfordshire and Devon. Will my hon. Friend undertake to keep the matter under review?

Mr. Forman: I shall always keep important matters of that kind under review, especially when they are raised by my hon. Friend who has highlighted a typical example of Liberal mismanagement of local government. I have had direct experience of that in the London borough of Sutton, and I entirely agree with him.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Let me remind the Minister—even if it touches a raw nerve on the Conservative Benches—that those who are not white, male or middle class constitute the majority in this country. It is not "special pleading" to suggest that discretionary grants form a vital part of financial support for many people who would not otherwise have access to education. I hope that the Minister understands that.

Is the Minister aware that nearly two thirds of local authorities have cut or frozen discretionary awards for the current financial year? That means that many people who should be able to take advantage of such awards are unable to do so. What does the Minister intend to do about it? Will the Government provide a proper settlement for local authorities, and ensure that discretionary awards are available?

Mr. Forman: The forthcoming settlement for local authorities in relation to their expenditure on education will form part of the announcement that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will make later this year.

Mr. Nigel Jones: Following the answer that the Minister gave to the hon. Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland), may I ask him whether he realises that Gloucestershire county council is ruled by a Conservative-Labour pact?

Mr. Forman: That just shows how unwise it is to enter into alliances with the Liberal party.

Grant-maintained Schools

9. Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many schools in England have not opted for grant-maintained status.

Mr. Forth: A total of 22,072 maintained schools in England have not had a ballot for grant-maintained status. Of the 701 schools that have balloted for grant-maintained status, only 152 have voted "no".

Mr. Ward: Is that not a good record, given the comments about intimidation that we heard earlier? How will my hon. Friend ensure that the other schools that will be holding ballots—if they know what is good for their children—will hold them in a fair and free manner, without such intimidation?

Mr. Forth: I am glad that my hon. Friend has asked me that. He will be aware that in the Education Bill, which is currently in Committee, we have introduced a number of provisions to streamline the application process, to abolish the requirement for a second governors' resolution before ballots, to provide support for governing bodies for expenses incurred in the promotion of grant-maintained status and to limit LEA expenditure on measures such as my hon. Friend has described. We have taken steps to ensure that a proper, balanced debate takes place before parents make an informed judgment and cast their votes.

I think that my hon. Friend will be encouraged by the information that there has been a sevenfold increase in the number of ballots this October compared with the number last October, and that about 200 schools are balloting in October and November this year alone. That shows that we are on the up and up, and rolling.

Mr. Soley: The Minister's answer was not accurate. A total of 24,500 schools have not balloted, perhaps realising that—as with the ballots under the Housing Act 1988—all those not voting would be counted as having voted yes.

While the Minister is dealing with disinformation, may I ask him why he chose to single out Hammersmith and Fulham for providing what he described as disgraceful material? He has never given any examples of such material. Will he tell me—either now or in writing—what that disgraceful material was? If he cannot do so—and I suspect that he cannot—will he apologise to parents, governors and the local authority?

Mr. Forth: My answer is yes; and it probably will not be necessary.

Mr. William Powell: Is my hon. Friend aware that a great and growing number of schools in my constituency have already achieved grant-maintained status, and that not a single school that has done so has had the slightest cause for regret? Will my hon. Friend suggest to schools that are considering adopting such status that they approach schools in Corby and east Northamptonshire, and learn about the actual experiences of those schools?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend has made an important point, which is worth emphasising. Anyone who is considering adopting grant-maintained status can do no better than go to a school that has been grant maintained for some time and speak to the head teacher, the governors and the parents of pupils. That person will find—as Her Majesty's inspectorate has found—that grant-maintained schools benefit in almost every conceivable way from their new independent status and authority. That is reflected in more popularity, better standards and better treatment of pupils.

My hon. Friend made his point very well. I urge all those who are interested in grant-maintained status for their schools to talk to people who have already adopted it: they will receive a very positive response.

White Paper (Consultation)

10. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will extend the period of consultation on the education White Paper.

Mr. Patten: The consultation period on the White Paper "Choice and Diversity: A New Framework for Schools", ended on 25 September. The Government have now introduced the Education Bill into Parliament, to give effect to the proposals in the White Paper. Having had a successful Second Reading, the Bill is now in Committee.

Mr. Llwyd: As the main thrust of the Education Bill apparently is to provide diversity and choice for parents, will the Minister explain how that will be achieved in large rural areas of Wales and England, where primary schools are often 10 or 15 miles apart and secondary schools 25 or 30 miles apart? As such areas are already suffering extreme economic hardship, will he explain how this plan will gel together?

Mr. Patten: Welsh issues are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. On the generality of the hon. Gentleman's open-minded question, we set great store by small rural schools, which we want to support. We also set great store in giving such schools the opportunity to be grant maintained, and the Education Bill will give them the opportunity to do so as part of clusters. That is a very good thing for them.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Heppell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 17 November.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Heppell: Will the Prime Minister inform the House why a trade mission from Nottingham chamber of commerce was allowed to go ahead on 22 June 1990 even though the products of the companies involved would have been useful to Saddam Hussein's war effort? Will he assure the House that the role of such trade missions will be part of the Scott inquiry?

The Prime Minister: I shall certainly examine the hon. Gentleman's point. As he may well know, my office receives about 3,000 letters and innumerable documentation each week so I cannot reply directly, but I will examine the point that he made.

Mr. Lord: Does the Prime Minister agree that the Chancellor's autumn budget contained excellent news for the building industry? Does he further agree that allowing housing associations more resources to buy empty properties and local authorities more discretion to spend their capital receipts will be an excellent boost for the housing market?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I think that my hon. Friend is quite right. There were a number of aspects of my right hon. Friend's statement that were very good news indeed for the housing market. As Abbey National has said, this may prove to be the point at which the housing market turns. That is the view of Abbey National, and I hope that it proves to be correct. My right hon. Friend had a meeting with mortgage lenders yesterday to discuss ways of ensuring that the money is used as effectively as possible to reduce the overhang of empty properties on the market. If it is, it will have a material impact on the housing market and a beneficial one.

Mr. John Smith: Last night, a Downing street spokesman briefed the press that the 1984 guidelines for exports of arms-related equipment to Iraq were changed in 1988. Can the Prime Minister tell why Parliament was not informed of this change?

The Prime Minister: I think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is well aware that we have set out the most wide ranging terms of inquiry possible—far more wide ranging than most people imagined—and that all these matters will be discussed on that occasion. I hope that he will now accept that those terms are so wide ranging and cover so many aspects that nothing will not be fully examined.

Mr. John Smith: Can the Prime Minister tell me, then, why the question whether Parliament was misled is not included in the terms of reference of the inquiry?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is being extremely silly. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: If he reads the terms of inquiry more carefully he will see that they allow the judge to examine all the facts, all the decisions, the basis for those decisions and whether Ministers operated in accordance with the policies of the Government. The judge will have access to all the documentation as well as to individuals. So the right hon. and learned Gentleman's fears are wholly unfounded.

Mr. John Smith: The Prime Minister will recollect that he quoted the terms of reference as being whether Ministers operated in accordance with the policies of Her Majesty's Government. But the allegation which is made, and which I also make, that this Government consistently, over a long period of time, misled Parliament, is not included in these terms of reference. If the Prime Minister and his colleagues have nothing to hide, why not include the misleading of Parliament in the terms of reference of the inquiry?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman should read the terms of reference, when he would see that this is entirely implicit in them. The suggestion that Ministers misled the House is a serious and scurrrilous charge and has no basis whatsoever in fact. It is typical of the charges that have been made by the Labour party before. It is typical of the charges over the Bank of Credit and Commerce International, which were utterly unfounded and which the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his colleagues have never apologised for making.

Mr. Fabricant: Is my right hon. Friend aware that despite the ever growing recession in Germany over £360 million worth of property in central London has recently been bought by German investment trusts? Is not this a demonstration, by putting their deutschmarks where their mouths are, of confidence in British economic policy?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, there is a very large amount of inward investment in this country from both within and beyond the European Community. Indeed, in terms of investment in countries within the Community by countries beyond it, by far the lion's share comes to this country, because of this Government's policies over recent years.

Q2. Mr. Morley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 17 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Morley: Is the Prime Minister aware of the effects of his economic incompetence on companies such as British Steel in Scunthorpe, and on unemployment? Is he aware, further, that long-term unemployment has risen by 48 per cent., to stand at 302,000? Is it not a matter for regret that of all the things that the Prime Minister mentioned in his speech at the Lord Mayor's banquet unemployment was not one?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman clearly understands even less than I thought he did. He clearly has not read my speech or the press reports. The speech was nearly all about the strategy for growth to provide long-term secure jobs. If the hon. Gentleman does not understand that, he does not understand anything.

Mrs. Roe: Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the Chancellor of the Exchequer—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House will settle down. Let us have some order. Front-Bench Members are bawling and shouting. Order.

Mrs. Roe: Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the Chancellor of the Exchequer on his autumn statement, which did so much to preserve the Government's capital programmes: programmes for new roads, new railways, new hospitals and new schools? Does he agree that this will not only help modernise Britain's infrastructure but create new jobs in our construction industry?

The Prime Minister: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend about that. It is, of course, in sharp contrast to what happened under the last Labour Government, when they would always cut capital as the first and easiest cut, while avoiding the difficult decisions on current account. We have taken the difficult decisions on current account precisely to preserve capital, build up our future, create jobs and build up prosperity.

Q3. Ms. Hoey: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 17 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Ms. Hoey: Is the Prime Minister aware of the revulsion in the country caused by his Government's inhumane, shameful and sickening policy on Bosnian refugees? Why was the Prime Minister so ready to provide a safe haven and air support for the Kurds when they were running from Iraqi aggression when he is not ready to provide a similar safe haven or air support for women and children fleeing from Serbian aggression in central Europe?

The Prime Minister: Let me say to the hon. Lady that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will deal with this at greater length in a few moments. Let me say to her now that we have welcomed more than 40,000 visitors from Yugoslavia this year of whom more than 4,000 have applied for asylum, and we have agreed to work with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and with the International Red Cross to take the priority refugees they want us to take under the 1951 Geneva convention. With the best will in the world we simply cannot take everyone who, for understandable reasons, wants to leave Yugoslavia and, in this case, the group concerned were warned in advance that they should not go ahead with their mission to Yugoslavia.

Q4. Mr. Luff: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 17 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Luff: Is my right hon. Friend aware that his determination to bring a successful outcome to the current GATT round will bring enormous benefits not only to Britain and Europe, but to the countries of the third world whose interests the Government so clearly protected last week in the welcome and substantial increase in our overseas aid budget?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is entirely right about the importance of the GATT round to the third world. It is entirely unreasonable for the west to say to the third world, on one hand, here is some aid to help with your difficulties and, on the other hand, close our markets, which are of even greater benefit to them. It is imperative that we have the GATT round for the industrialised world, but it is no less imperative for the non-industrialised world.

Q5. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 17 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Could the Prime Minister spare a few moments at 3.30 pm to go downstairs to the Grand Committee Room and explain to a lobby of several hundred people from residential drug and alcohol projects why the Government have gone back on a clear commitment to ring-fence their funding with effect from 1 April next year? Is he aware that the decision will result in several of the projects closing, with obvious human consequences? It would be especially appropriate during European Drug Prevention Week for the Prime Minister to do a U-turn on the matter.

The Prime Minister: The Government recognise that there are special circumstances for alcohol and drug misusers and we have met the specialist service providers. We will be encouraging fast-track assessment procedures, encouraging good practice in identifying who is responsible for each client and setting up special monitoring arrangements for those services for the first three months following implementation. That is in addition to the action we have already announced to ensure that the community care grant is spent on services that reflect people's wishes and causes minimum turbulence and disturbance to them. The hon. Gentleman should be more accurate about our proposals.

Q6. Mr. Adley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 17 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Adley: I am sorry that I am in the wrong place, Madam Speaker, but these young whipper-snappers show no respect to us old fogies.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that the retention of a national timetable is an essential element in changes that are made to railway policy? Is he aware that this morning, Select Committee on Transport members visited Crewe? Incidentally, we got back eight minutes early and were back here in time for lunch. We went to the national timetable centre and were somewhat dismayed to find that not only Ministers, but officials from the Department of Transport had not been there. Will my right hon. Friend encourage the civil servants responsible for the documentation to do a little more homework please?

The Prime Minister: I suspect that my hon. Friend has just done that, and in the most effective way possible.

Q7. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 17 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Loyden: Given the Matrix Churchill debacle of the past few weeks and the Government's obvious inadequacy in dealing with that matter—giving rise to questions regarding the very accountability of the Government—will the Prime Minister now accept that the only way to overcome such difficulties is to introduce a freedom of information Bill so that such situations can be avoided in future?

The Prime Minister: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman on that point, and, on the substantive matter that he mentioned, I have already said to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) that there will be a full and wide-ranging inquiry to which every Minister concerned will give evidence, all papers will be available and all civil servants will make themselves available. There will be a full and total disclosure of all those events.

Q8. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 17 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister say what further steps he can and will take to press banks to lower their interest rates in line with reduced bank rates so that businesses can profit and, more particularly, so that young home owners and mortgage payers in my constituency and throughout the country can benefit?

The Prime Minister: Clearly, lower interest rates should benefit businesses and consumers alike and thus help the economy. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made clear, he will be taking the matter up with the individual clearing banks, and the Bank of England will be reviewing current practice by the banks.

Madam Speaker: Time's up.

Bosnian Refugees

3.30 pm

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the decision to refuse entry to 180 Bosnian refugees.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): On 5 November I made a statement to the House about the offer that we were making to the International Committee of the Red Cross and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to receive from Bosnia people with special humanitarian needs who the international organisations judged should be evacuated from detention camps and elsewhere.

I said that we would be discussing numbers and timing with the UNHCR and the International Committee of the Red Cross. We have informed the UNHCR that we are ready to receive in the first instance 150 former detainees and their dependants, probably making 600 in all. At the same time, I announced the imposition of visas on certain nationals of the former Yugoslavia, making it clear that such action was needed to enable us to target our humanitarian assistance where it was most needed.

The Leeds European Refugees Trust—ALERT—was advised the following day, 6 November, by my officials that the group that it intended to bring to the United Kingdom could not be exempted from the visa regime to be imposed from midnight on that day. That information and advice was repeatedly given to ALERT before its coaches left the United Kingdom on 9 November—four days after my statement. Despite that clear advice, ALERT proceeded with its plans and then used its coaches to move the group from more comfortable conditions in the safe city of Ljubljana to the equally peaceful but colder mountainous region on the Austrian border.

The ALERT group then lodged applications at the British embassy in Vienna which were referred to the Home Office asylum division on 13 November.

I decided yesterday that visas may be authorised for six members of the group who have existing close family ties with the United Kingdom. They will be free to travel here to lodge applications for asylum, in accordance with normal policy, as the United Kingdom is the most suitable country of refuge in their cases.

I also decided that another 180 members of the group should be refused visas because they have insubstantial or no links to the United Kingdom. Their cases are indistinguishable from the plight of about 2 million people displaced in former Yugoslavia. They are more fortunate than those likely to be referred to the Government by the UNHCR and the International Committee of the Red Cross in that the ALERT group are housed in hotels and hospitals far away from the fighting.

Eight other cases, two with medical conditions, and their relatives remain under active consideration and are the subject of further inquiries. These inquiries include the need to establish that it is necessary for them to have medical treatment in the United Kingdom rather than in the hospitals where they are at present in Slovenia. It would also be necessary to ensure that the national health service could provide treatment for the patients if that case could be made.

The Government have repeatedly made clear their willingness to make a humanitarian contribution to solving the problems in the former Yugoslavia by helping to take the cases which the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross judge to be the most needy. As I have already stated, we have agreed to accept an initial group of about 600 people in all from both international bodies. Numbers and timing are being urgently considered with the UNHCR and ICRC and, of course, we stand ready to consider numbers beyond the 600 I have mentioned.

We did not implement the new visa regime without thought for transitional cases. Groups similar to ALERT who were caught by my statement on 5 November and had already then started their journeys were, in fact, exempted from visa requirements; 187 individuals were admitted to the United Kingdom on 7 and 8 November, two and three days after my statement, without visas on the basis that they had already started their journeys. ALERT, however, was fully warned of the position before even starting the journey with its coaches from this country, and at no time did it have any basis for raising the hopes of the unfortunate people concerned.

Mr. Blair: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his statement, but will he agree that the people to whom he is refusing help today are beyond doubt victims of war, some from concentration camps and all in a desperate situation? Although for the past two days since the affair broke they have been in hotels and hospitals, previously they were sleeping on buses in the freezing cold. If no asylum is given, they will go back to the refugee camps from which they have come, or in some cases to Bosnia itself.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman has criticised the ALERT organisation. Some organisations may be well meaning but irresponsible, but will he confirm the following: that ALERT has wide experience in the refugee crisis; that this was the sixth such mission it had made and the first on which there were any problems; that it had recently been commended by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for the responsibility of its conduct; and that it had secured places for all 180 people in this country before setting off?

Following the initial conversations with the Home Office, ALERT had got for the Home Office a letter from the head of the International Red Cross in Ljublijana on behalf of the Red Cross, backing up the Slovenian Red Cross, and saying that these people were victims of war with desperate need. Since the Minister is now saying, apparently, that the letter is invalid because it is from the Red Cross on the ground and not the Red Cross in Geneva, why was the first that any of the refugee bodies knew that there might be a doubt about the certification of the Red Cross when they heard the Minister on the radio this morning? How does he explain that?

Although everyone accepts that there must be proper regulation of the flow of refugees, in this case of clear suffering—involving mothers and children, where accommodation in Britain has been agreed and where the Red Cross on the ground has recommended help—would not the Minister command more support in the country if, instead of every day placing new barriers in the way of help, the Government were to show the same spark of humanitarian concern as has been shown by the British people?

Mr. Clarke: There are at the best estimate 2 million people displaced by warfare in former Yugoslavia. They are all distressed; many are homeless and many are obviously in need of as much assistance as we can give. This country is in the forefront of the international community in giving humanitarian assistance inside Yugoslavia to those people. We have joined in, making our offer to take a share of those referred to us by the International Committee of the Red Cross and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

The hon. Gentleman gives no indication as to whether he would refuse any of those 2 million if they presented themselves to come to this country [Hon. Members: "Oh!"] It is quite true. I have faced the hon. Gentleman for several days. He shares my instincts; he shares my values. He believes that we should make an offer in this country, but he refuses to face the responsibility of saying that we in this country should decline to take anybody who is offered to us to come to this country. He also declines to take any notice of what I have already explained to him about the policy that we have been following.

I made a clear statement on 5 November about the basis on which we were proceeding and the introduction of the visa regime. Those people who had already started their journeys were allowed here without visas. ALERT, the organisation whose cause the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has taken up, sent the coaches from this country on 9 November after being advised for three days that it was sending out coaches to fetch people who did not qualify under the visa regime that we had introduced.

ALERT now appears to have persuaded the hon. Gentleman that somehow it had the authorisation of the Red Cross by producing to him a letter from Ljubljana with the Red Cross symbol on it. The body that we are negotiating with, the body that will send and identify for us the first 600 or so people from the detention camps, is the International Committee of the Red Cross—a large international organisation based in Geneva with many people active on the ground in the areas affected by the fighting in the former Yugoslavia.

There is a perfectly reputable body. The Ljublijana branch of the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies—[An hon. Member: "It is exactly the same body."] It is not exactly the same body. It is a Ljublijana branch of a federation between Red Cross and Red Crescent organisations of people based in Slovenia. That federation has sent a letter today from its headquarters—a different headquarters—from the head of the Europe department about the letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) stating:

> "The letter was drafted in good faith by the Head of Delegation on basis of information which he could not verify at the time of writing. It does not reflect the view of the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies."

The Ljublijana branch did not have the authority of its headquarters, of that organisation, for the letter that it gave.

In any event, that organisation is quite different from the International Committee of the Red Cross, with which we are working. The ICRC and the UNHCR are running detention centres very close to the fighting. They have accepted our offer to move to us about 600 people of those at the moment in the heart of the fighting who need to be evacuated because they have been traumatised by their experience. They will be added to the 68 wounded whom we have already taken from the area at the request of the Red Cross and who are being treated in national health service hospitals. Of course, we already have 40,000 people from the former Yugoslavia here as visitors, 4,000 of whom have already applied for asylum and most of whom are not returning.

We are targeting our effort on those identified to us by the international organisation. The people we are talking about today are housed in hotels and hospitals in a peaceful part of former Yugoslavia far removed from the fighting. They have been moved there from Ljublijana for some reason by an organisation which took coaches there for that purpose some days after my announcement.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield must accept that there is a sensible case for saying no to some of those 2 million. Britain will take its share in making a humanitarian contribution to the most needy.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): My right hon. and learned Friend will be aware, because he has just quoted it, that I have become involved in the issue through many of my constituents who work for Leeds European Refugees Trust. They are constituents of great Christian motive and they are highly effective in what they have been doing to date.

My right hon. and learned Friend will also be aware that they sought the information and I agree with him that they were given strong advice that they should not move on Monday the 9th. Equally, my right hon. and learned Friend will now know, because he quoted it, that the information from the Ljublijana branch of the International Red Cross was of such a character that it was quite impossible for me or for ALERT to say that it was not a step towards the visa requirement so clearly set out in my right hon. and learned Friend's statement the previous Thursday.

I apologise unreservedly to my right hon. and learned Friend for being a nuisance in this matter, and unreservedly also if I have unwisely passed on advice to ALERT. My considered view was that the letter was meaningful, and it is only now that little meaning has been attached to it. Based on that encouragement, I suspect that ALERT allowed the buses to leave. They contained important medical supplies and other material which would have been received in the area concerned in any case. I hope that in considering the flexibility of the system, at a short distance, my right hon. and learned Friend will consider the humanitarian aspect of assessment.

Mr. Clarke: First, my hon. Friend has no need to apologise to me or to anyone else. He has quite properly taken an interest in a distressing and difficult decision. I accept that it is plainly the case that the 180 people who are waiting on the border of Slovenia and Austria had appalling experiences. They are displaced and they are among literally millions of people who are suffering innocently and directly from the consequences of the warfare. My hon. Friend knows of the advice given to ALERT not to go there and select people to bring back from among those millions. He has been helpful throughout, and letters to him have finally been clarified by the letter that I just quoted from the European headquarters of the Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies.

We considered the case of each person on those British coaches. Visa forms were taken to them from Vienna, flown back to London and given priority over all the other incoming applications for refugee status and asylum. The forms were worked on over the weekend. When going through those cases, in the interests of making the most effective contribution, I had to decide that only six had any sensible case for choosing Britain as the place to which they should go from their current safe haven in the far reaches of Slovenia. Were we to take many more, or to admit more to our hospitals, we would reduce our capacity to take the people whom we have promised to take from the International Committee of the Red Cross and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks. He and I have been wrestling with an impenetrable tangle and have both been aware of the important humanitarian issues which lie behind it.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. Before we go further down this road, with long statements and not very brief answers, I remind the House that this is a private notice question and requires to be dealt with in a particular way—by direct single questions and brief answers.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Is the Home Secretary aware that his voice sounds like that of his predecessor, Sir Samuel Hoare, who bundled Jewish refugees back on to planes to Germany in 1939? When he speaks of allowing 150 people in desperate straits into the country on the one hand and of 2 million refugees on the other, he does less than justice to our international role as a humanitarian country and simply deposits the problem in the lap of the German people. Does he think that that is an appropriate response for this great country?

Mr. Clarke: I respect the hon. Gentleman's passionate sincerity on the matter, so I shall not bridle with indignation at his outrageous allegation. I have been getting used to outrageous allegations about my conduct in recent weeks. On calm reflection, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will not find any comparison between the returning of Jews to a regime which was systematically killing them in the gas chambers and my refusal to allow people into this country from hotels and hospitals on the peaceful mountainsides of Slovenia where they are far removed from the fighting, having escaped from it, and where I trust that no one will attempt to pursue or to kill them.

There are a large number of displaced persons and all international organisations and European countries have agreed that the best policy is to keep as many of them as possible as near to their homes as possible, so that they can return when peace comes. We shall take our share of the people who are most traumatised. The International Committee of the Red Cross and UNHCR are best placed to tell us who those people should be.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): Would my right hon. and learned Friend agree, in view of his last answer, that the urgent need is massive extra aid to countries such as Slovenia so that refugees can be kept in safety not far from their homes? Up to now, the support given to new republics and other countries surrounding the former Yugoslavia has been insufficient. Does he agree that our resources, and policy for the future, should be channeled in that direction?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. I remind the House that the British contribution so far has been £70 million worth of humanitarian aid made directly and indirectly. Sums of money have been spent on medical supplies and assistance given to maintain health and water services in the worst affected area. I have mentioned the 40,000 people who have been allowed here as visitors and the 68 wounded who are being treated in our national health service hospitals. We have 2,300 troops on the ground running humanitarian convoys, we have run about 200 mercy flights taking in aid so far, and we have provided winter shelter for about 20,000 people in the worst affected areas. The British contribution to what is being done in Yugoslavia is one of the most formidable from western Europe. Combined with that, we are offering to take our share of people.

We could give help to Slovenia. Indeed, there is a case for giving help to Slovenia in relation to Austria. The Germans must really decide for themselves what they intend to do about the flow of people going to that country. It is not a model but a warning—what we must avoid—if we do not control what happens now. We are making our contribution, and matters are not helped by Opposition Members who are not prepared to say that we should be in any way selective when a group of 180 people turn up who they think should stay here.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): As there is so much conflict about what advice and assurances were given, may I ask the Home Secretary to invite the president of the Immigration Appeals Tribunal to review the applications for visit visas made by the members of the group on the basis of support, maintenance and accommodation to be arranged by ALERT?

Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recognise that if that reasonable request for an independent review is not met, he and his officials and his Department will stand accused of duplicity and deceit and another nail will have been driven into Britain's reputation as a civilised, compassionate and caring country?

Mr. Clarke: There is no dispute or doubt about the advice that was given. I have stated the position factually and clearly. In another part of the House, we are discussing the way to unclog the appeals system in this country, which is overburdened with huge arrears of serious cases—people waiting to have their fate decided as to whether they will be allowed to settle here. We cannot start introducing a new appeals procedure to hear about applications from Slovenia in respect of people who have never set foot in this country when we have looked at their visa applications and it is plain that they do not comply with our requirements.

The hon. Gentleman winds up with his usual outburst about outrageous behaviour. Frankly, he is either gullible in believing every version he hears from various groups or he is simply out to be mischievous throughout the whole episode. I leave it to people outside to decide into which category he falls.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): There are three aspects on which my right hon. and learned Friend might have broad support. The first is recognition that the members of ALERT did not have dishonourable motives in trying to help people whom they were encouraged to believe were in distress. The second is that it would be sending the wrong signal to well-meaning groups in Britain if they were led to believe that they could just go in buses and pick up people there and bring them back here. That is not the way to help the victims of civil war.

Thirdly, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the real answer is to move as quickly as possible to take into this country people recommended by the United Nations and the Red Cross so that other well-meaning groups realise that the situation is being coped with?

Mr. Clarke: I accept what my hon. Friend says, and what has been said by Opposition Members, about the motives of those involved. I have no reason to doubt that those involved with ALERT have acted in what they believe to be a humanitarian cause and that they desperately believe that they must get the people concerned to this country. In campaigning from the border, they have made many misleading statements to try to get people here. I imagine that they regard those misleading statements as justified by the higher aim that they are pursuing. I am sorry to disappoint them but, as my hon. Friend said, many other groups would otherwise do the same.

Every international traveller knows the difficulty of going to a third world country or a country where there is trouble. It is easy to go there and see people whom one would like to bring back here for national health service treatment, for housing, and for the better conditions that they would enjoy in the United Kingdom. We cannot have that in respect of the former Yugoslavia. We have already stated to the international organisations our readiness to take in the first 600 or so of those whom we want to help. We are prepared: we could take them tomorrow. In the heart of the fighting, however—as opposed to the peaceful mountains of Slovenia—it is difficult to organise bringing people out. The British Government stand ready to play their part as soon as the 600 people can be brought here by the organisations who are trying to bring them out of the camps.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is it possible for the Home Secretary to understand the heartbreak of those involved, especially the women and children, bearing in mind what is happening in the former Yugoslavia? Whoever was responsible for making them believe it, they believed that they would be able to get to the safe haven of the United Kingdom, at least for a temporary period. Is the Home Secretary aware that in all the interviews that he gave he seemed to lack compassion and understanding for the people involved? It is not a matter of accepting all who wish to come here. The Opposition as well as the Government accept that only relatively small numbers can come. In view of the hopes that were built up in the people whom we are now discussing, however, I believe that the Home Secretary has reached a wrong decision and one of which he should be thoroughly ashamed.

Mr. Clarke: I understand absolutely the plight of Yugoslavia—a country which I know reasonably well—and I can visualise the distress of every displaced family in the former Yugoslavia. There are many people who are more distressed than those at present accommodated through the arrangements made by ALERT in the part of Yugoslavia to which they have been transported by that organisation.

I say again that compassion in this case does not mean simply agreeing that every application which happens to be before us should be permitted on exceptional grounds. The time has come to target our effort, and we shall do so: we stand ready and waiting to take the next 600 refugees referred to us by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that among the people of Britain there is genuine concern about the refugees, and a considerable desire to help on a greater scale? I, too, have been approached by constituents who want to help. What advice would he give? What is the correct procedure that people should follow? Whatever that procedure is, can we please speed it up?

Mr. Clarke: The British Refugee Council will help us to receive and accommodate the refugees referred to us by the UNHCR and then to disperse them in Britain and settle them with people, voluntary organisations and local authorities able to offer them help. I advise my hon. Friend and others to approach the council if they want to make positive offers of help, or offers to receive people from Yugoslavia and take part in the process. I am sure that the British people want to take part in helping people whom the Red Cross and UNHCR ask us to take.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Will the Home Secretary accept that his attempt to blame ALERT cheapens his reputation and that of his office as Home Secretary? It stands in sharp contrast to the altruistic, charitable and Christian motives of the ALERT organisation. Does he further accept that in his reply to the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson), in which he accused ALERT of making misleading statements from the border between Slovenia and Austria, he virtually accused ALERT of lying?

I suggest that it would be appropriate from a man who holds the office of Home Secretary to apologise to the House and to the people who work for ALERT. Does the Home Secretary recognise that it is likely that the 180 people involved will be sent back to refugee camps or possibly to the war zone? In the name of humanity, I ask the Home Secretary to reconsider the decision that he has made—or does he want to take the risk and the consequences of that decision?

Mr. Clarke: As I have already said, ALERT sent out the coaches from Britain several days after it had been repeatedly advised that it would not be able to bring people back into Britain under the new visa regime. ALERT moved the people from Ljubljana, the capital of Slovenia—a country not at war—to the place where they are now. The organisation appears to have found accommodation and treatment for them there. I see no reason why the people should be taken back to the war zones. I do not believe that anyone is standing ready to transport them back there. I do not believe that that is the case. Other groups want to continue to fetch people from Yugoslavia, to bypass the visa regime and bring them here. We must tell all those groups, as I already have, "We respect your motives but, frankly, this is impractical". The British Government must concentrate on acting at the request of the Red Cross and the United Nations, which are more active at the heart of the conflict in Yugoslavia than those groups are.

[Mr. Clarke]

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): My right hon. and learned Friend will be aware of the group in my constituency called Haven, which has successfully brought a number of people from erstwhile Yugoslavia into Melton Mowbray where, incidentally, they have been housed at little cost to the social services. Having found itself in exactly the same position as ALERT, following my right hon. and learned Friend's statement, the group phoned me and I in turn phoned my right hon. and learned Friend's office. I was given a quick clarification of how the rules would apply and told that no dispensation was permitted. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that Haven's behaviour has been exemplary, that he is to be congratulated on making himself available for the quick clarification of the rules, and that those who thwart the rules deserve no special dispensation?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Most organisations like Haven—there are quite a number of them—welcome the Government's stepping in to start to organise what is done in this country. I hope that those organisations, including ALERT, will continue their efforts by contacting the British Refugee Council and helping it to organise reception arrangements for those who will now enter this country at public expense, organised by the Government at the request of the Red Cross and the United Nations.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does the Home Secretary recognise that the basic problem is that he made a cruel and callous decision 10 days ago to introduce a visa regime? The decision was never debated in the House and its consequences are that people at great risk will be debarred from entering this country. We need a proper United Nations sponsored programme so that every country can take its share of responsibility for the people suffering in former Yugoslavia and grant them a safe haven in western Europe. Is not the Secretary of State's policy slamming the door in the faces of people who are fleeing for their very lives?

Mr. Clarke: It is not slamming a door to make an offer to the international organisations to pay for and receive 600 people whom they have identified as the worst sufferers from the present conflict. The rule changes will be laid before the House and can be debated if anyone so wishes. If they are debated, we shall defend them as an obvious and common-sense response to the pressure that we are under and we shall have the support of the vast majority of people in this country, who want us to make an organised response to the problems of the people in Yugoslavia.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for the speed with which his Department and the Foreign Office acted last week to grant a visa to one of the people on that convoy so that he can soon rejoin his wife and small child in my constituency, in a hostel run by ALERT. Does he agree that one of the high priorities which he should now adopt in assessing how the remaining visas should be allocated is to reunite families who have been sadly separated by that horrid war in the former Yugoslav territories?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pressing that case on me. When we went through all the cases, that was one of the priorities which emerged. The six visas that I have granted are largely for people who have become separated from wives, husbands or children in the course of the conflict. It seems obvious that we should reunite those people and it happens that a few of them were on the convoy organised by ALERT.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Does the Home Secretary realise that, every time he has spoken about the Government making a contribution to resolving the problem, he has spoken in terms of the minimum possible number of people being granted refugee status? Against that background, and given the fact that 2 million people have been displaced, will he give the House a categorical assurance that he has not set a maximum number and that every judgment will be made on compassionate grounds? Otherwise, we shall stand accused, as we did in the 1930s, of turning our backs on ethnic cleansing which in that case turned into a holocaust.

Mr. Clarke: I said on 5 November, and I have said throughout, that the numbers that we shall take through the United Nations and the Red Cross are, in the first instance, 150 people plus their dependants. We stand ready to take more and shall discuss numbers with the international organisations. Obviously, the aim of the discussions between me and my opposite numbers in other parts of western Europe is that we should share the burden.

We shall continue to take more people, but at the request of the international organisations and after discussion with them about the numbers that we can take. Comparisons of numbers are usually extremely wild. The comparison usually made is with all those citizens of former Yugoslavia who have made their way to Germany. I repeat that I understand the great problems faced by the German Government. The position in Germany is not a model of what should happen. Most people in Germany realise that they are facing potential disaster due to the flood into Germany of hundreds of thousands of people largely because their families were among the pre-existing large Yugoslav population. I assure the hon. Lady that the German Government are in the forefront of those pressing their European partners to begin to organise more carefully what happens in relation to Yugoslavia.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I take points of order after statements. If the hon. Gentleman will have a little patience, I will look his way later.

Water and Sewerage (Scotland)

4.7 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Ian Lang): With permission, I would like to make a statement about the restructuring of the water and sewerage industry in Scotland.

The forthcoming reform of local government in Scotland makes it necessary to review the way in which water and sewerage services are to be provided. A consultation paper on other aspects of local government reform has already been published, but I considered that water and sewerage should be addressed separately.

I told the House on 8 July that the Government had not yet decided on the future structure of those services, and that I intended first to commission a consultants' study into the technical aspects of alternative forms of organisation to assist me in drawing up a range of options, including ways in which the private sector might contribute enterprise and investment. I said that thereafter I intended to consult on the options. I am issuing today a consultation paper that fulfils that undertaking. Copies are available in the Vote Office.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have to take points of order after statements. Cannot the hon. Gentleman hear the Secretary of State?

Mr. Wilson: My point of order is in connection with the availability of the document in question, which is not—contrary to what the Secretary of State said—available in the Vote Office.

Mr. Lang: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I checked immediately before the statement and was told that the document was available.

The paper sets out——

Mr. Wilson: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. This is what comes of taking points of order during a statement. Points of order will be taken after the statement.

Mr. Lang: The paper sets out the background to the water and sewerage services in Scotland and lists a number of different structures for the industry on which I am inviting comment.

There are eight options set out in the paper, ranging from the re-establishment of a structure similar to the present arrangements to full privatisation. Other options include the grouping of publicly owned authorities and various types of franchise operation. Given the very high level of investment that the services will require in the next 10 to 15 years and the need to manage resources in line with best commercial practice, all those options merit close consideration. The paper sets out in an even-handed way and raises a number of issues on which answers are sought. The Government will take a final decision in the light of the response to the consultation paper.

Water and sewerage are important, indeed vital, services. They take up an appreciable amount of our resources and will require substantial investment in the years ahead to ensure that the high standards that we have set are fully maintained. The challenge for everyone who responds to the consultation paper is to identify the best means of securing that investment. The public will have to continue to pay for those services whether they are in the public sector or the private sector; and it is clear that in either case costs are likely to continue to rise. It is all the more important, therefore, that a structure is put in place that will deliver high standards with maximum value for money and at the lowest attainable cost to the consumer, and which will ensure that the wider environmental interests are also protected. Identifying that structure is what this consultation paper seeks to do.

Several hon. Members: On a point of order, Madam Speaker——

Madam Speaker: Order. Mr. Tom Clarke.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): May I be allowed to put a serious point of order first, Madam Speaker? It is clear that the documents are not in the Vote Office and that hon. Members cannot obtain them. May I invite your ruling on that matter?

Madam Speaker: It is not—[Interruption.] Order. As a matter of fact, it is not out of order for a statement of this nature to be made when the documents are not available. The Secretary of State has given the House an undertaking that the document is available in the Vote Office, but I understand that hon. Members have been to the Vote Office and found that it is not available. It is, of course, up to the Government to make documents available in the Vote Office.

Mr. Lang: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I have asked my parliamentary private secretary to check and recheck, and on both occasions he has assured me that the Vote Office has the documents and is willing to release them the moment I sit down. I understand that that is the usual procedure.

Madam Speaker: That is in fact the usual procedure.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the Secretary of State agree that his statement—and the document, when hon. Members can read it—flies in the face of the majority of Scots, who are utterly opposed to privatisation in any form? Where is the evidence that the services for water and sewerage are seriously failing, that local authorities are not delivering, or that the public are unhappy with existing structures? Why were not these options put to the Scottish people at the general election, as recently as April? Why was there nothing about this in the Scottish Tory manifesto?

If the options are for real and the right hon. Gentleman's consultation is meaningful, will he give us an unqualified assurance here and now that, if a majority of those who respond are in favour of local government retaining control, he will accept their view?

On the Quayle Munro report, will the Secretary of State tell the House what the £50,000 remit was exactly? Will he even now place that report in the Library? If not, why not?

Is not this charade really about the Government finding ways of taking water and sewerage out of the public expenditure arena and dodging their responsibilities on matters as important as health and the environment, affecting every household in Scotland?

Why is the Secretary of State so concerned about controlling the level of investment when investment in the public sector and the private sector is increasingly paid for by the consumer and decreasingly paid for by the Treasury? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, in England and Wales, we have seen the future and it does not work?

[Mr. Tom Clarke]

The prospect of introducing to Scotland the highest ever bills as a reward to shareholders, record disconnections, even greater poverty among the nation's families and children, and lower standards of hygiene and environmental awareness is wholly repugnant to the Scottish people.

Finally, is it not time the Secretary of State met interested parties in Scotland genuinely to discuss with them investment in our water and sewerage industries instead of wasting the time of the House on a document that goes nowhere towards meeting Scotland's needs? Plainly, the Government have not yet put the practical needs of investment above the political concerns of ownership. That is why our campaign against water privatisation will go on.

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman asked about evidence of the services failing. It is not a matter of evidence of the services failing: on the contrary, because of this Government's investment in the water and sewerage industries in Scotland, standards are rising. It is our purpose and intention that they shall continue to rise. The important issue is where the resources are to come from to fund that investment in future.

The hon. Gentleman asks why the options were not put to the public, and suggests that the matter should have been included in our manifesto. The matter arises from the reform of local government which was mentioned in our manifesto. In the light of the proposal to reform local government, it is inescapable and unavoidable that a new structure for the water and sewerage industries has to be achieved because the organisations responsible for them will no longer exist in their present form.

However, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the first consultation paper on the reform of the structure of local government published in June 1991, paragraph 23 of which says:

> "In addition, the provision of water and sewerage services might best be handled by organisations separate from the new unitary authorities."

That is clearly marked out in the consultation paper, which he has had the opportunity to study.

The hon. Gentleman asks about the Government's response to the majority who respond. Her Majesty's Opposition should treat such issues with more seriousness than to pretend that they can be decided on the basis of some kind of trivial opinion poll. These are important issues. We have a practical problem, to which we must find a practical solution.

I invite people to consider the issues, to weigh up the advantages and disadvantages of the range of eight options, six of them in the public sector, which I have set out in the consultation paper, and to let me have their reasoned responses so that we can secure the best future for the water and sewerage industries in Scotland.

The hon. Gentleman asks about the publication of the Quayle Munro report. That report was commissioned on a confidential basis because of the commercial sensitivity of the issues involved, but, in view of the presentation of the options in the consultation paper, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the Quayle Munro report's findings were concerned with assessing the feasibility of a number of options and made a number of assumptions about their potential viability.

With regard to taking expenditure on the water and sewerage industries out of the public sector arena and, as the hon. Gentleman says, dodging the issues of health, he fails to understand the central point. It is because we need about £5 billion of investment in the industry during the next 10 to 15 years that we have to find the best solution so that that sum is not denied to schools, houses, hospitals, roads and the environment. That is the issue that Opposition Members must address. I hope that they will take a more serious and responsible attitude during the consultation period than is suggested by the hon. Gentleman's questions.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My right hon. Friend is to be congratulated on presenting a discussion paper which is so wide-ranging and which gives everyone the opportunity to make their views known. Can he confirm that, because of the substantial sums required to bring the industry into line with European requirements, he and the Government recognise that, with a public sector borrowing requirement approaching £40,000 million, it is nonsense for anyone on the Opposition Benches or elsewhere to suggest that we should not be looking at other ways of funding? At the end of the day, only the consumer can pay. There is no one else who can pay, because the consumer is also the taxpayer, and taxpayers are the people who pay. We need to find the money in a manner that will not overheat the public sector borrowing requirement when it is required for health and other resources.

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is right. He addresses the central issue, which is where the money for future investment is to come from. The Opposition think that we can rely safely on the public sector to find that investment, yet when they were in power, between 1976 and 1979, they cut capital investment in the water industry in Scotland by one third and in the sewerage industry by a half. That is the kind of disadvantage that the industry is placed at when it relies on public sector funding. We must find a way in which the funds can be made secure and available and without prejudice to other services, and that is what I invite the Opposition to address.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Will the Secretary of State confirm that he and his officials have placed restrictions on local authorities over recent years which have given inadequate consents for investment in water and sewerage services? Can he give any good economic reason why it should be easier to raise equity for private finance than to raise loan funding for Scottish water authorities which remain in the public sector with public accountability?

Finally, will the Secretary of State confirm that, if people cannot pay their water bills, the sanction of disconnection will not be one of the options with which he has presented the House and the public today?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman suggested that the industry had somehow been starved of capital investment. He may wish to know that capital investment has just about doubled in Scotland over the past four or five years. He also asked about the continuing reliability of public expenditure. Let me point out to him that, in the 20 years between 1969 and 1989—when expenditure was entirely in the public sector—investment throughout the United Kingdom was under £6 billion. Between 1989 and 1999, investment in likely to be closer to £30 billion—as a result of the privatisation of the water and sewerage industry in England, and taking account of Scottish needs as well. That is five times as much investment in half the time, and it shows that investment is available if we are prepared to view the circumstances imaginatively. The consultation paper presents a range of options that will enable that to be done.

Disconnections are not legal in Scotland; they have been legal in England before and after privatisation. We shall address Scottish circumstances in accordance with Scottish needs.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): I welcome the report, which looks in detail at the intricacies of the water system. Opposition Members may not experience problems in their constituencies, but believe me, there are problems with sewage in the Clyde, and it is about time that they were addressed.

The report offers a wide range of options. It is a consultation document—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I am well aware that it is a consultation document; what I need from the hon. Gentleman is a question—very briefly—that the Secretary of State can answer.

Mr. Gallie: This is a consultation document. When my right hon. Friend considers the consultations, will he ensure that he looks for quality rather than quantity?

Mr. Lang: I am happy to give my hon. Friend that assurance. He is absolutely right. He is also right to recognise the heavy investment needs that lie ahead. Under the EC urban waste water treatment directive, we are required to reduce and abolish sludge dumping at sea by 1998; currently, we dump 75 per cent. of the total. That requirement is bound to create enormous demands for new investment in the sewerage industry.

Mr. Jimmy Wray (Glasgow, Provan): Will the Secretary of State pay heed to the way in which English water authorities have suffered? Ofwat has received 10,000 complaints about water. In the first year—1991-92—21,000 people had their water cut off, and there was a 20 per cent. increase overall in the 10 English water authorities.

Let me deliver a message to the Secretary of State—a message not from the Labour heartlands, but from the Tory heartland represented by the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart). In Clarkston, Newton Mearns, Busby and Gifnock, 15,000 people signed a petition saying that they wanted nothing to do with the privatisation of the water industry. Is that not a clear message from the Secretary of State's own party?

Mr. Lang: Let me draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the Muirdykes water treatment works, which serves the Paisley area. New capital works amounting to £15 million were completed there in the last financial year. Where does the hon. Gentleman think that such investment will come from in the future if public expenditure constraints are imposed on the industry? I hope that he will look at the options presented in the consultation paper, and will let me have an answer to my question.

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson (Aberdeen, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the near-hysterical rantings that we are hearing from the Opposition in no way enhance the debate and the consultation exercise on which we are now embarking? Does he, like me, hope—probably in vain—that, over the next few weeks, the argument will become more rational, more constructive and much more responsible?

Mr. Lang: I fear that my hon. Friend is right, not least because the Opposition made up their minds before we had even published the consultation paper. I hope that they will read it, and will observe that we have laid out a range of options in an even-handed way. We invite responses, and we also invite those who read the paper to answer 12 questions, giving reasons for their answers, so that we can consider this important issue sensibly. Water and sewerage are vital services in Scotland, and we have a responsibility to our constituents to achieve the best.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): Why is the Secretary of State covering up, in a kind of Scottish Watergate, the Quayle Munro report, on which the taxpayer has spent £50,000? Is it because, if we were to see that report from Quayles, which has extremely dubious connections with the water privatisation industry, we would see that it is about how, not whether, Scotland's water, given by God in abundance to the Scottish people, should be sold off to the speculators and second-hand car salesmen who will queue to buy it?

Did not the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) put his finger on the nub of the question: that, because his Government have a £40,000 million deficit in the public sector borrowing requirement, they need to sell off the last of the family silver, irrespective of the effect on the health and well-being of the Scottish people, to whom the Conservative party lied, by omission, in the election when they failed to say what they intended to do with this precious natural resource?

On 12 December——

Madam Speaker: Order. I must have a question from the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Galloway: Is the Secretary of State aware that, on 12 December, tens of thousands of Scottish people will make their objections known in the demonstration at the Euro-summit in Edinburgh, and that that will be only the beginning of the labour movement's campaign to stop this theft in its tracks?

Mr. Lang: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will read the consultation paper, because he will then see that it is an even-handed paper that lays out the options. I am surprised that he should complain about our publishing a consultation paper and making today's announcement, because on 16 July—this was reported in the Daily Record the next day under the heading "House of Chaos"—the hon. Gentleman behaved in an extraordinary and unparliamentary way in the Chamber, complaining because we had not made a statement on the future of the water industry. He really should make up his mind.

Mr. George Kynoch (Kincardine and Deeside): I join my hon. Friends in complimenting the Secretary of State on the consultation paper. Will he emphasise to Labour Members that, if they wish best to serve Scotland's needs, they should embark on a proper debate on how best to fund water in the next 10 or 15 years and how best to manage it? It is likely that Labour will carry on in its normal way and reach a judgment before it considers the matter.

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The cost of water has risen by about 60 per cent. in the past four years, and sewerage by slightly less. It will continue to rise in the future, regardless of the structure that we set up, because we need a dramatic increase in investment in the next 10 or 15 years. It is all the more important, therefore, that we secure the structure that minimises the cost to the public and the consumer, who pays on average more than £100 per household, and maximises the quality of water.

Mrs. Irene Adams (Paisley, North): The Secretary of State refused to accept the result of the greatest consultation—the general election in Scotland, where his party polled only 25 per cent. of the votes cast—and took charge of Scotland's business. Why should we believe that he will accept the results of the consultation on water? What will be the extent of that consultation? How will he reach the vast majority of people in Scotland, and why should we believe that he will accept the findings of a genuine consultation?

Mr. Lang: Of course I will accept the findings of a general consultation, but I shall assess the strengths and merits of the arguments that are advanced. [Hon. Members: "Ah."] Does the Labour party think that we should ignore the argument and have a simple poll? On an issue of this importance to their constituents, who need, deserve and, under this Government, will have high-quality water at the minimum cost, Labour Members really should behave more responsibly and in a more serious-minded way.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Can the Secretary of State explain to the House why, in the course of a £20,000 promotional video on the restructuring of local government, water and sewerage are not mentioned as local government services, despite all the other services being listed? Is that not an indication that this consultation exercise is the same sham, bogus exercise as the Secretary of State carried out on hospital opt-outs? Can he tell the House why, if it is possible to write off £6,000 million of capital debt for English private water, it is not possible to write off hundreds of millions of pounds of capital debt for Scottish public water to allow the required investment to be made? Finally, if he regards Scottish public opinion as "trivial", can he estimate what percentage of the Scottish population support any Tory attempt to steal Scotland's water?

Mr. Lang: On the question of writing off debt, the hon. Gentleman knows that that is an issue that would arise only if it were decided to privatise—[Hon. Members: "Why?"] Because the debt would be converted into equity on the restructuring of the companies for privatisation. I have not reached that stage of consideration, because I am laying out a consultation paper with a range of options on it. The hon. Gentleman suggests that the consultation is some kind of charade. That is precisely what it would be reduced to if I were to listen to Labour party advice. I want people to address the issue seriously and to give their considered responses so that we can make sure that we have the best kind of delivery of water and sewerage services in the future.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Instead of offering a primary 1 lesson on "how we get rain", would not the Secretary of State advance the argument, consultation and discussion better if he were to publish the report of the consultation which he commissioned? What has he got to hide? Why can we not have those facts in order that there may be a real discussion, so that we can see what the facts are? It would advance the case for looking at the issue in a properly objective way if we could do that. There can be nothing commercially sensitive about the finances of what is currently a publicly owned water industry.

Mr. Lang: There are commercially sensitive matters in the report. It was commissioned on the basis of commercial confidentiality, and I am not prepared to breach that undertaking.

Mr. Wilson: I brook correction by the Secretary of State, but as far as I can see, on brief acquaintance with the document, the word "disconnections" is not used anywhere in it. Will he confirm that there is no legal right to disconnect in Scotland at the present time? Will he confirm, further, that no private ownership of water could operate without the sanction of disconnection, as in England?

Will the right hon. Gentleman therefore take into account the fact that it is totally morally repugnant to everyone in Scotland, with very few exceptions, that, in the last decade of the 20th century, in a society that has previously managed very well without the sanction of disconnecting domestic water supplies, such an option should even be considered? Will he thus accept that, if the logic is that it is not to be considered, the whole scheme falls? Will he say now that beyond doubt there will be no domestic water disconnections in Scotland, because, if he will not say it, millions of people in Scotland will say it for him?

Mr. Lang: I understand that the number of disconnections, which rose in the early days of the privatised arrangements in England, has now fallen by 40 per cent., and that three quarters of disconnections are reconnected within two days. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman was not present in the Chamber when I answered this question earlier. There is no legal consent available to disconnect water in Scotland. I have no plans to make any change in that. I shall be considering the range of options in the light of the submissions in the consultation paper, but at present that does not arise.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): Will the Secretary of State explain to the people on the lowest incomes, who are struggling to pay their bills without any rebate help whatsoever, how it will benefit them, how it will help them to pay their bills, if they have to pay not only for the cost of the water and the investment but also for the profits of rapacious speculators?

Mr. Lang: I can understand the hon. Gentleman's concern about the cost of water and sewerage, because Western Isles has an average cost of £167 per household, which is double that in the lowest authority in Scotland and well above the Scottish average. It is precisely because the continuing needs for new investment in the industry in Scotland mean that the figures will continue to rise that we must ensure that the rise is minimised, and that we have the best and most efficient delivery mechanism for the service in the future. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will submit a constructive and positive input into the consultation process.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): What is the considered, professional advice of Professor Kendell and the other medical advisers in response to the horrendous, but true, stories from England of lavatory pans being left to fill up, understandably for financial reasons, in water-metered households?

Mr. Lang: I have no information on those stories. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that his point is relevant to the future structure of the water and sewerage industry in Scotland, he will, I am sure, make a submission in response to the consultation paper.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): The Secretary of State has offered eight options in his paper. Does he consider all eight options to be valid? Does he accept that those whom he consults should make the decision rather than a Government who are motivated by prejudice in favour of privatisation? Will he give an undertaking that, should the people of Scotland, through their local authorities, community councils and public bodies, clearly show that they favour the local authority option advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), that option will be the one that the Government select?

Mr. Lang: I assure the hon. Gentleman that all options in the consultation paper are valid. It was to establish their validity that we commissioned work from Quayle Munro. I can give an undertaking to the hon. Gentleman that all eight are open to consideration. If the hon. Member for Monklands, West puts forward a reasoned and argued case for one option, it will be considered. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will put forward such a case as well.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Does the Secretary of State accept that, in the Borders region, the Tweed basin is a natural water area with one of the cleanest discharges into the North sea in the United Kingdom? Will he also accept that, if anything goes wrong with water or with sewerage, the people have recourse to the officials or councillors who are responsible to them? That would not be the case with the board of directors of a Scottish company, of an English company or, worse still, of a French company, to which my constituents' compatriots south of the Tweed have to go at greater expense. Will the Secretary of State leave well alone?

Mr. Lang: The right hon. Gentleman has advanced no suggestion about what should happen to the structure of the water industry and of the sewerage industry when local government is reformed. One option that we have laid out or something close to one of them will have to be adopted. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will make a submission. We cannot "leave well alone" when the authority under which the water industry operates at present will no longer exist.

I hope and believe that water in the Borders region is in good condition. It may be that the Innerleithen water supply improvements costing £1·4 million being undertaken at the moment will continue with that work. We need constantly to upgrade the quality of the drainage and water delivery systems throughout the country to ensure that we comply not only with EC directives, but with the high standards we set ourselves.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): Is the Secretary of State prepared for the derision that he is likely to get when his document is passed around in Scotland? It does not compare favourably with material put forward by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, which has a far more factual base in the running of water authorities than even the right hon. Gentleman's private consultants have.

Will the Secretary of State add to the information that he is giving about the cost of water to people in the privatised regions of England? The cost for a one-apartment flat in which I live is £109, which is twice what I pay for a four-apartment house in Central region in Scotland.

If the Secretary of State allows the people of Scotland to choose and their choice is for the industry to be financed through local authority investment—and they are willing to pay for it through local taxation—will he accept their wishes?

Mr. Lang: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has managed to read the consultation paper so quickly as to enable him to pass such an authoritative verdict on it. I hope that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities will address the questions laid out in the consultation paper and will let me have its answers. Its views will also be important so that we can secure the best system for the future.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): The Secretary of State has repeatedly referred to the fact that it is against the law in Scotland to disconnect domestic consumers from the water supply, except for technical reasons. Will he now guarantee that, whatever happens, and even if full privatisation goes ahead, that law will remain unchanged and that Scotland will never have to experience the barbarism of people being cut off from the water supply because they cannot afford to pay for it?

Mr. Lang: I have already said that I have no plans for disconnection but, clearly, the future structure of the water industry must be decided and, in due course, when one of the eight options—or one of the variants of those options—laid down in the consultation paper has been decided upon, the other factors relevant to that option will also have to be decided. That is a matter for later.

Mr. Brian Donohoe (Cunninghame, South): Will the Secretary of State give us a categorical assurance that, if the vast majority of people say no, he will respect that response—something that he did not do in connection with the consultation on the South Ayrshire general hospital trust and no doubt will not do in connection with the North Ayrshire trust?

Mr. Lang: As with the hospital trust consultation period, I will assess the arguments advanced and reach a decision with my colleagues on the basis of those arguments. It will be a bad day for parliamentary democracy if we ever abandon that process.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Is the Secretary of State aware that what appeared to be a well-rehearsed leak on Scottish radio this morning suggested that his own preferred option was water franchising? If that is true, it is because he is now so frightened of the political consequences of a direct sell-off of water that he is going for a botched-up compromise instead. Would it not be better to drop both local government reform and any proposals for water privatisation and let us keep the status quo?

Mr. Lang: I am happy to assure the hon. Gentleman that that allegation is untrue. I have expressed no preference and am awaiting the outcome of the consultation process.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Does the Secretary of State seriously expect private investors to invest in water supply services if they are to have no sanctions against those who cannot or will not for any reason pay for such supplies? As the answer to that question must be obvious, does the Secretary of State accept that the only way in which the privatisation of water services in Scotland can possibly work is if powers to disconnect domestic premises are introduced?

Mr. Lang: That is not an issue that I have yet addressed. The time at which to address it will be the time at which we decide on a particular option that might make it necessary. I would point out to the hon. Gentleman that, in England, the number of disconnections has fallen sharply in the past few months.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the Secretary of State accept that his response has been entirely unconvincing? That will be the reaction in Scotland as well as in the House.

In particular, does the Secretary of State accept that the House is not persuaded by his assertion that, because he decided that the Quayle Munro report was confidential, that necessarily follows? We shall pursue that point.

Does the Secretary of State accept that people will be gravely concerned that, despite four or five opportunities, he gave no guarantee that there would not be disconnections in Scotland, and that that is entirely unacceptable? Does the right hon. Gentleman further accept that, in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg), he refused to give an assurance that he would accept the views of the majority of the people whom he says he will consult? What sort of consultation will it be, given that the right hon. Gentleman has clearly decided what to do in advance of the consultation period?

In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray), the right hon. Gentleman gave examples of investment that is taking place under the existing local government structure. Why does not the right hon. Gentleman meet local authority representatives to discuss investment and come up with the answers? Why does not he forget the whole charade of privatisation, which remains repugnant to the majority of Scottish people?

Mr. Lang: I find it depressing that the hon. Gentleman still has not grasped the fact that we are publishing a consultation paper which will lay out a series of eight options, one of which—or a variant thereof—will need to be adopted for the future of the water and sewerage industry in Scotland.

This is a serious matter, and I had hoped that the Opposition would rise to the level of events. Instead, they have paraded naked blind prejudice and unthinking atavistic resistance to any kind of progress that might improve the quality and delivery of services to their constituents. They have given no answers at all. I hope that they will reflect and soon produce an answer to the question of how the £5 billion that we shall need in Scotland over the next ten or 15 years can be found without jeopardising investment in schools, roads, hospitals, housing and a whole range of other developments, which both they and I regard as important.

The Opposition have until the end of January to reflect and consider how to fulfil and discharge their responsibility in a sensible way for the benefit of the people of Scotland. I hope that they will be more serious and responsible than they have been so far.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: We shall now move on.

Several hon. Members: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Mr. Bermingham first.

Points of Order

4.45 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Earlier today, you expressed your desire for shorter questions, and perhaps shorter answers. Would it not be an idea if you used your inimitable tact and charm and let it be known that those who ask long questions or give long-winded answers will not catch your eye? Then the rest of us humble Back Benchers might have some chance of doing so.

Madam Speaker: That is a common-sense suggestion, and I wish that I could take it up. I try to note those hon. Members who make comments and statements rather than asking questions and to bring them to order. If all hon. Members asked questions, I could call many more Back Benchers than I can at present. The hon. Gentleman has made an important suggestion, and I hope that our exchange will be read in the Official Report.

Mr. Eric Clarke (Midlothian): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am bitterly disappointed that I was not called to speak in questions on the statement. I have been here since Prayers, and I agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) says about Back Benchers.

I should like to ask you, Madam Speaker, whether this is to be the end of our debate on the privatisation of water in Scotland. We do not feel that we have had a debate on the matter. It is surely out of order that such a very short time should have been devoted to the document. Can you guarantee that we shall discuss this subject more fully in the near future?

Madam Speaker: I understand the anxiety of hon. Members whom I was not able to call. I cannot call all hon. Members on a short statement such as this. As has repeatedly been said, however, we are talking about a consultation document to which we shall return on many occasions; I shall try to remember the hon. Gentleman when we do.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wish to seek a ruling from you, and your guidance. This morning, the leaders of local authorities in England received a letter from the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment effectively terminating the urban programme from April next year. That serious policy change will affect many thousands of people in our most deprived inner-city communities. The House has not heard a statement on that matter or had the chance to ask Ministers questions about it.

The matter could have been referred to in the autumn statement last Thursday, but it was not. Instead, a letter has gone out to local authority leaders. Is that a proper way for the Government to make such a policy change, and, given that such a change has now been made on an issue of importance and concern, will you use your good offices to arrange for a statement to be made at the earliest possible opportunity?

Madam Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman will realise, we are to have a two-day debate on the autumn statement, and he may be able to catch my eye on that occasion.

On the other matter that the hon. Gentleman raised, I have no control over documents or letters sent by the Government, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will find an opportunity during business questions or the debate on the autumn statement to probe Ministers on that question.

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Bermingham: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I have just heard a point of order from the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham).

Mr. Bermingham: It is further to a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. McKelvey: I have not raised a point of order yet.

Madam Speaker: I cannot take all points of order at once. The hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) will have to wait a moment. I shall first hear the point of order that is further to an earlier point of order.

Mr. Bermingham: Was it not said many times in the previous Parliament that it was courteous to the House to announce policy changes here rather than by way of letters? Will you, Madam Speaker, make your feelings felt on that matter, too?

Madam Speaker: I have not seen the letter so I have no idea to what degree it entails a change of policy. I take the view, however, that all major changes of policy should be announced to the House first.

Mr. McKelvey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Could you advise a Back Bencher who is somewhat concerned? My constituents feel that Kilmarnock and Loudoun are being disfranchised. Over the last five statements and at several Question Times, I have been jumping up and down trying to catch your eye. My constituents can see that on television, and neither they nor I can understand why I fail to catch your eye. If it is something I have done, perhaps you will tell me; if I am dressed wrongly, perhaps you can advise me; or if I have been overlooked, perhaps something will happen in the near future.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman may be a little short in stature, but he has a great deal of personality, and I do notice him. Perhaps he will report to his constituents that, if some of his colleagues were to ask shorter questions, he might be one of the lucky ones who would be called.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The Minister said that documents would be available in the Vote Office, but when we arrived at the Vote Office, they were locked in a secure place and were released only well after the Minister had sat down and a telephone call was made, I assume, to a security centre to authorise their release. The statement was not available. Could you use your good offices to make sure that, when someone says that a document will be available —I think the word "now" was used—it is available at that time?

Madam Speaker: Documents are available in the Vote Office at the moment a Minister sits down. That is the usual procedure. On this occasion there was a hiccup. If the documents were locked up, perhaps the key could not be found immediately.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): May I ask with what I hope is my customary politeness towards you, Madam Speaker, why I was not called on the statement made by the Secretary of State for Scotland?

Madam Speaker: A number of Members were not called on the statement, as often happens on statements and business questions. It is not possible to call every hon. Member on a statement or a private notice question. I have also to keep in mind the business of the House. May I also remind the hon. Gentleman of what I said earlier—that this is merely a consultation document and that we shall be coming back to it on many other occasions? I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will not go unnoticed then.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Another point of order? The hon. Gentleman had not been rising earlier.

Mr. Foulkes: It has nothing to do with Scottish statements; that is why I was not rising earlier. Madam Speaker, you will be aware that often Ministers, when asked direct questions, fail to answer them. May I put it on record that, in a written answer yesterday to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), who had asked the date of the bringing into effect of the full arms embargo against Iraq, the Prime Minister volunteered additional information and gave all the terms of reference of the inquiry of Lord Justice Scott?

That must be a unique occasion, when an hon. Member gets information that he did not even ask for. It is interesting that the Prime Minister gave the information before the Leader of the Opposition could raise it today. I think it should be put on record; it is a unique occasion.

Madam Speaker: I am sure that the whole House will be enlightened and we will all have had our knowledge increased as a result of what the hon. Gentleman has just said.

BILL PRESENTED

IMMUNITY CERTIFICATES

Mr. David Winnick presented a Bill to remove from Ministers the power to claim immunity in respect of documents relevant to court proceedings; to reserve to the trial judge the discretion to decide upon the introduction of such documents; and for connected purposes: And the same was read a First time, and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 11 December; and to be printed. [Bill 85.]

Employment (Age Limits)

4.52 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prohibit the use of age limits in job appointments, training schemes, promotion, retirement and advertising of jobs; to make other provision relating to employment; and for connected purposes.

I was brought up to believe that only young men liked young wine and young women, but unfortunately that immaturity seems to be spreading. One of its more unhappy aspects is that it seems to have spread increasingly to those who seek to employ others.

Each of us who knows the destabilising effect on our constituents of unemployment knows that one of the utterly depressing and often degrading aspects of the search for work is rejection because of highly subjective criteria which are not always clear.

In the past two years, it has become increasingly plain to me that many of my constituents are facing a new and far more subtle barrier than the forms of discrimination that they have met before. Many of them find that there are not only advertised age barriers but that, if they send in their curriculum vitae without their age on the document, they are not even shortlisted, irrespective of the qualities that they might bring to the job.

That is not only an enormous waste of tremendous talent and ability: it is totally uncalled for. When unemployment is high, we understand that employers will want the best person, male or female, but if artificial barriers are raised such as a spurious attempt to suggest that people of a certain age are not capable of doing an efficient task, whole groups of people will be discarded from the employment list without even having the opportunity to present themselves for interview.

Some of the examples are extraordinary. It should be unlawful to specify an upper age in job advertisements. Mrs. V. of Essex, who was in her early 50s and was an experienced clerical assistant, offered to do any office job, for which she had considerable qualifications. She learned not to apply for jobs in companies which described themselves as having "a lively, young office". The only job offers that she has had are as office cleaner or canteen cook, for neither of which she has any experience.

Mr. W. of London, who is in his very early 50s and is a senior corporate executive with international experience, has been applying for posts for over a year, with no success to date. Several prospective employers told him that they were looking for younger members for the management team.

The one example which struck me particularly was that of Mrs. Y. of Manchester, in her 50s, who was a secretary with word processing, shorthand and all the other office skills. Finding it difficult to get any job at the same level, she pointed out that she had worked for the personnel departments of several large companies where job advertisements were drawn up, stating arbitrary age limits. She told Age Concern:

> "I've worked in offices where job adverts are drafted, and I know for a fact that age limits are plucked out of the air, and that they are based on sheer prejudice alone, amid such remarks as 'we don't want any wrinklies here spoiling our fun'."

That would be laughable if it were not so devastating for the people concerned.

In my constituency, we have lost over 2,000 jobs in the last two years, and the result has been appalling for those involved. It was frightening when men in their 50s in engineering and women in their 40s in the rag trade were told that they were too old to take alternative employment. Now, even people of 38, with full apprenticeships and over 20 years' work in the same firm, are told that they are not of an appropriate age to apply for alternative jobs. Executives in their late 40s, with 20 years' experience in car leasing, are being told by other branches of their own firms that it is better to have a young, inexperienced person of 20 in the job.

The position is not only alarming but self-defeating. As a nation, we are not training young people, and we are rapidly creaming off those in their 30s, 40s and 50s who have experience and who are capable of contributing to our affluence. Where will we end up if we continue in that way?

Baroness Phillips of Fulham, who introduced the Bill in another place, said that she had never had an idea or project where she had not been told that it was too difficult or that there were too many problems. She believed that such discrimination should not be allowed to continue. Baroness Phillips explained exactly what she wanted. I must stress that, as she was in her 82nd year, she was not thinking of herself. She thought that it was important that it should be unlawful to refuse a job on the grounds of age, and that it should be totally unlawful to include an upper age limit in conditions for eligibility for promotion or to refuse promotion on the grounds of age alone.

Once upon a time, older Members in the House were regarded as valued members of the establishment and as having something to offer. Perhaps we should understand that experience and maturity are not always qualifications that should be ignored.

Unfortunately, such problems are now appearing in the public sector. Nurses in their late 40s with 21 years' clinical experience in specialties are being replaced by people well down the scale, but not because they are incapable or because they do not have something to contribute: they are being told that they are being replaced because there should be a "turnover"—for which read, untrained nursing assistants who are cheap labour. "Cheap labour" will be the cry of many of those people.

The House should seriously consider the implications of such attacks on those who most need our support. Such a short-sighted policy will cost our economy dear, and it is a policy that we cannot afford to sustain. I ask the House seriously to grant me leave to bring in the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, Mrs. Linn Golding, Mr. Norman Hogg, Mrs. Barbara Roche, Mr. Robert N. Wareing, Mr. Barry Jones and Mr. David Winnick.

EMPLOYMENT (AGE LIMITS)

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody accordingly presented a Bill to prohibit the use of age limits in job applications, training schemes, promotion, retirement and advertising of jobs; to make other provision relating to employment; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 11 December and to be printed. [Bill 84.]

Orders of the Day

Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): I must inform the House that, because of the number of right hon. and hon. Members who wish to speak in the debate, Madam Speaker has decided that there will be a 10 minute limit on speeches between 7 pm and 9 pm.

5.2 pm

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mrs. Gillian Shephard): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This is almost exactly the anniversary of the Second Reading debate—13 years ago—on the first of this Government's Employment Bills, introduced by my distinguished predecessor, Lord Prior. It is salutary now to remember how pessimistic many people then were, against the background of the winter of discontent, about the prospects of any legislation to reform industrial relations. To many people at that time, the problems of British industrial relations—strikes, restrictive practices, violence and intimidation on the picket line—seemed insoluble. They believed that the law was powerless to deal with those problems.

We know now that the pessimists and the sceptics were wrong. The changes that we have made in the law since 1979—for example, to end the closed shop and to introduce strike ballots—have not only proved effective, they are also now accepted by trade unions and employers alike as irreversible. The role of the law in industrial relations is no longer in question.

This is a wide-ranging Bill. It gives effect to a number of the Government's manifesto commitments. It represents the conclusion of extensive consultations. It will implement a number of EC obligations. Above all, it marks a further, important stage in the programme of trade union reform on which this Government embarked in 1979—a programme which has now been endorsed by the British people at four successive general elections.

The Bill has two main objectives: first, to strengthen and extend the rights of the individual—both individual employees and individual trade union members; secondly, to increase the competitiveness of the economy and remove obstacles to the creation of new jobs. In the first place, the Bill provides a range of important new rights for employees—rights which they have not enjoyed before in this country.

We promised in our election manifesto to provide all women in employment with the right to 14 weeks maternity leave and with protection against being dismissed because of pregnancy. The Bill honours both those undertakings. In future, every employee who becomes pregnant will be entitled to 14 weeks leave regardless of her length of service or the number of hours that she works. The existing right to return to employment after a maximum of 40 weeks—the longest period of maternity absence in the whole of the European Community—will, of course, be maintained for women who have been employed for more than two years and the

[Mrs. Gillian Shephard]

Bill makes it unfair to dismiss any employee on the grounds of pregnancy, again regardless of her length of service and the number of hours she works.

Those are important new rights for women in employment. They give effect to the requirements of the EC directive on the rights of pregnant workers which was adopted as recently as 19 October.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): Am I right in thinking that one of the major arguments surrounding the EC directive was the issue of maternity pay to accompany maternity leave? If that is so, if we combine the right to extend maternity leave—something that is welcomed on the Opposition Benches—with the abolition of wages councils, more women will be taken below the lower earnings limit. Although those women may be entitled to maternity leave, their right to maternity pay will immediately be taken away. Are not the Government taking away with one hand what they are giving with the other?

Mrs. Shephard: No, I refute the hon. Gentleman's allegation. In the first instance, the proposals extend new rights to all pregnant women at work and I am glad that he and his colleagues welcome that. I will refer to wages councils in a moment. However, the Bill is concerned with employment law, maternity leave and protection against dismissal. Matters of maternity pay were in doubt because the directive was adopted only on 19 October. That was the main area of dissension between Italy and the Commission and the other member states. That matter is not dealt with in the Bill. It is under consideration by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security who will certainly make an announcement in due course.

The difficult negotiations upon which I just touched in my reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) were brought to a successful conclusion under the presidency of the United Kingdom at the 11th hour. As a result, women in employment throughout the Community have gained new rights, which will safeguard their health and safety when they become pregnant.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): While the right hon. Lady is on the question of employment rights, does she believe that every worker should have the right to be represented by a trade union if he or she so wishes?

Mrs. Shephard: That is entirely a matter between employers and their employees. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is thinking of Government Communications Headquarters, Cheltenham, which is a special case.

Because of the directive, women in France and Spain will, for the first time, have the right to paid time off for ante-natal examinations—a right that women in this country have had since the first Employment Act 1980 became law.

Secondly, the Bill meets our manifesto commitment to give every employee who works for more than eight hours a week a right to a written statement, setting out their main terms and conditions of employment. Employees are entitled to an individual statement, which tells them clearly and simply how much they earn, how many hours they are expected to work and how many holidays they are entitled to. Those provisions meet the requirements of the European directive on employment contracts.

The Bill will also protect employees who have health and safety responsibilities from dismissal or action short of dismissal for carrying out their duties. It gives employees the same protection if they have to leave their work to safeguard their health and safety in the face of serious and imminent danger. Those rights will apply regardless of length of service or hours of work.

Finally, the Bill provides for an important extension of the jurisdiction of industrial tribunals. In future, they will not be limited to hearing cases that arise from the statutory rights of employees, but will also be able to hear most breach-of-employment-contract claims on termination of employment. That will bring to an end the inconvenience, delay and costs caused to applicants and employers when contractual claims have to be pursued in the county courts while others are taken to a tribunal.

All those proposals will extend and strengthen the rights of employees, and I believe that they will be welcomed on both sides of the House.

On the rights of trade union members, let us never forget that this Government ended the tyranny of the closed shop. In the 1970s, as a direct result of the legislation of the last Labour Government, more than 5 million jobs were barred to anyone who was not a member of a trade union. Hundreds of people were sacked from their jobs simply because they refused to become union members. As a result of the closed shop imposed on British Rail by the union which sponsors the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), the legislation of the last Labour Government was found by the European Court of Human Rights to be in breach of the European convention on human rights. That was a shameful episode in our industrial relations history. The legislation that the Government have put on the statute book ensures that it will not happen again. No one can be lawfully denied a job simply because he or she does not have a union card.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North): Will the Secretary of State advise the House what the European Court of Human Rights said on the question of the rights of employees at the Government Communications Headquarters who choose to remain in a union?

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Gentleman must know that GCHQ is a separate case and a special issue. The Government attach fundamental importance to safeguarding the security and continuity of essential operations at GCHQ even if Opposition Members do not and I note with interest that they still defend the closed shop.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): It is interesting to hear the Secretary of State say that Opposition Members do not have due regard for the security of the country. Can the right hon. Lady give an example of a trade unionist who has given away the country's secrets? Is it not true that all the people who have given away secrets have been from Eton, Harrow and the privileged parts of our society?

Mrs. Shephard: It is good to know that the Labour party is alive, well and living over there. The fact is—and I feel certain that the hon. Gentleman must accept it—that GCHQ is a separate and special issue. If Opposition Members do not feel strongly about protecting the security of our country, which is of fundamental importance, it is a great pity.

The Government believe that the time has come to extend the rights of employees further and to get rid of another outdated and undemocratic restriction on their freedom of choice. People should be free to take jobs regardless of whether they are union members and they should have the freedom to choose which union they join.

As a result of the Trades Union Congress's so-called——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) rose——

Mrs. Shephard: I shall make some progress and then I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Lady.

As a result of the TUC's so-called Bridlington rules, many people have been denied that freedom. They were introduced as long ago as 1939, as a means of resolving conflicts between unions over membership rights, and they have always had a fundamental flaw—they make no provision for union members to be consulted or for their wishes to be taken into account. The operation of the Bridlington rules has come under increasing strain as a result. They no longer meet their original purpose of avoiding conflicts between unions, as anyone who has followed the recent history of the electricians' union will acknowledge. It is generally considered that they are undemocratic and unworkable.

Mr. Skinner: Is it not a fact that in the Nottinghamshire coalfield people who chose to belong to the National Union of Mineworkers have not had any negotiating rights with British Coal for several years, despite the fact that the right hon. Lady is making those assurances? They do not meet with the coal board to discuss health and safety matters and many other issues. As for the security of the country and GCHQ being a special case, the truth is that it was not union membership which put the nation's future in peril, but the fact that the Government were negotiating with Saddam to sell him munitions despite the fact that GCHQ intelligence told them that it was unsafe to do so.

Mrs. Shephard: That is very ingenious of the hon. Gentleman. The question of British Coal and the NUM is for British Coal.

Dr. Lynne Jones: If the Secretary of State is concerned about workers' rights, will she introduce the right for the union that they wish to join to be recognised? I cite the case of workers at Burnsalls, at 10 Downing street in Smethwick, where 26 of the 29 members of the work force voted to join the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union, yet the employer, who is paying the atrocious wage of £2·30 an hour with compulsory overtime, has refused to accept their wishes. Will she comment on the rights of those employees?

Mrs. Shephard: Trade union recognition and bargaining rights are different from membership.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): Will the Secretary of State confirm that if an employee of Nissan—where there is a single-union agreement—who is a member of the AWEU decides that he wants to leave the union under the terms of the Bill and to join the Transport and General Workers Union, he would have the right to be represented in negotiations with Nissan by the TGWU?

Mrs. Shephard: As I have already said, that is a separate issue. Trade union recognition and bargaining arrangements are completely different from trade union membership. People join trade unions for many different reasons and not simply for pay bargaining. I am not stating simply my opinion when I say that the Bridlington rules no longer apply. I am repeating the publicly expressed views of the leaders of the two largest unions. The general secretary of the Transport and General Workers Union, Mr. Bill Morris, said of the Bridlington rules in May 1991:

> "Today, when we are about choice and opportunity for the individual, there is no choice or opportunity within them".

The general secretary of the engineering union, Mr. Gavin Laird, in an article in The Sunday Times on 6 September of this year, described the Bridlington rules as > "outdated and irrelevant to modern industrial relations."

He wrote:

> "Employees must have the freedom to join a union of their choice: unions cannot be exempt from people's freedom of choice."

That is what the Bill will guarantee.

The measure provides other important new rights for trade union members. It provides new rights in relation to the election of trade union leaders to prevent the sort of fraud and abuse which occurred in the executive elections of 1990 in the Transport and General Workers Union, when the discovery of 10,000 forged voting papers led to the re-running of the ballot.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mrs. Shephard: I will give way shortly.

The Bill will give every union member the right to a postal ballot before he or she is called out on strike and the right to have that ballot independently scrutinised. It provides new rights to information——

Ms. Angela Eagle (Wallasey) rose——

Mrs. Shephard: I have given way several times. I wish to make some progress. I promise to give way to the hon. Lady later.

The Bill provides new rights to information about how union leaders spend the money which their members provide through their subscriptions, not least, information about the salaries that their leaders are paid. The House will recall how difficult it was for members of the National Union of Teachers to discover how much their general secretary was paid and how surprised they were to find that he had been given a 46 per cent. pay rise—[Interruption.]—taking his salary to £63,000 a year, at a time when the NUT was £1·4 million in the red. The Bill provides a new right for trade union members to be able in future to scrutinise such matters.

Ms. Eagle: The turnout in postal ballots for industrial action is much lower than occurs in workplace ballots. Does the right hon. Lady suggest that a postal ballot, with a probably much lower turnout, is democratic?

Mrs. Shephard: Regardless of the turnout, it is important for union members to feel that they can express their views in private and with the protection of a postal ballot.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): The Secretary of State is making great play of the need for union members to have knowledge of exactly how much are the salaries of the president, general secretary and executive of unions, and nobody disagrees with trade union members having that right. Why will the right hon. Lady not include in the legislation a provision to enable us to know the salaries of executives and members of private companies?

For example, is she aware that when public money is being spent in Scotland, in an area for which she as well as the Secretary of State for Scotland is responsible—the local enterprise companies and the training enterprise councils—the Comptroller and Auditor General said that he could not say whether the LECs in Scotland were being run properly because he did not have access to their accounts?

Mrs. Shephard: TECs and LECs are subject to close audit. The law has always provided for trade unions to be treated as the very special organisations that they are, and there are tremendous differences between trade unions and private companies, as the hon. Gentleman knows.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mrs. Shephard: Perhaps I may be allowed to make a little progress, having given way a number of times.

The Bill also provides a new right for trade union members to decide for themselves how they pay their union subscriptions. As the law now stands, an employer and a trade union can agree that union subscriptions will be deducted automatically from a union member's pay packet. The union member has no say in the matter. Such so-called check-off arrangements can be imposed without consent or consultation. If union members object to paying their subscriptions in that way, the law gives them no remedy. Their only recourse is to resign from the union, and that is not acceptable.

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): The Secretary of State has explained how clause 12 will give ordinary employees and union members the right to opt out of the check-off system. Will she give an undertaking to keep in mind for the future the option of an opting in system for automatic deductions if unions abuse their position in regard to opting out?

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East) rose——

Mrs. Shephard: We are discussing the arrangements as they will apply under this legislation, but we always keep such issues under review, and safeguards are being introduced for union members—[Interruption.]

Several hon. Members rose——

Mrs. Shephard: I have given way about 10 times.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Is it not a fact that it is a crime for an employer to deduct from the pay of a worker any sum of money unless that worker has previously consented to the deduction?

Mrs. Shephard: I think the hon. Gentleman is mistaken. Perhaps he has been reading too carefully the briefing documents supplied by the TUC, which have helpfully also been supplied to me. I believe that there is a genuine misunderstanding on the part of the TUC. It is right that there must be an agreement between the employer and the union, but that right is not specifically extended to the individual. That is what the Bill does. It will ensure that no employee will have money deducted from his or her wages to pay union subscriptions unless consent has been given in writing.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mrs. Shephard: I will not give way for a little longer, having already given way 11 times.

Mr. Dobson: I do not want to continue a host of interruptions of the right hon. Lady's speech, but setting aside anything to do with the law concerning trade unions, is it not the case, and has it not been the case throughout the 20th century, that it is unlawful for an employer to deduct from an employee's wages any sum to which the employee has not previously consented?

Mrs. Shephard: Perhaps I can clarify the matter for the hon. Gentleman. Union members covered by a collective agreement may have deductions made from their wages under the check-off arrangement, even if they have not given their individual consent—[Interruption.]—and the Bill addresses that matter.

The TUC has said that it supports

"a requirement for individual written consent" to the check-off. It claims that there is already such a requirement. That is not correct. The law does not provide such a requirement, though the Bill does, so it should have the TUC's support as well as the support of Opposition Members.

The Bill does not make the check-off unlawful—as it is, for example, in France—and if union members want to pay their subscriptions by means of deductions from their pay, nothing in the Bill will prevent that arrangement from continuing.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Does the right hon. Lady accept—at least, according to the Library briefing based on the consultation document submitted to her—that the British Institute of Management, the Engineering Employers Federation and other employers' organisations said that they were clear that the Wages Act 1986 made it a criminal offence to deduct dues without such deductions being provided for in the contract or expressly agreed with the worker in question? In other words, is it not a fact that the proposed new legislation is not necessary because the existing law is adequate?

Mrs. Shephard: I will try again to clarify the matter. A collective agreement can be taken as consent. The Bill ensures that individual consent is given. People, including the general secretary of the TUC, who argue that it will reduce the income of trade unions to allow union members to decide for themselves how they pay their subscriptions should consider carefully the implications of their argument. If trade union members are happy to have union subscriptions deducted from their pay, nothing will change as a result of the Bill. The new rights will make no difference unless money is being deducted now from employees' pay without their knowledge or agreement. I wonder whether that is what the general secretary fears. He cannot have it both ways.

If this change in the law is unnecessary, as the general secretary claims, it will make no difference. If it makes a difference, it will be only because union subscriptions are currently deducted from employees' pay packets without their knowledge or consent. Once again, as with the introduction of strike ballots and ballots for union elections, those who oppose the new rights in the Bill must believe that trade union members should not be trusted to decide such matters for themselves but only if they are covered by a collective agreement. We reject that philosophy utterly.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mrs. Shephard: No. I must make some progress. I have already given way 13 or 14 times.

Before I deal with the other provisions of the Bill, I must mention another important new right that it will provide. This is the right which was first announced in the citizens charter White Paper in July 1991. The White Paper said that the general public usually have no legal remedy against unlawful industrial action, even when they are its victims and in some cases its deliberate target. Companies with contracts which are broken as a result of an unlawful strike have always been able to seek the protection of the law. Increasingly, they have been ready to use the remedies that the law provides and that is one of the reasons why our strike record has improved so dramatically. But the customer who, for example, relies on a train or a bus to get to work every day is defenceless in the face of unlawful industrial action. The Bill will, for the first time, give the individual citizen the right to go to court to get an order requiring an unlawful strike to be called off.

The Bill contains another measure to safeguard the economy and employment from the damaging consequences of industrial action. It provides for seven days notice of strikes to enable employers to take the measures necessary to protect their businesses and the jobs of their employees from the threat of industrial action. The measure has been widely welcomed.

There is no clearer evidence of the transformation in industrial relations since 1979 than the record of strikes. In the 1970s, an average of 13 million working days were lost each year because of strikes. In the past 12 months the figure was 0·5 million—the lowest figure since records began. We are proud of that record. We need to make sure that we keep it.

Nothing has done more to convince investors in other countries to put their money into the United Kingdom and to create new jobs in this country than the improvement in our strike record. Rather than opposing investment from abroad on the ground that foreigners are "aliens", the trade unions should realise why this country has been so successful in attracting foreign investment. There cannot be anyone in this House who believes that this country would have become what Jacques Delors has called a "paradise for foreign investment" if the United Kingdom was still synonymous with strikes and restrictive practices. Nor does anyone—apart from perhaps a few Opposition Members—doubt the crucial role which our legislation has played in bringing about the transformation of our industrial relations in the past decade.

Now more than ever we need to make sure that the progress that we have made in reducing the level of strikes is maintained in the future. Without investment we shall not have the new jobs that we want to see. But without continuing industrial peace there will be no investment. Nothing could be more damaging to the prospects of employment growth than a return to the strike-happy ways of the 1970s.

Mr. Olner: Will the Secretary of State explain why so many jobs have been lost during this relatively strike-free period? I suggest that more days are lost through short-time working and through members in manufacturing industry being made redundant than were ever lost in the dark days which she so delightedly describes.

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Gentleman has clearly forgotten Britain's job creation record in the 1980s. Job creation was faster and more effective than in any other country in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

The dramatic fall in the number of strikes is not the only evidence of a transformation in industrial relations. Less than half the work force is now covered, directly or indirectly, by collective bargaining. Barely a third of the work force is now covered by national collective agreements. More and more companies negotiate pay on an individual basis with their employees in ways which take account of individual skills and performance.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mrs. Shephard: No, I should like to make a little progress.

Even where collective bargaining persists, pay determination has become increasingly decentralised to local level. These are all healthy and necessary changes, if the British economy is to be competitive and obstacles to the creation of new jobs are to be removed. [Interruption.] Given the ringing endorsement of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner), I give way to him.

Mr. Turner: Will the Secretary of State give a couple of moments thought to workers' rights? In the past few years a growing number of workers in Britain have found that they have hardly any rights whatever. They have no rights to redundancy payments, sickness benefit or unemployment benefit. People are dismissed on a Friday and re-engaged on a Monday. That is the society that the Secretary of State has created. It is based on fear. That is the answer to many of the questions that Conservative Members ask about the fall in the number of strikes. People are cowed by fear. That is the environment that the Government have created. People go without basic rights as a result of the Government's legislation.

Mrs. Shephard: I do not condone bad employment practices, wherever they occur. The hon. Gentleman and I are in agreement on that.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): The Secretary of State mentioned that many individuals have negotiated pay with their employers. So why are the Government removing from more than 2 million workers the right to negotiate a pay rise of more than 1·5 per cent?

Mrs. Shephard: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made clear in his autumn statement the necessity for people who are in work to make a little sacrifice to help those who are out of work. That was expanded by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. If the measure helps employment, most people will be ready to go along with it.

The wages councils are an example of the damaging and outdated methods of deciding pay from which most sectors of the British economy have now moved away.

[Mrs. Shephard]

Wages councils fix rates of pay for their industries on a national basis without any regard for regional variations in levels of pay or labour market conditions.

Two thirds of employees covered by wages councils are paid well above the statutory minimum rates laid down by the councils. For some of them, the councils are simply an irrelevant and bureaucratic burden. But in many cases the effect of statutory minimum rates is to push up the rates of pay of those earning above that level, with results which are damaging both for competitiveness and for jobs. To quote from a recent letter from the British Hospitality Association:

> "Wages Councils inhibit the ability of organisations to construct pay systems which are sufficiently flexible to reward skills and merit and at the same time take account of geographical variations."

That is why the Government have always said that wages councils have no permanent place in British industrial relations. They were first established in 1909 when there were no statutory employment rights, no general health and safety statutory protection and virtually no social security provision. At that time, there was a justifiable case for arguing that statutory minimum rates of pay would provide a safety net against poverty. That is why the wages councils were established in 1909.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): The Secretary of State mentioned earlier the possibility of the Conservative party manifesto including a number of items in the Bill. Will she elucidate by telling the House on what page in the Conservative manifesto the abolition of wages councils was included?

Mrs. Shephard: The Government have always made it clear that we see no permanent place for wages councils in the labour market. We have undertaken extensive consultation on wages councils and that has been the Government's view since 1988.

The justification for the establishment of wages councils no longer applies in the conditions of the 1990s. Wages councils are not a safety net against poverty when 80 per cent. of the employees whom they cover live in households with two or more incomes. Low pay and poverty are not necessarily synonymous.

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): When Winston Churchill introduced the Bill, did he not stress that it was to protect those whose livelihood depended on the industry and wage concerned? Does not the change outlined by my right hon. Friend show that those circumstances have completely changed?

Mrs. Shephard: Indeed, he did make that point and I have already spoken about the conditions pertaining at the time. I believe that Winston Churchill was a Liberal at the time.

Nor is there any reason to believe that removing statutory minimum rates of pay leads to lower levels of earnings. On the contrary, since young people were removed from the scope of wages councils in 1986, average full-time earnings for people under 21 have grown in real terms in all the main industries and occupations concerned.

In any case, wages councils have never provided anything approaching comprehensive protection against low pay. The number of employees covered by wages councils has been declining since the 1950s. Wages councils now cover only 10 per cent. of the work force. I might add that 10 wages councils were abolished by the last Labour Government between 1974 and 1979.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mrs. Shephard: I must make progress as I have now given way 16 times.

The wages councils they abolished included Industrial Canteens, which covered 218,000 employees and Road Haulage, which covered 210,000 employees. Between 1974 and 1979, a total of nearly 600,000 employees were removed from the scope of wages councils—that is nearly a quarter of the present total. If the Opposition are going to argue that the wages councils are some sort of safety net, they will have to acknowledge that they made some pretty big holes in it when they were last in power.

Mr. Dobson: Will the right hon. Lady confirm that those abolitions were carried out at the request of people working in the industries concerned and that Labour Ministers insisted on deferring some of them for far longer than people in the industries wanted?

Mrs. Shephard: A very good try, but the fact remains that it is the principle that counts in this matter. As for the Opposition's attitude, they must acknowledge that they are on shaky ground.

Sir Harold Walker (Doncaster, Central) rose——

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Shephard: I shall give way to my hon. Friend later.

Sir Harold Walker (Doncaster, Central): As the Minister involved in the procedures leading to the abolition of the Road Haulage wages council, may I remind the right hon. Lady that it was because of pressure from employers and trade unions in the industry, who felt that the development of collective bargaining was being impeded by the existence of the wages council and that collective bargaining had advanced to a stage where they no longer needed that wages council. In any case, we could fall back on the road haulage wages legislation, which we introduced and the Conservatives abolished subsequently. As my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said, we sought to keep the wages councils for longer than those involved wanted. The important point is that, in this Bill as in others, the Government are deliberately turning their backs on collective bargaining and seeking to undermine it.

Mrs. Shephard: I respect the right hon. Gentleman for his detailed knowledge of those matters and I thank him for reminding the House of what happened, but I am still confused about whether he was guided by principle or union pressure.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and for the intervention by the right hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Sir H. Walker). Has not every wages council that has been removed, including the recent removal of the wages councils' so-called protection for workers under 21, resulted in the average wages rising higher for that group of workers than for those left within the wages council?

Mrs. Shephard: Yes, my hon. Friend is correct. I made that point in respect of those wages councils covering young people under 21.

As the industrial and occupational structure of the labour force has changed so the coverage of wages councils has become increasingly arbitrary. For example, over the last 30 years the number of employees covered by the Fur wages council has declined from 9,000 to 800. The Ostrich, Fancy Feather and Artificial Flower council covers a total of 500 employees and the Coffin and Cerement Making council only 200.

The whole structure is shot through with anomalies and anachronisms. For example, the Laundry wages council's regulations do not generally apply to self-service launderettes but to those where the employees do the washing for the customers. The Clothing council's scope still assumes that the industry's products are made from woven materials such as cotton and wool. So workers engaged on the same processes using knitted fabrics are excluded. The Catering councils cover managers in restaurants but not managers in pubs. Selling cooked meat is covered by a wages council but not selling raw meat; the sale of radios is covered but the sale of tape recorders is not. Anomalies of this kind make nonsense of the argument that wages councils provide a general safety net of any kind, and dealing with them causes practical difficulties for employers.

The real argument between the Government and the Opposition is not about the survival of the remaining wages councils. The argument between us is about whether all employers should be obliged to pay all their employees above a single minimum rate which would be decided not by negotiation, not by the needs of the economy or of the labour market, not by the ability of companies to pay, and not with regard to individual performance and skills, but by the Government alone.

The Opposition want a national minimum wage, which would raise labour costs right across the whole economy as workers fought to preserve their differentials. Nothing could be more disastrous for competitiveness—or for jobs. That is the real difference between us: we believe in creating a flexible labour market, which can create and sustain jobs; they believe in a national minimum wage, which would cost up to 2 million jobs.

Finally, the Bill will implement changes in the management of the careers service, which were announced in the Government's White Paper "Education and Training for the 21st Century" in 1991.

A professional system of careers guidance is fundamental to the removal of barriers to jobs. With the benefit of expert advice, young people can maximise their potential and use their talents to their own best advantage and that of the community as a whole. The Bill will, for the first time, enable the Government to contract with a range of different organisations to provide a careers service that is more flexible and more responsive to the needs of local people and local employers. The new careers service will not be restricted to helping young people. There will also be scope to assist unemployed adults, people faced with redundancy or those seeking a career change.

There will be a general welcome for the new rights for employees that I described at the outset. I hope that that part of the Bill will not be controversial. Many of the other changes in the law proposed in the Bill and which I have not had time to mention respond to the needs and wishes of many individuals and organisations. Other parts of the Bill will be vigorously debated.

The Labour party remains wholly committed to the principle of a national minimum wage, regardless of its consequences for the economy and for jobs. On that issue there is a gulf between the Government and the Opposition that cannot be breached. But the new rights for trade union members contained in the Bill—the latest stage in our programme of trade union reform—are a different matter.

At the last election the Labour party claimed that, if elected, it would keep the trade union legislation of the 1980s—despite the fact that it had voted against every trade union bill that we have introduced since 1979. Some people doubted whether the Labour party's conversion to the cause of trade union reform was entirely genuine. Today, we shall see.

I am prepared to keep an open mind until I hear the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras speak. I hope that he will bear in mind the assurances that his predecessor, the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), gave about keeping the trade union legislation of the 1980s. I hope that he will not take the line of all his predecessors and attack every clause and every line of the Bill while it is going through Parliament—only to admit in three to four years' time that the new rights that It provides for trade union members cannot be repealed. If he opposes the rights for trade union members in the Bill, he will be making the same mistake that his predecessors made when they opposed the ending of the closed shop and the introduction of strike ballots. By the attitude that it takes to this Bill, the Labour party has the chance to break out of the cycle of unthinking opposition, followed in due course, as the next election gets nearer, by embarrassed and half-hearted acceptance. It has the chance today to demonstrate to the British people that its attitude to trade union law has really changed.

I put it to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras what is unreasonable about allowing trade union members freedom to choose which union they join? What is unreasonable about giving trade union members a right to a postal ballot before they are called out on strike? What is wrong with allowing union members to decide for themselves how they pay their subscriptions? And what is wrong with giving the citizens of this country the protection of the law if they are the victims of an unlawful strike?

Conservative Members have always believed that the law must define both the rights and the obligations of trade unions, and that it must set limits to the destructive power of industrial action. We have always believed that the law has a legitimate and necessary role to play in guaranteeing the democratic rights of trade union members, as well as in protecting the individual and the community as a whole against the abuse of industrial power. I believe that the argument about the role of the law in industrial relations has now been finally settled. I believe that when the history of the 1980s comes to be written, that will be seen to be one of the most important and lasting achievements of the decade. By strengthening the law, the Bill will strengthen industrial relations in this country. That is why I believe that it deserves the support of the whole House.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I start by declaring an interest: I am sponsored as a Labour candidate by the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers, which used to be the National Union of Railwaymen. I am proud of my connections with the union that represents the interests of railway workers, including hundreds of those who work at St. Pancras, Euston, King's Cross and 14 other stations in my constituency. It is the union of which my father and grandfather were members, and it has a proud record of promoting the interests of its members and their families, both through its industrial activities and through political involvement with the Labour party.

Our task today is to judge whether the Bill introduced by the Secretary of State deals with the most pressing problems of employment and unemployment which now face the people of our country. The Bill fails that simple test. When we look at the state of the nation after more than 13 years of Tory rule we are confronted by the following facts. Almost 3 million people are officially out of work, more than 4 million are really out of work, 30 unemployed people are chasing every job vacancy and 6 million women are on low pay.

Britain has the widest gap in the European Community between men's pay and women's pay. More than 2·5 million people who are in work are not paid a living wage, with the result that many of them have to fall back on means-tested benefits paid for by the taxpayer. Fewer than 4·5 million people in Britain are now employed in manufacturing.

Government training schemes do not lead to jobs. Pay, hours and working conditions in Britain are falling further behind those of our European partners. Employers are exploiting the fear of unemployment to worsen the working conditions of their staff. As the Secretary of State recently admitted, every person out of work for a year costs the taxpayer £9,000.

The Bill does not address those problems. It is not that it does not give them top priority—it gives them no priority. Instead, it reveals that when faced with the misery and concern about unemployment, poor training, low pay and exploitation, the Secretary of State gives top priority to fouling up the check-off of union subscriptions, privatising the schools careers service and abolishing wages councils, which provide a safety net for some of the poorest paid workers in the land. The Secretary of State cannot seriously believe that most of the matters covered by the Bill are Britain's top employment priorities in 1992.

The Bill includes some limited improvements which we welcome, but credit for most of those improvements must go to the institutions of the European Community which instigated them—it certainly cannot be claimed by the British Tory Government who delayed and obstructed them, and watered them down.

The legal position of Britain's trade unions is already the weakest in the European Community, but the Bill includes further mean-minded measures designed to make it even more difficult for trade unions to devote time and resources to promoting their members' interests. Under the Government, deregulation for business has been matched by over-regulation for trade unions. However, some of the proposals in the Bill seem likely to cause as much trouble for employers as for unions. For years, the Tories trumpeted the merits of single-union agreements and claimed that they attracted inward investment, but the Bill gives unions a legal power and incentive to poach members from one another. What will foreign investors think of that?

The bureaucratic burden of other proposals will fall on employers and unions alike. The proposal to permit the removal of lay members from industrial tribunals and leave them entirely in the hands of lawyers seems odd, coming from a Secretary of State who regularly assails the idea of the tyranny of the closed shop. There is no shop more closed than the lawyers' closed shop.

In the time available, it is impossible to deal with all the issues covered by this rag-bag of a Bill, so I shall concentrate on four topics: the abolition of wages councils, maternity rights for women, the privatisation of the schools careers service, and the check-off of union subscriptions.

The nastiest part of the Bill contains the Government's proposal to abolish wages councils. Nothing illustrates better the moral degradation of the current Tory party than that decision. Wages councils, which protect the worst off, were founded by Winston Churchill, strengthened by Clem Attlee and retained by Margaret Thatcher, only to be abolished by John Major—so much for a nation at ease with itself and a classless society. As the right hon. Lady said, wages councils are far from perfect—and we think that they should be improved—but they provide a safety net for 2·5 million of the worst paid workers in the land. Most of those workers are employed in shops, hotels, the catering industry, the clothing trade, and hairdressing. Wages councils are important in every part of Britain, especially in low-wage areas such as Northern Ireland. Basic wage rates range from £2·58 an hour to £3·10 an hour.

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): The hon. Gentleman criticises the Government for doing nothing in the Bill to promote employment. Does he accept that all the evidence in this country and in Europe suggests that the setting of a minimum wage, either nationally as recommended by Labour or in a particular industry, destroys jobs?

Mr. Dobson: In brief, no.

Almost 2 million of the people covered by wages councils are women. The Secretary of State has Cabinet responsibility for promoting equal opportunities for women. If this proposal goes through, she will give 2 million badly paid women an equal opportunity to be paid even less. That is not the usual meaning of equal opportunity.

Mr. Heald: Throughout the 1960s, the 1970s and the early 1980s, the Transport and General Workers Union favoured abolition of wages councils. It said:

> "Wages Councils do not represent an effective means of raising the standards of lower paid workers and they should be abolished".

Why have Labour Members and that union changed their tune?

Mr. Dobson: Like any other institution in the world, the TGWU is not always right.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in due course. On second thoughts, having recognised him, I shall not give way to him, so he need not stand up any more.

Who is in favour of abolishing wages councils? The Government have refused to disclose who has made representations in favour of abolition. Apparently it is the lobby which dare not speak its name. We know that only half the employers' organisations involved in wages council industries favour abolition. The other employers fear that they will be undermined by bad employers.

The Institute of Directors favours abolition; it and the Government claim that abolition would be good for the workers concerned. What can they mean? Wages councils set a minimum wage. They do not stop employers paying more than a minimum. Under present arrangements, employers can pay as much as they like, but not as little as they like. In setting up the wages councils, Winston Churchill recognised that market forces do not always work, that employers often have the whip hand and individual employees are weak. When employees cannot get a fair bargain for their work, Parliament decided that the law has a role in protecting them and in promoting fair trade. Churchill argued—at the time even the Tories agreed—that anyone whose bargaining position is so weak that he cannot get a living wage should be helped by the law; otherwise, the worst off would be forced to accept poverty pay, the bad employer would undercut the good, and the bad would be undercut by the worst.

That is all still true, whatever the Secretary of State may claim about times having changed. Apart from the law, there is still nothing to protect a Bengali woman who depends on a job in a sweatshop in the east end of London, or an unemployed Cornish youth desperate for a summer job pulling pints in Falmouth, or a jobless young west midlands woman begging for work with a hairdresser, or the widow in Yorkshire going back to work in a shop after her husband has died.

Mr. Nicholls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: I have already made it clear that I will not.

In one respect, the situation has changed—but for the worse. At the time when the wages councils were being set up, Parliament also took action to protect children who were exploited by being paid children's wages for doing adults' work. The current Tory Government have undermined the laws protecting children so that adults now have to compete with children for low-paid jobs.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Given that most of the occupations controlled by wages councils are universally acknowledged to have relatively low rates of pay, does the hon. Gentleman agree that the conspiracy between the unions and some of the employers to depress wages needs to be broken? In occupations not covered by wages councils, almost all women do much better—as witness teachers, nurses and women office workers.

Mr. Dobson: I accept that wages councils pay a lower minimum basic rate than Labour's proposed national minimum wage, which is why I favour a national minimum wage.

Mr. Nicholls rose——

Mr. Dobson: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman, and that is that.

The Equal Opportunities Commission has argued against abolition. The citizens advice bureaux are against abolition——

Mr. Nicholls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has made it clear that he is not giving way.

Mr. Dobson: All those who have registered their objections to the abilition of wages councils can demonstrate a long history of genuine concern for the low paid. By contrast, the people in favour of abolition are a case study in cant and hypocrisy—and they are all Tories.

I have already mentioned the Institute of Directors. Then there is the Grand Metropolitan company, the boss of which is Sir Allen Sheppard. He was the man who orchestrated the letter to The Times before the election in which it was claimed that a Labour Government would threaten "the spirit of enterprise". To be fair, Sir Allen is an enterprising fellow—so much so that last year he paid himself the enterprising sum of £713,000. He is in favour of abolishing wages councils because he wants to pay his staff in pubs, hotels and restaurants less than current minimum rates. So Allen Sheppard gets £433 an hour while his staff get less than £3 an hour. No wonder the Tories asked him to be their party treasurer.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): Is the hon. Gentleman telling the House that if—God forbid—there were a Labour Government he would bring back all the wages councils?

Mr. Dobson: Labour is committed to establishing a statutory national minimum wage, which would be better than that.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton): On the point about Labour's statutory minimum wage, which was an issue at the last general election, is the hon. Gentleman aware of the comments of the shadow spokesman for transport, who said on "Walden" that if a statutory minimum wage were introduced there would be some shake-out of jobs and that any silly fool would know that?

Mr. Dobson: My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) was telling the truth. When there are changes there will be some sort of shake-out, but we believe that all the evidence suggests an ultimate increase in jobs for everyone as a result of people being paid better.

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Michael Forsyth): I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman's speech, but is the hon. Gentleman saying that it is Labour party policy not to restore the wages councils because Labour would have a minimum wage instead? Is he saying that he would not bring back wages councils if the Government abolished them?

Mr. Dobson: The Labour party will introduce a statutory national minimum wage. We shall then need to consider whether any other special protection should be offered people in what are called the sweated trades—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] Right, let us analyse the problem. Two and a half million of our fellow citizens are paid £3·10 an hour or less under wages councils. We would introduce a national minimum wage which would be in excess of that. If, having consulted the people who work in the industries concerned, and possibly even the employers in them, we thought that some additional protection was needed for the worst off, we would consider that. No doubt we shall enter into such consultations before the general election—there is a long time to go.

Ms. Eagle: Does my hon. Friend agree with the Equal Opportunities Commission and the National Institute of Economic and Social Research, which have estimated that the abolition of the wages councils will lead directly to 25,000 job losses in the initial period simply because of the withdrawal of spending power from the economy which the depressed wages will cause?

Mr. Dobson: That is the other side of the coin of the benefits which would flow from people being paid higher wages as a result of a national minimum wage.

The nub of the issue is why the Government, post-Thatcher, are abolishing wages councils. I believe that it is part of the pay-off to the companies which provided the Tory party with its funds.

Firms such as Whitbread, whose top-paid director receives £330,000 a year, and which paid the Tories £60,000 last year, are in favour of getting rid of wages councils. Trusthouse Forte contributed £86,000 to the Tory party last year. Its best-paid director gets by on £250,000 a year, but he thinks that the company's staff should take a pay cut—I saw him on television saying so. Allied Lyons, another in the catering trade, pays its top director £370,000 a year and contributed £80,000 to the Tories. Scottish and Newcastle, whose best-paid director receives £271,000 a year, is another company which will benefit from this kick-back in exchange for the £70,000 contribution that it made to the Tories. They are all rich Tory business people who favour lower pay for everyone except themselves.

The Low Pay Unit has calculated that the cuts in pay which will follow abolition could cost the lower paid as much as £3 billion a year once the full impact is felt. Some of that reduction in their less-than-living wage will be made up: more people will become entitled to family credit, or to more family credit; others will become entitled to income support, or to more income support; others will be entitled to housing benefit and poll tax rebates or more of both or either of those. Therefore, not all the burden of this bonanza for the employers will fall on the worst off and their families. Some of it will fall on the taxpayer instead, so those Tory employers will be lining their pockets at the expense of their work force and the taxpayer.

Mr. Miller: The largest single back-dated wages council award to an individual of which I am aware was in respect of a late employee of a BTR company owned by the noble Lord Hanson. That illustrates the point well.

Mr. Dobson: I make no further comment; my hon. Friend has made the point.

The Secretary of State has tried to say that abolition does not matter because so many of the workers involved are women working part time who are not the only source of family income. Yet when I asked her how many women covered by wages councils were the principal bread winner for their family, she said that her Department did not know. She could surely have found out before she decided to change the law, but she did not—preferring to augment Tory prejudice with ministerial ignorance. In any case, it is surely a matter of principle that women should receive equal pay for work of equal value whatever they do with the money. The Secretary of State for Health and the right hon. Lady are just as entitled to their Cabinet Minister's pay as any male Cabinet member. That is a principle which should apply to everyone.

That brings me to the maternity rights part of the Bill. We welcome the proposal as far as it goes. Without the stalwart commitment of Christine Crawley, the British Labour party chair of the European Parliament committee on women's rights, backed up by the TUC acting through the European TUC, the pregnancy directive from which this proposal springs would have been quietly smothered by the Government.

The Bill will rightly prevent a woman from being dismissed because she is pregnant. That is a step forward. It provides some cover from suspension on health and safety grounds. That, too, is a step forward. It also provides a new minimum entitlement to 14 weeks continuous maternity leave, irrespective of length of service or hours of work. That is a great step forward. We welcome these proposals, but they do not go far enough.

Why should women be protected from dismissal because of pregnancy whatever their length of service and hours of work but not have the same degree of employment protection when they are not pregnant? At the Tory conference the Secretary of State for Social Security was mouthing on about young women getting pregnant so that they could jump the queue for a house. If the proposal goes through in its present form, there is a real danger that he will be back at the Tory conference next year claiming that young women are getting pregnant to avoid getting the sack.

Mention of the Secretary of State for Social Security leads to the next point. We have been told that during their 14 weeks maternity leave women will receive 14 weeks sick pay from the Department of Social Security. The right hon. Lady mentioned that, but we look forward to the legislation being introduced and we still challenge why it is based on sick pay.

The Secretary of State claimed a lot of credit for the measure, but the House should remember that, as originally proposed by the European Commission and the European Parliament, the maternity leave entitlement would have given every pregnant woman the right to 14 weeks maternity leave on full pay. That would have benefited 350,000 women. As a result of the wrecking activities of the British Government, it is likely that the number of women who will benefit in full from the maternity pay provision will be 16,000 or 17,000. The pregnancy directive and the Bill gave the British Government the chance to catch up with the best maternity provision in the EC, but they have not taken that chance. In other words, the welcome improvements in maternity rights are largely to the credit of Brussels and Strasbourg; the weaknesses are due to the prejudices of the Tory Government.

The next item is the proposal to privatise the schools careers service. Why? Are people clamouring to say that it is not doing a good job. Is there evidence that it is failing young people? Does the track record of previous Department of Employment privatisations suggest that the careers service will do a better job in the private sector? The answer to all those questions is clearly no. The careers service should be helped to get on with its job. Instead, it is to be cast into months or years of turmoil, turned inside out and upside down and then flogged off, no doubt to some friends of the Tory party.

Many people are concerned that the careers service will no longer give top priority to serving the interests of children and young people. They fear that profit-seeking owners will give top priority to their profits. After all, that is their legal duty. Will the new owners give impartial advice and help, or will it be a racket? People also fear that equal opportunities will be denied to people with disabilities or learning difficulties and to others on grounds of race or sex. I believe that the threat is even more fundamental than that: if the careers service is privatised, there is every chance that it will disappear altogether.

Let us just look at what has happened with previous Department of Employment privatisations. First, the Professional and Executive Register was sold off—the outfit whose job was to help employers to recruit from the white collar workless. It operated a chain of 32 offices and was in direct weekly contact with 100,000 job seekers. In September 1988 that organisation, with a revenue of more than £9 million a year, was sold for just £6 million by the then Secretary of State for Employment, now chairman of the Tory party. Speaking of the buyers, he said:

> "There is no doubt they have the expertise and commitment to give the company the start in the private sector that we want for it."

He said that it was

> "a business which I believe has an exciting future. The company will have the opportunity to realise its commercial potential, free from the restrictions under which it operated as part of the Government."

The purchaser in which the Secretary of State had so much confidence was Robert Maxwell and the company ceased trading in December last year. There is now no special service for the record number of white collar workers who are jobless.

The Department of Employment's sell-off shambles did not stop there. It sold or, to be more precise, in some cases gave away the Skills Training Agency and 51 of Britain's skill centres. In February 1990, TICC was given £2 million to take over four skill centres in Cumbria, east Lancashire, St. Helens and Ipswich. By August 1991 the company was in liquidation. METEL, which was given the Liverpool training centre, went out of business this summer. Now ASTRA, the company which was given taxpayers' money to run 45 centres, is in severe trouble. It has already closed eight centres, and has made 1,200 staff redundant. It is now in desperate financial straits, demanding further redundancies and 15 per cent. pay cuts. It could well go down, taking the remaining skill centres with it.

No assurances from the Secretary of State about the future of a privatised careers service can possibly be accepted when we consider the assurances given by her predecessor, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), who now presides over the council tax as he previously presided over the poll tax. Welcoming the privatisation of skill centres in what he called

> "the first successful management buy-out bid in the Civil Service", the right hon. and learned Gentleman claimed that he had > "achieved a deal which is excellent for the taxpayer and for those who want to continue to receive training from the Skillcentres"— provided, of course, that they do not live in any of the dozen towns where skill centres have already disappeared.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Conservative Members look a bit embarrassed.

Mr. Dobson: They have every right to look embarrassed. With such a track record, the Secretary of State really has a cheek to come to the House and ask for the power to privatise the schools careers service when it is doing a good job in the public sector. The House should not give her that power until she has got the skill centres and the professional and executive register up and running again, and helping people who are in desperate need.

We in the trade unions welcome new rules which are intended to protect members' subscriptions, and to guarantee that members are sent full financial details of their union funds and of officials' pay and perks. Many unions do that already, using cheaper, quicker and more efficient methods than those proposed by the Government. We expect the Government in due course to bring the law on company directors' pay and perks into line with best trade union practice.

That brings me to the Government's proposals to require—yet again—that employers have the written consent of each employee before checking off union subscriptions from wages. We believe that the law requires that already, and nothing said by the Secretary of State today undermines our confidence. It is theft for an employer to take money from an employee's wages without the employee's consent.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I think that a misunderstanding may have arisen about what is stated in the Wages Act 1986. The Act clearly provides that an employer may make a deduction from a worker's wages in only three circumstances, one of which is where the deduction is > "required or authorised . . . by virtue of . . . any relevant provision of the worker's contract".

The point is that, when a collective agreement provides for the deduction of trade union dues, the deduction can be made without a worker's individual consent. The Bill provides for that consent to be required.

Mr. Dobson: The Minister should go back to the Box and get a better brief. Even in a negotiated contract of that kind, the worker must signify his agreement or consent to the contract in writing.

Mr. John Evans: Most of what the Minister said applies to deductions relating to, for instance, social and sports clubs. It is interesting to note that the Government have given the workers a new so-called right in relation to trade union subscriptions, but have pointedly omitted to give them the same right in relation to deductions for social or sports clubs—or, indeed, in relation to deductions for charitable purposes under the Government's own scheme.

Mr. Dobson: As ever, my hon. Friend is quite right.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I do not think that the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) is right about deductions for charitable giving. Surely, however, the differences between my hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) relates to whether consent is direct or indirect. Ending that difference would probably bridge the gap.

Mr. Dobson: A contract is not a contract until the parties to it signify their consent.

In propounding this change, the Government referred to

[Mr. Dobson]

"allegations that some employees who are not union members have nevertheless had union subscriptions deducted from their pay".

When I asked whether the Government had investigated those allegations, the Secretary of State said:

"The Department doesn't investigate allegations of this kind."

What double standards: the Government come to the House proposing to change the law because of unsubstantiated allegations about trade unions, but they have still done nothing to change the law to protect pensions from the demonstrable theft that has been going on in the City. In any event, as I have said before, if money is checked off without an employee's consent, it is the employer who commits the offence, not the union.

On top of that, the Government are now demanding that such consent be obtained every three years. What a burden that will be for businesses which are trying to keep their costs down. Why cannot union subscription check-offs be treated like other check-offs—or, for that matter, like direct debit for paying the poll tax? Why should there be a special rule for trade unions? We all know why. It is because the Government hope that they can change the unions into an ogre, to distract attention from what is going on in Britain. They hope to make it harder for unions to collect subscriptions and maintain their finances. They hope that, ultimately, such a change will undermine union help for the Labour party by reducing the donations that unions can make. What a cheek that is when the Tory party receives millions, in secret, from Greek fascists, Hong Kong insider dealers and foreign fraudsters who are given an easy ride in Britain; now those self-same Tories are trying to challenge the legitimacy of funds fairly and openly given to the Labour party by nurses, fire fighters, coal miners, dinner ladies and doctors.

As I have said before, the Bill is largely irrelevant to Britain's current employment problems. If the Government persist with it, we shall try to strengthen the better clauses and expose the spite and hypocrisy which lie behind the worst. But it would be better if the Secretary of State took the Bill away and came back with an improvement.

I ask the Secretary of State to think again. She says, as every Cabinet Minister does, that her party believes in choice. She and I are of an age. I remind her of the choice that was available to us, but is denied to the generation now leaving school and college. We both graduated in the early 1960s. When I applied for jobs I received offers from several employers, and I had a choice of jobs, pay and location. I am sure that the Secretary of State had as wide a choice as I had, or an even wider choice. That choice is no longer available.

For every person who was out of work when the Secretary of State graduated in 1961, 14 people are out of work today. In that year, the number of people seeking jobs scarcely exceeded the number of vacancies. Today, 30 people are chasing every vacancy. Choice has not widened for those leaving school and college—it has narrowed, and many have no choice and no job. They feel let down, and they have been let down.

The Secretary of State and I, with others of our generation, were the principal beneficiaries of full employment, and of the commitment by Governments all over the developed world to the belief that full employment was good for the world economy, good for growth and, above all, good for people. They were right. What we want now is not the introduction of petty measures like these; we need the vision of a better world, and a long-term ambition to return to full employment with all our people at work. We need the political commitment for that to be brought about. Full employment was good for the Secretary of State, for me and for our generation, and it is the least that we can offer to our children and grandchildren.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): In a written answer given on 29 October, when asked for the Secretary of State's estimate of the number of new jobs that would be created following the abolition of wages councils and for sight of the evidence on which that evidence was based, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State ended his answer with the words:

"We do not have the information to quantify the number of jobs that are inhibited by statutory minimum rates; and attempts to do so are not likely to be successful."—[Official Report, 29 October 1992; Vol. 212, c. 825.]

That, I think, was a proper answer; certainly a large amount of research evidence is not conclusive in any direction.

I intend to return to the subject of clause 28. First, however, I wish to say something about trade unions and their links with the Labour party. Half the members of trades unions do not belong to unions that are unions affiliated to the Labour party or that operate a political levy. It would have been better if more trades unions had dropped the political levy.

It is disgraceful to see public sector unions tying themselves to one political party. Although the National Association of Local Government Officers is not affiliated to the Labour party, it is disgraceful to see it spending its money in such a way that it appears to have swallowed all of Labour's propaganda.

I am a member of the Transport and General Workers Union, but I do not pay the levy. It supports a political party that has lost the past four general elections. I do not believe that the Labour party will treat trade union issues in a fair-minded way as long as it relies so much on trade union affiliations. The Tory party will not consider employment issues in the unbiased way that we should as long as so many trade unions are affiliated to our political opposition.

I was president of the Conservative Trades Unionists in 1979. Part of my discussions with Harvey Thomas may have led to his brilliant organisation of the trade union members' rally on the last Sunday of the campaign at Wembley. It helped to deal with the issue of whether Conservatives in government could deal with trades union issues.

Evidence of the past 13 years has shown that we have better understanding of trade union leaders and have received as much support from trade union members and their families as we do from many other groups. We still have the capacity to get things wrong—or, to put it more positively, there are normally ways of improving our trade union legislation.

On Report, I intend to vote against clause 28, because I believe that we have made a mistake. I have been trying to advance my view since I was a Minister in the Department of Employment between 1984 and 1986. I have tried to take up the matter with Ministers, and I am grateful for my recent meeting. I was part of the 1985 review of wages councils, but was not at the Department when conclusions were reached. I can, however, refer the House to what appeared to be the best summary of the consultation. The reply of my right hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Sir John Cope) in column 557 of Hansard on 21 March 1989 showed that, from the number of responses to the consultative document on wages councils, there was little evidence that people particularly wanted to abolish them. I am not aware of any significant consultation since then.

On leaving the Department of Employment, I joined the Department of Transport and spent much time with what might be called the hospitality industries—working men's clubs, non-profit-making clubs, licensed victuallers and publicans. Unfortunately, I saw little of the British Hospitality Association, which is normally quoted as an opponent of the wages council system. Working co-operatively with many people across a broad spectrum in the alcohol trade—health and safety inspectors and trade union members—I encountered few employers who found the wages councils' minimum rates a burden.

I do not want to pretend that those rates have not been effective. I should not want to argue that they have not eliminated job opportunities, because at the margin they clearly have, especially on the fringes of employment opportunities, where people face a choice between work or no work, and also in areas where there are normally job choices, except in the depths of recession, but where exploitation or lack of skill in the labour market has meant that people have taken jobs despite being grossly exploited.

Mr. Nicholls: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Bottomley: In a moment. If I may say so, I think that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) unfairly discriminated against my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) by not allowing him to intervene.

Mr. Nicholls: How does my hon. Friend square the point that he is now making about voting against clause 28? I have reminded myself of the evidence on the point, because I subsequently had the same responsibility as my hon. Friend. I have a quotation, chosen almost at random, that the hon. Gentleman gave in a written reply:

> "There is general agreement that the abolition of wages councils would slow down pay increases resulting in an increase in employment for both young people and adults."—[Official Report, 11 June 1985; Vol. 80, c. 399.]

I fully accept that collective responsibility binds us to curious things sometimes, but I should have thought that the speech that my hon. Friend is now making would have read well as a resignation speech; what I do not understand is how it came to be made in the House today.

Mr. Bottomley: If my hon. Friend—I shall refer to him as that rather than as the hon. Gentleman, which is how he referred to me—were to pay me the courtesy of listening with his ears rather than his mouth, he would discover that I have said that I am willing to concede that without wages councils some more people—[Interruption.] I said it with a smile—might have work, and other hon. Members will have heard me say that. That is consistent with the answer that my hon. Friend quoted from 1985.

My views have not changed, but I believe that my party's have. If it had indicated its intention to abolish wages councils, I would have expected to see some reference to it in the Green Paper on industrial relations and explicit reference in the election manifesto. Unless I have misread the manifesto or overlooked something in the Green Paper, I do not think that it was there.

I apologise for the way in which I responded to my hon. Friend, but he asked for it.

Mr. Nicholls: Would the hon. Gentleman like to talk about some of the other things that he has said over the years, because that was not an isolated example? Numerous examples appear in Hansard of the hon. Gentleman throwing his weight and authority behind the proposition that wages councils were bad for the lower paid. Unless my hon. Friend is going to try to say that this is an isolated example—I have done my homework, and it is not—he must say what is now different, apart from the fact that he and I are now sitting on the Back Benches rather than on the Treasury Bench. The truth is not that moveable.

Mr. Bottomley: The House would become rather bored if we continued this interchange too long. My hon. Friend said that he could give further examples of my comments on wages councils. I should be happy to consider all the points, but I doubt whether they will be inconsistent with what I am saying now or with what I was saying before he intervened.

I was talking about areas where there are normally good employment opportunities, yet where people can still be grossly exploited. There have been 14 prosecutions for illegal underpayment in the past year—twice as high as the year before—and there was some reason for them. More than £1 million was recovered for 12,000 workers, the majority of whom were part-time workers working fewer than 37 or 40 hours a week.

There was a reason why those employees were willing for wages inspectors to seek repayment of the wages of which they had been cheated and unlawfully denied. In many cases, workers do not make such requests because they fear losing their job, but if three times out of four employees are willing to have their wages chased up we cannot argue that they are frightened of losing their jobs. Such people want the protection of the law.

I suspect that the Department of Employment could have organised a survey of workers in wages councils industries. In fact, it would have been proper for the Department to have conducted a survey of employers in industries employing 100,000 workers or more. I think that many employers would have expressed some inhibition. I have seen, for example, a letter from a member of the British Hospitality Association saying that he would prefer more freedom, which I can understand.

I can also understand people who argue that pay restraint in the public sector should be copied by more people in the private sector. If a wages council suggested a pay increase of 4 per cent. when many people were receiving increases of 1·5 per cent. or nothing, that would be destabilising.

If that is the problem that the Government think they are facing, and if it is the change between the Green Paper and the manifesto, they could say that wages councils cannot recommend increases in the next year or that council rates should be dropped by 10 per cent. or 15 per cent., if that becomes an important issue. My guess is that the Government are trying to crawl into an area of logical extremism. The Labour party, with its statutory minimum rate, sometimes defined as an hourly rate and sometimes as a weekly income, is at one extreme. That did not find a great deal of favour during the general election and was not supported by many of the trade unions for much of the time that I have been involved in industrial relations.

As a fellow of the Institute of Personnel Management, I sometimes see some of the representative comments made by bodies, with some of which I agree and some of which I disagree. My trade union, the TGWU, opposed the statutory minimum pay rate for some time, and the Trades Union Congress opposed it until the National Union of Public Employees and the Confederation of Health Service Employees managed to generate enthusiasm for it.

I believe that there is a middle way between going for a statutory minimum rate for everyone and what some people, including, I expect, my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge, who succeeded me at the Department of Employment, would argue for: a total free market.

I have never quite understood why those who believe in a total free market bother to come into Parliament. They do not need Parliament to intervene. I think that there are good arguments for Parliament to intervene in some cases, and here I make a passing reference to clause 24, which means that people, no matter how short their employment, cannot be dismissed for taking up the health and safety at work issue. That is an issue which I and many other hon. Members on both sides of the House were raising a year ago in relation to offshore oil industries and work on the mainland of Britain as well. Those are the sorts of areas in which I think it is perfectly reasonable to interfere with the free market. It cannot be said that all things are the same in this respect.

I do not believe, further, that in the depths of a recession it is right to take away all existing protection for those who are often on low pay, when there are clearly pressures for their rates of pay to be reduced even further without necessarily a significant change in employment levels.

My hon. Friend the Member for Teignmouth, together with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, made reference to the change in the rates of pay for people under the age of 21. That was a change in the wages council system that I would support now, had it not already happened.

Reference was also made in some written material to the fact that the numbers employed had also changed after 1986. From 1986 to about 1989—probably the latest available figures—we were at the top of the boom; we were towards the end of eight years of consistent economic growth.

Those were the circumstances in which we were most likely to see an increase in both pay and employment opportunities, especially when a growing number of people under the age of 21 were going into further and higher education and so withdrawing from the labour market. So there are all kinds of consistent reasons why that does not necessarily support an argument that the abolition of wages councils in itself has a significant effect on either the rate of pay or the numbers under the age of 21 employed.

My argument is that, especially at this time, it would be wrong to withdraw all the existing minimum pay arrangements for 2·5 million people, even if only one in four are directly affected because they are at or around the minimum pay rate. It is not the right time to do it and it is not the right way to do it.

I hope that the Government will look upon this argument in a rational way and ask themselves what kind of Government they want to be. I was brought up with the idea that those with broader shoulders should carry the greatest weight when times are rough. I do not believe that everything that helps to make pay rates higher should be abolished.

I make the point not just to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State but to the Government generally that I have seen them agreeing pay rates for people under 21 when Government do not employ many people under the age of 21. They quite cheerfully agreed with trade unions that the rate of pay for 16-, 17- and 18-year-olds should continue to go up when the number of people in those categories employed in the various Departments is probably less than 100.

The effect of trade unions in negotiation with Government or private employers is that rates of pay are agreed which are way above the market clearing rate; they are the result of free negotiation, a balance of arguments, trying to deal with retention and with recruitment issues, not just in the depth of recession but throughout the economic cycle.

I hope that in Committee, or, if not then, at Report stage, whatever the other merits of this Bill, clause 28 will be examined not just by those who oppose it, but by those who think that they support it. I hope that they will look at their reasons and at the effects and ask themselves whether straight abolition of the minimum pay system for 2·5 million people, no matter whether they are mainly part-time or mainly female, just on the ground of free market consistency is right.

Sir Harold Walker (Doncaster, Central): The Secretary of State reminded us that it was almost exactly 13 years ago that the then Secretary of State for Employment, now Lord Prior, introduced a Bill with the statement that Conservative party policy in industrial relations was a "step by step" approach. On that occasion I said to the House from the Dispatch Box that that statement was not an off-the-cuff piece of rhetoric but a declaration of war on the trade unions—the salami tactic of cutting union power down slice by slice. The Bill before the House today is yet another step in that continuous, unabated process, handed down from Minister to Minister like some sacred Chingford principle, in pursuit of Lord Tebbit's once declared aim of "neutering" the unions.

The Secretary of State suggested that the great improvement in industrial relations as measured by the fall in the incidence of days lost owing to industrial disputes was testimony to the effectiveness of the law that had been passed. I suggest to her that, as has been suggested by some of my hon. Friends, the reality is that the enormous growth in unemployment has been the chastening discipline. If she wants to bandy figures, she said that in 1979 a total of 13 million days' production were lost due to industrial disputes. I ask her to set against that the fact that this year there will be at least 100 million days' production lost due to unemployment.

Mr. Dobson: I think that my hon. Friend may be underestimating; it is, after all, 4 million a day.

Sir Harold Walker: My hon. Friend is right to correct my arithmetic and I am grateful to him.

We welcome some of the clauses in the Bill: the provisions applying to pregnant women at work, the written statement of terms and conditions of employment, the health and safety provisions and the transfer of undertakings provisions. I thought that the Secretary of State was less than generous, however, when she said that these were all measures being introduced for the first time. It was the Employment Protection Act 1975 which made the first provision for maternity pay and maternity leave and which first introduced the obligation on employers to provide a written statement of the terms and conditions of employment. The present Bill, in a very welcome way, extends those provisions to other groups.

I am astonished that nothing has been said about clause 26, relating to the application to the public sector of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations, made under the acquired rights directive. I read that, following publication of the Bill and as a result of court action being pursued against the Government by the European Commission, legal experts believe that the compulsory competitive tendering system is on the edge of collapse. Apparently the European Commission has petitioned the European court to rule that the United Kingdom Government have been wrong to exclude the public sector from the Transfer of Undertakings Regulations. That is reflected in the Bill before us today. The Commission is also pursuing action, as I understand it, to determine that the directive applies prior to the introduction of the Bill in the House—that is, retrospectively.

Until those matters are resolved, the policy of compulsory competitive tendering seems to be in total disarray. Apparently, the Department of the Environment says that for the time being it is for each local authority to decide in each case whether its proposals amount to a transfer under TUPE, but how can they do that in the absence of firm, clear guidelines? In the event of their decision being proved later to have been a wrong judgment, who picks up the tab for compensation claims?

The Government will be aware that a recent decision of the European court found that where a member state had failed to implement a directive it was for that Government to recompense individuals who had lost out. I wonder just how many workers have lost their jobs or had their terms and conditions of employment significantly worsened because of compulsory competitive tendering. Presumably, if the Commission wins its case, there will be retrospection at least to the beginning of compulsory competitive tendering. As one legal expert put it in The Independent last Friday, the Commission appears to have driven a coach and horses through compulsory competitive tendering.

As has been said, clause 11 appears to give a qualified right for any individual to join any trade union of his choice. I wonder whether the Secretary of State thought that through. I thought that if there was one point in the industrial relations controversy on which there was some consensus, it was the structure of the trade union movement. I thought that there was general agreement in the House that it would be for the benefit of industrial relations if there were fewer unions—not fewer trade unionists because I am in favour of more trade unionists. Many of the union mergers in recent years have been welcomed, not least by employers.

The Government now seem to be going in the contrary direction because the proposals will inevitably encourage the formation of small, breakaway unions with a consequent proliferation of the inter-union conflict which so harmed industrial relations in the past. I thought that we had seen the last of that.

Furthermore, the proposals will lead to an unwelcome fragmentation of collective bargaining. The Government are not concerned about that because they do not believe in collective bargaining. It seems that the word "collective" has acquired unfavourable connotations, like the word "society". Things are good if they are done by one person. It is like the quotation from "Animal Farm":

> "Four legs good, two legs bad."

The Government seem to say, "individual good, collective bad." The Government are against collective bargaining, so they will not worry too much about the fragmentation.

It has been said that trade union membership is effective only in so far as it is accompanied by recognition for bargaining purposes by the employer. The question has been asked and deserves an answer: to what extent will employers be obliged to recognise the union of the employees' free choice? Throughout my experience in industry, people could join any union they wanted. The problem was always in getting recognition by the employer.

Clause 19 invites any Tom, Dick or Harry to take legal action if he feels that he is being affected by a dispute, no matter how remote his interests might be. Industrial disputes are difficult enough to resolve in most cases without third-party intervention or the deliberations of the courts. The proposal is an open invitation to the frivolous litigant and it is a potential disaster for those who have to manage industrial relations.

I will respect the obligation to keep to the time limit for those who are to follow. I join those who have made comments on the wages councils and I link those comments with my comments on collective bargaining. I note in passing the comment of the British Institute of Management, which said:

> "In the middle of a recession the Government surely has higher priorities than abolition of Wages Councils and new union curbs."

It is not only the wages councils which have been the subject of attack over the years. Since 1979, the Conservative party has sought to destroy anything that provided any protection for the weakest, most vulnerable and most poorly paid in our society. The fair wages resolutions were scrapped. Section 8 of the Terms and Conditions of Employment Act 1959 was scrapped. Schedule 11 to the Employment Protection Act 1975 was swept away. The Road Haulage Wages Act 1938 was swept away. We sought to declare war on low pay, but the Conservatives are making war on the low paid. The Government have renounced International Labour Organisation convention No. 94 which required Governments and their contractors to behave like good employers.

[Sir Harold Walker]

I make it clear, if I have not done so in my earlier intervention, that I am not in the ranks of those who seek to preserve into perpetuity every wages council. I believe that the best way to improve the terms and conditions of employment is through collective bargaining conducted by strong trade unions with responsible employers and organisations.

The Government are hostile to collective bargaining, as they have made clear by deliberately filleting from the terms of reference of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service anything which applies to collective bargaining. When ACAS was established, having been proposed by Michael Foot, it was intended that it should be a conciliation and arbitration service—full stop. I persuaded him that it should have a wider role than the previous Commission for Industrial Relations had had. I suggested that it should look more widely at matters concerned with collective bargaining so that it could facilitate the development of good industrial relations through collective bargaining. Now the Government are sweeping all of that aside.

The Government may not stop at wages councils because there is yet another step to be taken—the abolition of the agricultural wages boards. The Secretary of State has kept silent about that. Will she give us an assurance that those boards and the millions who are protected by them will not be sacrificed as all the other protections have been?

There may be occasions when individual wages councils are an impediment to the growth of collective bargaining and to effective trade union roles. The existing statutory framework allows for that and makes provision for it. The provisions in the Bill are unnecessary. In circumstances in which the Government have deliberately impeded the development of alternative protection, the wholesale abolition of the councils can only be regarded as the action of people who are callously indifferent to the evil consequences of their actions.

Like much else in the Bill, clause 28 is yet another step in the sustained and deliberately cynical policy of attacking the hard-won rights of working people, weakening their trade unions and undermining collective bargaining. I look forward to the day when a Labour Government will sweep away the odious elements in a succession of anti-trade union laws introduced by the Conservative party and replace them with fair and equitable provisions which will not only encourage good industrial relations but will enhance the working lives of millions of our people.

Sir Michael Neubert (Romford): The right hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Sir H. Walker), whose authority in these matters I readily recognise, may not agree that trade union reform has been the single most effective and least disputed achievement of the Conservative Government since 1979. There have been many other remarkable and radical changes in those years, each attracting its passionate advocates and equally vociferous opponents. Some of the developments have been tarnished by the passage of time, whereas others take on a different aspect in changing circumstances. All are open to question by thrusting revisionists, writers of political memoirs and my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden). Hon. Members should read The Daily Telegraph today.

There is no question but that for the majority of people, not least members of trade unions, the reform of the unions has been seen as an unqualified success. Conservative candidates in the recent general election were able to campaign on the issue confident in the knowledge that in 1991 we saw the lowest number of days lost due to strikes since records began one hundred years earlier. The significance of that fact was not lost on the British people, and it was a major factor [illegible] their decision to re-elect the Conservative Government.

That fact was also a major factor in the decision of so many foreign companies to invest in our country. It is not simply a matter of getting a foot in the door of the European Community. There are 11 other countries in which such a door could be found. The significant fact is not only that we are members of the European Community, but that we have a good industrial climate in which new enterprises can prosper. I give many thanks to the Conservative Government for that and for the Bill.

Despite the massive advances in the past 13 years, reform of the unions remains unfinished business. Because of the extent to which the proposals will have an impact on industry generally, I must declare an interest as an adviser to the Federation of Master Builders.

I welcome the Bill, which I see as a further step in the right direction and I congratulate my colleagues in the Government on bringing it forward so soon after our return from the summer recess. The Bill introduces what I see as new safeguards. It contains safeguards for the community. Labour Members do not talk much about the general public except in passing references to Tom, Dick and Harry—a masculine view of the public. To me, the proposal to require notice of seven days before a strike is undertaken is of immense value. I welcomed the proposal the day it was announced, especially as Londoners have suffered more than most from such strikes, especially on their railways and other transport systems.

London is our capital city. It has a complex commercial and industrial society, so it needs protection. For some years I advocated that essential services should be required not to undertake strike action and that such an undertaking should be a condition of the contract of employment. If that is not to be, the Bill gives at least some protection against the hazard of strikes called without notice which can disrupt the lives of so many innocent parties. At least there will now be one week's notice.

I do not want to comment too much on an individual strike. However, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), the Opposition spokesman, is a member of the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers. London again faces a tube strike. We have forgotten what it is like to face such disruption to our everyday lives. Such a strike would be a very real prospect if it had not been for previous legislation. The fact that the Bill will strengthen the legislation is very welcome.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): The hon. Gentleman may be interested to know that, as a member of the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers, I am following the London Transport saga with some interest. If the hon. Gentleman casts his mind back to 1972, when a Conservative Government first insisted on ballots being held before industrial action could take place, he will recollect that the railwaymen, including the then National Union of Railwaymen, were the first to be balloted on industrial action and that the result was that the vast majority of railway workers were hardened in their view that a strike was necessary.

If the hon. Gentleman is not careful, he will fall into the trap of overlooking the fact that, in the current dispute with London Transport, once a ballot has taken place, it will be extremely difficult to get people back to work—despite agreements reached by their leaders. The hon. Gentleman should not regard a ballot as a panacea or think that it will solve the current industrial problems in London.

Sir Michael Neubert: As a representative of parliamentary democracy, I have nothing against ballots: I welcome them because they reflect people's free democratic choice, even if it is a mistaken choice. That is important, in strikes as in anything else.

I welcome the creation of a commissioner for protection against unlawful industrial action—although the phrase does not exactly trip off the tongue. Something more succinct such as "ombudsman" might have been more helpful. I am interested to know how his office—I assume that the commissioner will be a man, although that may not be so—will be funded. How will the work be publicised, and how easy will it be for the individual citizen to take advantage of the commissioner's services? Under the control of pollution legislation, we have an "aggrieved citizen" procedure. It is there in law, but how many individuals are able and confident enough to use it? I shall be interested to know how the commissioner's office will work, what financial assistance will be given, and whether advice on proceeding to the court to seek the necessary injunction to stop the action will be included.

The Bill also contains safeguards for union members. I fully approve of a fully postal ballot, independently scrutinised, before every strike. That is a welcome advance. I naturally support protection against fraud and abuse in trade union elections. Presumably no Opposition Member will oppose that. I welcome the protection of individual union members against the mismanagement of their union's finances. That is another important consideration. I also welcome people's freedom to choose the union of their choice. Why should not trade unionists, like other members of the public, have choice extended in matters which are so important to them?

In April, the Conservative party enjoyed its fourth successive election victory. To find a precedent for a fourth successive general election victory, we have to go back as far as 1826. The general strike of 1926—100 years later—provides another landmark in politics, and a legacy on which attention is focusing again today. The year after the general strike—this, perhaps, explains some of the Opposition's sensitivity regarding what are apparently innocuous proposals—the Tory Government introduced contracting in, whereby workers had to make a positive decision to join a union and pay its dues. Union funds suffered a sharp decrease in consequence. I am sure that that anxiety lies behind many of the comments and much of the controversy that we have heard today.

After the war, the triumphant Labour Government returned to contracting out. The resultant boost to union membership and finances has directly and indirectly been a source of great strength to the Labour party ever since. Few workers had either the initiative or the inclination to drop out or deliberately to withdraw from union membership. It took character and courage to set oneself apart from one's fellow workers on the shop floor; most, very reasonably, thought that union dues were a small price to pay for a quiet life.

Let us acknowledge it: the Conservative party also found the issue too hot to handle, and confined itself to campaigns to persuade trade unionists to contract out through the established procedures. It had little success. More important, however, when it came to general elections, increasing numbers of unionists started to vote Tory and have stayed Tory. This growing support amongst unionists, nominally affiliated to the Labour party and included in the block votes brandished by trade union leaders at the Labour party conference, gave legitimacy and authority to Conservative proposals for reform. It was a vital element in the public acceptance of these proposals. Unions were seen as Militant-dominated and politically motivated, and the closed shop as a denial of liberty.

The proposal in the Bill that has caused a frisson to run through the Labour party and the trade union movement is that workers will be protected against the unauthorised deduction of subscriptions from their salaries or wages. I thought it significant that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras spent so much time on that apparently minor matter. Under a system called "check-off", which would not mean much to most people—it might be confused with a well-known Russian playwright—union dues can be deducted without a worker's knowledge or consent. In future, that will not be permissible unless the worker has authorised such deductions in writing within the previous three years——

Sir Michael Neubert: We have had enough interventions on that point and can forgo yet another.

In future, it will not be permissible to deduct dues unless the worker has authorised such deductions in writing within the previous three years and has not subsequently withdrawn the authority, which can be done at any time.

That is not, of course, a return to the full-blooded contracting in of 65 years ago, but for Labour's paymasters it is too close for comfort. They see that the new freedom could make significant inroads into union membership and funding. At a time when union membership—especially in manufacturing, and as a result of unemployment—has fallen well below its peak, that could be a further and, in some cases, fatal blow. The Labour party for its part—anxious, for political reasons, to present itself as independent of the unions, yet heavily dependent on them for its income, individual membership being next to negligible—is equally agitated. We have seen signs of that agitation on the Opposition Benches today.

Socialist spokesmen can therefore be expected to attack the proposal as a Tory plot to finish them off by cutting off their cash. It is true that in a parliamentary democracy which, to date, has rejected the idea of public funding of political parties, it is important that the current principal Opposition party should not be denied adequate resources when the current party of government is assured of very substantial contributions from business. Such considerations have no doubt played their part in the past in holding Conservative Governments back from returning to contracting in, and will no doubt do so in the future.

Yet, in isolation, the proposal is entirely justified. Conservatives believe in a role for unions but we believe equally strongly that a worker should have the freedom to join a union or not to join a union as he or she wishes. If it is to be a completely free choice, no automatic mechanism or administrative convenience is acceptable. Such arrangements are part of the past. There is now a different and healthier relationship between employers and unions, and between unions and their members. Each partnership can make common cause in its own interests, a benefit long enjoyed in the United States and west Germany and an essential feature of agreements reached by Japanese companies investing here. It follows that a union should be prepared to stand on its merits and provide positive incentives to recruitment, rather than rely on inertia.

There is the further fear for the Labour party that the political levy may also be subject to a switch to "contracting in". That does not look likely—at least, not this time around. The same arguments apply, however, and are equally valid.

The next few years are bound to witness changes in the political landscape if there is to be any feasible alternative to a Conservative Government—not that I am looking for such an alternative, the House will understand. The relationship between the Labour party and the trade unions will be among the most crucial of those changes—from which will perhaps emerge a more self-confident Labour movement which could cope with a freely contracted political levy. Until that time, the Bill—soon, I hope, to be on the statute book—is a welcome further step towards a more modern system of industrial relations.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I remind hon. Members that speeches are subject to a 10-minute time limit.

7.8 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): As the Secretary of State will recognise, the Liberal Democrats and their predecessor parties have supported many of the Conservative Government's trade union reforms. In some cases, we have pressed ahead—calling, for example, for the abolition of the closed shop in advance of the introduction of Government legislation. It is important to make that statement at the outset, because the Government have not made a case that justifies further substantial and detailed interference in the working of trade unions. There are other measures in the Bill for which no case has been made.

People who would normally be on the Government's side—for example, employers' organisations—have described the measure as "a Bill too far". The Economist, in a more graphic heedline, referred to it as "kicking the corpse". It seems strange that the Government have an unbridled enthusiasm for interfering in the minute details of the workings of effectively private bodies, although operating very much in the public sphere, in a way which they would regard as unacceptable for almost any other organisation.

The hon. Member for Romford (Sir M. Neubert) indicated what he thought were the concerns of the Labour Opposition. The Conservative party should bear in mind the dangers of provoking a backlash as and when there is a change of Government, which there will have to be if British democracy is to survive much longer. The arguments being put forward by Conservatives may be used, for example, to regulate the donations of companies to political parties and in other ways to regulate sources of revenue that the Conservative party previously depended upon.

As has already been said by several hon. Members, some of the better proposals in the Bill are there not because of the commitment of the Government but because of the requirement of the European Community. Indeed, the right hon. Lady the Secretary of State bore fine testimony to the strictures that were pointed out by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), in the recent debate on the Maastricht treaty, of a Minister who comes to the Dispatch Box and claims the credit for a number of measures which her Government have bitterly fought almost at every stage.

It is worth detailing that the provisions on maternity leave, contracts of employment, health and safety, equal treatment and the transfer of undertakings are all being introduced in order to fulfil European directives rather than the spontaneous desire of Her Majesty's Government to provide those benefits for citizens of the United Kingdom.

The measure at the heart of the Bill which has rightly attracted most attention and adverse comment is the proposition to abolish wages councils. It is well known that the Minister of State has made no secret at any time of his opposition to wages councils and has never bothered to speak in code about it, even though some of his colleagues did.

The case for abolition has not been made, and the timing is cynical in the extreme. To introduce such a measure at a time of record unemployment, the worst industrial downturn since the 1920s, when people in the unprotected sector are facing real cuts, and to suggest that those on the lowest wages should lose the benefit of the minimal protection afforded by wages councils is vindictive. I echo the comments of other hon. Members that it is nauseating to hear highly paid Ministers and even more highly paid corporate executives demanding that the lowest-paid people should carry the greatest burden of the recession. That is not defensible; it is neither a moral nor a justifiable stance.

There is no evidence that the abolition of wages councils will create jobs. That statement is made without substantiation: there is no firm evidence either way. The suggestion which equates the earnings of people in the wages council sector with pin money is offensive and unjustified. It ignores the changing circumstances brought about partly by social change and partly by the effects of the recession, which mean that, in almost every case, the money brought in by people in that sector, even if the majority are women, is essential to the welfare of the families who depend on it, whether or not the wage earners are the main breadwinners. Their partners may be facing or suffering the consequences of redundancy.

It is utterly offensive that, because women may not be seen as the breadwinners in given households, they should be paid less in spite of the merit of the jobs they are carrying out. Anyone who suggests that that is a high moral position to take in the last decade of the 20th century is trying to drive us back to an era that we all thought had gone for ever.

Obvious statements have been made about the abolition of wages councils leading inevitably to more people seeking more benefit from family credit and income support. It seems extraordinary that the Government should accept that. It is well known that, as Liberal Democrats, we do not share the Labour party's commitment to a national minimum wage, but we accept the need for a structure which provides people with minimum incomes and we accept that wages councils are essential in those sectors of the economy where people have no other protection.

The Government seem to be setting the careers service up not for simple privatisation but for unclear piecemeal privatisation. At present, we have a partnership whereby local education authorities are required to provide a careers service and the Secretary of State provides the inspectorate to ensure that it is done properly. The Bill proposes that the Government, through three Secretaries of State, will take total control of and responsibility for the careers service, with no inspectorate or accountability requirement.

In those circumstances, will the Minister tell the House how the quality of service will be assured, what mechanism will be used to ensure that every child has access to an impartial, professional careers service, and how we can be sure that it will not be suborned by the commercial needs of those running it to steer people into sectors where they require trainees rather than meeting the needs of the individual, whether a young person or a mature adult? Can the Minister explain how transferring the service from local authorities to the Secretary of State will increase local accountability? Does he no longer accept that local accountability is desirable or necessary?

If I may anticipate the suggestion that local boards of businessmen will be appointed by the relevant Secretary of State, that is not the accountability which people want. Such board members would not be elected, nor would they be required to explain their objectives.

Perhaps the most controversial provision is in clause 12, the check-off clause to which the hon. Member for Romford referred. Superficially it may be reasonable, but it seems to be moving into detailed regulation of trade union membership which goes far beyond simple contracting in and contracting out. If Conservative Members were as assiduous in calling for deregulation in that sector of the economy as they are in others, I do not believe that they would support the clause.

It is ironic that even employers are making the point that the clause will increase their administrative burden, yet apparently the Government are determined to impose additional regulations on employers against their express will. Time precludes me from quoting them, but many employers' organisations have expressed their opposition to the clause.

Clause 19 is a recipe for wanton litigation by people with no involvement in industrial disputes. It goes completely against the grain of trying not to clog up court time with unnecessary litigation.

The Bill is not necessary. It does not fulfil the aspirations of the people. It will do nothing for workers' rights, nothing for partnership and nothing for profit sharing, and we will vote against it.

7.18 pm

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): I am grateful for the opportunity to address the House as my involvement in and support for democratic trade unionism goes back many decades. I am a believer in democratic trade unionism. I started my career quite some time ago in the car and car component industry, at Fort Dunlop near the area which I now represent, in quality control on the shop floor. At one of the many meetings of the Select Committee on Employment that I have attended, Opposition Members found it difficult to understand that I had been among the steam, the smoke and the carbon black of the tyre industry. They also found it difficult to understand that a Conservative Member knew something about manufacturing industry hands on and about the real effect of trade unionism.

I am glad to say that my career progressed reasonably rapidly, and I found myself making quite significant decisions in the companies I worked for about introducing new products and having to cope with supply to the car industry.

The problems created at the time by the undemocratic practices of the trade unions were legion. People who remember Birmingham and Coventry in the early 1960s and 1970s will understand that, after 20 years in the industry, I became so frustrated that my colleagues and I could not manage. That frustration was my main reason for wanting to become a Member of Parliament. Decisions were taken capriciously by a small key core of trade union leaders and not by the lads with whom I had worked, who I knew so well and who were the real trade union members. They had no democracy. I believe in trade unionism and I believe that they should have, and now have, democracy.

It was therefore with great joy that I won my seat in 1979. Within 18 months, I was grateful to become Parliamentary Private Secretary to the then Secretary of State for Employment, now Lord Tebbit, who was himself a dedicated and experienced trade unionist. Following Lord Prior, we introduced various Bills in the 1980s, including the so-called Tebbit Bill and the secret ballot provisions. We provided trade union members with the democratic structure that they now enjoy. From Lord Prior, Lord Tebbit and others, we achieved that step by step.

I was a member of most of the committees in the early days when we made those changes. It was hard in a sense, because one understood the resentment felt by those who were affected by the changes. However, one was buoyed up by the strong support of those who wanted to see decisions on strikes in particular taken by the people who were intimately involved—the trade union members.

That is why, with that long experience, I welcome the Bill. I also welcome it as the joint chairman of the all-party motor industry group. The motor industry needs all the help it can get. It has increased productivity magnificently. It is now such an attractive prospect in terms of productivity and excellent and unrivalled industrial relations that we have inward investment from Japanese companies like Nissan, Honda and Toyota, which would not have happened without the Conservative legislation of the early 1980s.

That legislation led to the recognition that trade union workers must have democratic processes and be able to have secret ballots and it has led to our current superb record. Without that legislation, we would not have had that inward investment. It would have gone to France or Germany, and cars would have been imported instead of being built in this country.

It is not just a matter of the front line with the motor car itself. There is a knock-on effect into the car component and subsidiary industries. Many hundreds of thousands of jobs, particularly in the west midlands, depend on the car industry—for example, on the success of Peugeot. Peugeot is one of my constituency employers, because many of the people who work at the Ryton plant live in my constituency. Peugeot received a Queen's Award for industry in 1991 in the teeth not just of our United Kingdom recession, but of an international recession.

It is magnificent to know that many of the Peugeot 405s that we see driving around Paris and elsewhere in France are made in Coventry. That achievement was made possible only by the high productivity and good industrial relations of the company. There is a similar record at Rover and Land Rover. Land Rover's increased production of the Discovery is a landmark victory in the teeth of the recession. Again, that has been made possible only by good industrial relations created by Conservative legislation in the early 1980s.

Therefore, a further step is excellent. In response to those who believe that the CBI does not support the Bill, I will quote from the CBI brief:

> "The CBI fully endorses the Government's continued commitment to the periodic review of the law governing industrial relations.
> The CBI welcomes the new Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill as a measure which contains some useful proposals in this area."

The CBI has some detailed arguments to which I will refer briefly. I wholeheartedly welcome the main provisions of the Bill. I welcome members' ability to obtain information about a union's financial affairs. That is surely their right. All clubs, even local football clubs, have an annual general meeting at which the members are allowed to examine the accounts. Such examination may be time-consuming for the chairman and treasurer as the members go through the accounts in great detail. Surely trade unionists in a modern society should have the same right.

It seems eminently sensible to give individuals the choice to ensure that they are happy to be members of their union. There has been much discussion about what is or is not legal in respect of the check-off arrangements. Perhaps the Minister will clarify the existing law and what the proposals will mean in terms of extra protection for trade union members.

Proper notice of strike ballots and strike notice are absolutely vital in furthering the process of democracy and the involvement of trade union members—not trade union leaders. A manager of a company or a trade union president has responsibilities, in the case of the company manager to the shareholders and the employees, and in the case of the union president to the trade union members. The union president is there to represent the members, not as an ideological right to pursue political aims. The Bill adds to the step-by-step process towards democracy.

The proposals in respect of the citizen's right to restrain unlawful industrial action are excellent, and are part of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's citizens charter. All hon. Members are aware of frustrated people who come to their advice surgeries on Fridays and Saturdays complaining about the lack of an ombudsman or tribunal to help them. However, I have a word of caution, and perhaps the Minister will refer to this point when he replies to the debate.

We also see people at our advice surgeries who will never accept no for an answer. As good constituency Members, we pursue such matters to the best of our abilities. However, some people might be capricious in taking such action. I should be grateful if the Minister will reassure me that unlawful industrial action will be clearly defined, so that only those with a good, clear case against unlawful action will be able to approach the ombudsman.

I should like to make many more points, but I am conscious that my time is up. As my heart and life have been in the motor car and car components industries, I welcome the Bill. As they are the dominant industries in the midlands, my constituents will also welcome it.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North): The Bill has finally surfaced 18 months after the Green Paper was published. It is significant that during that time, none of the consultations have been published. There has been no improvement in the knowledge of employment law on the Government Benches. As we have seen tonight, Conservative Members are not even familiar with contract law. There has been no improvement in the understanding of how trade unions work, their aims and objectives and what their members require of them. Not to worry, we should perhaps expect nothing other than that.

There are significant additions to the Bill which were not included in the Green Paper, one of which is the further centralisation to Secretaries of State in London of powers and duties previously held by local education authorities with respect to the careers service. What is the thinking behind that? Is it meant to provide additional funds to the training and enterprise councils to meet their present deficit in funding? Or is it even more insidious so that we will see the likes of Manpower and Brook Street Bureau providing career service advice on the basis of which client company pays the highest fees instead of on the basis of providing the necessary advice that young people require? Whatever the source of that career service advice, there seems to be a lack of objectivity. Perhaps our good friend the Minister will deal with that matter when he replies to the debate.

Much has been said about the abolition of the wages councils, which comes as no surprise to Opposition Members although it was not in the Green Paper or in either of the last two Conservative party manifestos—but there again nor is so much else. That addition to the Bill is simply an extension of the vitriol and dogma that we witnessed at this year's Conservative party conference, when generalisation and stereotyping about certain targets sought to divert people from the real state of the economy, of the nation and of the misery that people are suffering.

The abolition of the wages councils is also consistent with last week's autumn statement, in which about 5 million public sector workers were told that they will suffer a cut in pay in real terms during the next 12 months. If there is to be a cut in the public sector, there has to be equality with the private sector and the abolition of wages councils will ensure that everyone suffers in the same way.

The minimum wage argument is strange. When one considers that billions of pounds seem to be paid out by that mythical person, the taxpayer, in family credit, housing benefit, poll tax rebates and various other income-related benefits, I suggest that the state is operating a minimum wage in one form or another. Surely the responsibility for paying a decent living wage should be transferred to employers, in exactly the same way that the responsibility for statutory sick pay was transferred to them. It is okay for the taxpayer to pick up certain elements but not others.

The trade union-related elements of the Bill are dishonest. They are born out of malice and ignorance. They claim to be an extension of individual rights, but they will turn out to be a diminution. They seek to destroy totally the collective entity that is trade unions. The Government seem happy to see all employees as helpless individuals without the strength of collective bargaining and union recognition.

Is it not strange that as a society we deem it right and proper to have a taxation system, in which I include the national insurance fund, so that collective provision can be made for public services which would not be open to us as individuals? Even the Government do not challenge that. When it comes to rights in the workplace, that is to be denied. If we extended that principle to national defence, it would seem that we should make the army, the air force and the navy redundant and supply every household with a pea shooter.

Although it might be a frightening thought, let us assume that the Cabinet is the employer and that the Bill is law. Let us consider—[Interruption.] Did the Minister wish to intervene?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Jeremy Hanley): No; I was talking to my hon. Friend the Whip.

Mr. Rooney: I just wanted to check as I thought the hon. Gentleman might be trying to learn something.

Consider the notorious and somewhat failed rebellion of anti-European persons on the Government Benches a couple of weeks ago. Let us imagine that the Bill applied to them and that they had to give the Government Whips seven days notice of their industrial action and of the names and addresses of the persons involved. They would have had to give three days notice of the exact motion that they would be framing. Can one imagine what would have been the tactics—the arm twisting and pleadings—of that wonderful employer known as the Cabinet, that so-called good employer? What would have happened if it were a bad employer? Really the idea does not stand credence.

Individuals should have the right to belong to a trade union, the right for that union to be recognised, to negotiate for them and to represent them. On several occasions, the Government have been asked why they do not legislate for cases when 100 per cent. of the work force has joined a trade union to make the employer recognise that that union has bargaining rights. They have ducked the issue on every occasion and have said that such bargaining is separate and concerns individual rights. That is nonsense.

I know of one example. Surprisingly, we have some good employers in Bradford, who encourage trade union membership. What is perhaps even more surprising is that they recognise unions, and negotiate with them daily. However, we have our share of bad employers. One company has about 38 employees on an average wage of £68 for a 44—hour week. Every employee joined a trade union and sought its recognition. The employers persistently refused to recognise the union. After two years, several industrial tribunal actions had been won by trade union representatives on behalf of people dismissed by the employer for engaging in union activities, and the employer finally recognised the union. The employees now enjoy wages of £160 a week.

The dishonesty of the Bill is perhaps best reflected in a document published by the Department of Trade and Industry. Probably no one in this Chamber has seen the document because it is available only at our foreign embassies and at overseas trade fairs. The document says, "Invest in Britain", and that Britain has the best anti-union laws in Europe, the lowest wage rates of the 10 industrialised countries and there are no restrictions on taking capital out of the country——

Mr. Ian Bruce: No, that is not correct.

Mr. Rooney: You might not like it, but get a copy of the document, pal. I will see you afterwards.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There are no pals here, only hon. Members.

Mr. Rooney: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The one good piece of news in that document is that we have the cheapest mined coal in Europe and the greatest energy resources, although the news does not seem to have reached the President of the Board of Trade——

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rooney: No.

The truth of the Bill, seen in conjunction with the past 13 years of trade union legislation, is the Government's determination for Britain to be a low skill, low wage, low esteem and no representation economy—a sweat-shop economy, which is simply the assembly unit for the Japans, Germanies and Americas of the world.

That situation was reflected throughout the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s in the textile industry, which sought to survive in west Yorkshire on the back of low wages. We all know what happened to the bulk of that industry. The textile firms which survived invested in machinery, equipment and training and in paying people decent wages. The surviving companies are a testament to what the strength of management and unions can do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's 10 minutes are up.

7.37 pm

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): I am grateful to be called so early in the debate. I shall follow the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) with the brief remark that it seems strange that he should quote a document incorrectly and that he does not have a copy of it with him. He was probably trying to say that Britain has the lowest unit labour costs and not the lowest wages within the European Community, because everything else he said was patently rubbish.

I wonder why the Labour party did not rush to its feet to welcome so many elements of the Bill. So often, what is described by Opposition parties as an attack on trade unions is benefiting the rights of trade unionists to ensure that they are properly looked after at every stage of their membership, which is what is contained in the Bill. For the trade union movement to say that there is no requirement in law for someone to have to sign to authorise deductions from their wages, and to spend so much time objecting to the fact that that is contained in the Bill, seems inconsistent. It demonstrates the anomaly by which, apparently, by giving somebody a contract——

Mr. Miller rose——

Mr. Bruce: With only 10 minutes in which to speak, I cannot give way.

We must sort out the law and make sure that, in future, people are clear precisely what happens in such circumstances. It may come as a surprise to Opposition Members to learn that, in briefing me personally, the TUC told me clearly that it wants to ensure that its members regularly receive from the unions to which they belong a statement every time the deduction is increased. That is not attacking trade unions but ensuring that they keep good contact with their membership.

There are many examples of people who have paid money to trade unions, and the link between the members of the union has been the purchase of union cards to enable them to join different organisations. Such examples have often been catalogued in the House. In other words, we are engaged in a sensible operation to tidy up the law to ensure that trade union members who are paying for a service can keep control of their unions.

There must, of course, be a right of choice if people wish to join other trade unions. That right exists today, assuming that another union will accept their membership. The TUC rules prevent unions from taking on members in areas where they do not normally have negotiating rights. Only by a trade union member knowing precisely what is going on can he be certain that the union to which he has become affiliated is doing a good job for him. Otherwise, he has no choice, especially if he cannot change unions.

I have been anxious to take part in the debate to correct some misconceptions about wages councils. Any statistical analysis of the evidence shows that wages councils have never worked. Indeed, the experience of many groups of workers who have been removed from the so-called protection of wages councils is that their wages have risen faster.

If Opposition Members are wondering why a Conservative Member should be urging the abolition of wages councils, I assure them that there are circumstances in which it is sensible for people to decide, in free collective bargaining, to work for lower wages. No hon. Member has ever objected to the fact that, in law, if one works for oneself, one can pay oneself 2p an hour. It is the right of anybody who sets up a business to take less pay to make a go of it. I lost £9,000 in the first year of setting up in business, and as a self-employed person I worked between 60 and 80 hours a week.

Why should it be permissible to work for less for oneself, whereas a business man who is in trouble, or who is trying to start up with few resources, cannot negotiate with his workers and say, "I cannot pay what I believe to be a sensible living wage, but I can afford to make a start, or to keep the business going, if you are prepared to take lower wages"? By that means it might be possible to create or retain jobs that would not otherwise exist.

The sort of wages that I was able to offer when I started my business attracted only women, and the only people with ability who applied were women. Yet within two years of setting up, the wages of all my staff doubled, and both men and women applied to work for the company. That happened simply because we showed that we could create business and employment, and only by such means can wages be paid.

Labour Members seem to think that, by some magical process, every employer can afford a certain minimum wage. That is not the case. Nor is it the case that employers are grinding their employees into the dust. The vast majority of employers would never attempt to do that, because a ground—down worker is not productive. Almost every employer I know would like to pay more, but must increase productivity to enable higher wages to be paid.

That is why we must take a realistic view of spending £3 million on wages councils. We must act to free up a section of the labour market. I guarantee that, when the Bill becomes law, the statistics will show that no harm will have been done to the average worker, that we shall have created jobs in the way we did in the 1980s, and that yet more bureaucracy will have been swept away. The measure represents an excellent move forward, and I am surprised that Opposition Members have not appreciated its excellence.

Ms. Angela Eagle (Wallasey): I wish at the outset to declare an interest. I am in the process of becoming sponsored by the Confederation of Health Service Employees, a trade union for which it was my privilege to work for seven years before coming to this House. The modest sums involved in such sponsorship never go into the pocket of the hon. Member concerned.

The Bill is the sixth piece of legislation since 1979 designed to regulate industrial relations. Indeed, we have been in a state of almost permanent legislative revolution of which Chairman Mao would have been proud. While the Government have used the rhetoric of freedom and fairness as justification for their actions, their real agenda has been the systematic destruction of rights at work, coupled with the deliberate weakening of trade unions' ability to resist. Their aim has been to deregulate the labour market and to bring back exploitative cheap labour to these shores. In that aim, they have certainly succeeded.

The Government will tolerate the existence of trade unions so long as they are impotent. They will allow a theoretical right to strike while ensuring that that right is so couched in a plethora of complicated rules and regulations as to render it practically impossible. If the unthinkable should happen and a strike should occur, the Government have sanctioned victimisation by selective dismissal to dispose of the miscreants. They have replaced bargaining in the work place with fear.

There are, in the Government's bizarre view of the world, no bad employers—only evil trade unions which manipulate their members by forcing them to go on strike against their will. Myths about the behaviour of trade unions which live on in Tory demonology have little or no bearing on reality, yet they have provided the Government with scant justification to dash headlong into legislative assault and battery, of which the Bill is another example.

The myth persists on the Government Benches, for example, that trade union leaders force their members, like some sort of conscript army, to go on strike. After seven years of working for COHSE, I assure the House that the truth is exactly the opposite. The Government concluded that, by forcing trade union members to ballot, they would almost destroy industrial action. Even so, 92 per cent. of ballots have resulted in a yes vote.

Even when the shameless Conservatives were unable to justify their next turn of the screw, we found the former Secretary of State for Employment declaring in a press release after his Green Paper had received the thumbs down:

> "Governments must be prepared not only to listen but to lead. Sometimes it is the duty of Government to take action which is in advance of opinion."

When we strip away the hypocrisy and doublespeak with which the Conservatives always deploy their argument in such debates, it becomes obvious that their legislative attacks are handsomely rewarded when the money from their paymasters in the City and business floods into Tory party coffers.

That is unregulated compared with the stringent laws governing trade union donations for political purposes. The Government have tightened up on those. Perhaps we would obtain more information about their sordid backroom deals if the Tories published their accounts in a regular and accessible way, as trade unions have done for years, even long before they were obliged to do so.

I invite the House to contrast the Conservative party's over-zealous legal regulation of trade unions with its attitude to fraud in the City, which is clearly a persistent and serious problem. The Cadbury committee, which recently investigated the matter, concluded that the guiding principles should be, first, that self-regulation——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Bill deals fairly specifically with trade unions. I am not sure where the Cadbury committee comes into that. Will the hon. Lady return to the Bill?

Ms. Eagle: I am exploring the difference between the Conservative party's treatment of the voluntary regulation of City fraud and the over-regulation of trade unions. Is that in order? I should like your advice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: What the hon. Lady said at one point was out of order; that is why I gently suggested that she returned to the Bill. I hope that we can now move on.

Ms. Eagle: I hope that I have made my point about the Government's different treatment of different parts of our society.

The extent of the Government's bias against trade unions and the hollow nature of their rhetoric about freedom is summed up by the fact that virtually the only right that the Government have given working people in the past 13 years is the right to take action against their trade unions. Trade unions exist to protect people, despite what Conservative myths suggest.

People want the right to be treated fairly at work. They want the right to employment protection and decent wages and conditions. Yet the Government have systematically stripped working people of all those rights, bleating that such basic minimum standards are a burden on business. We even learned at the weekend that the Government apparently believe that the laws contained in the draft EC directive on the minimum age of work which aim to prevent the exploitation of children are also a burden on business. Next the Government will tell us that preventing children from sweeping chimneys for a pittance is an unacceptable restriction on the employer's right to manage.

The Conservative party claims that removing minimum standards and "freeing the labour market" creates employment. That is why wages councils are to be abolished. Indeed, the neo-classical theory of economics worshipped by the Conservative party predicts that result. However, no practical experience bears it out.

When 16 to 20-year-olds were removed from the protection of wages councils, their pay fell, but the rate of unemployment in that age group rose, and it is now one in five. If the Government proceed to abolish the wages councils for the 2·7 million people who are currently covered by them—80 per cent. of whom are women and the most vulnerable section of the labour force—they will achieve the same magnificent result.

The argument that deregulating the labour market creates employment is not proven. The opposite appears to be true. Where deregulation has occurred in our labour market, there is higher unemployment. Indeed, we still have mass and rising unemployment, despite the much vaunted success of the Government's employment legislation.

Conservative Members talk a great deal of cant about the benefits of the Government's employment legislation. Indeed, the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), who is currently the chairman of the Conservative party, had the gall to claim in a debate on the 1990 Bill that the Government's employment legislation was the great success of their period in office. I congratulate the Conservative party on finding any success in the smoking ruin that is now Britain after 13 years of their mismanagement. However, like most of its propaganda, that assertion is not true.

Not only has the recession inhibited strike activity, but the declining level of strikes which the Government cite as proof positive of their success has been observed in almost all western countries in the same period. Those countries have achieved better results than Britain without compromising human rights, reneging on international agreements or condoning fear and victimisation in the workplace.

Another equally absurd claim was made by the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) when he was Secretary of State for Employment. In the debate on the 1990 legislation, he said that the legislation would strengthen our economy. The accuracy and sagacity of that comment fair take the breath away.

It is about time that the Government got on with providing employment and decent standards of work for

[Ms. Eagle]

British people, and stopped pursuing their political vendettas and neo-classical economic obsessions. The sooner they do so the better.

7.54 pm

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I begin by declaring my interest as a consultant to MinOtels Great Britain Ltd.

One could say a great deal about the Bill if time allowed. We know that the Labour party is against the Bill. It has also opposed every employment Bill that we have ever introduced. It is always in favour of the Bill before last. Labour Members may not mean it when they say that, but when an election approaches they always say it. We can be fairly sure that in the fullness of time they will be against the next employment Bill and will claim that they were always in favour of this one.

Several hon. Members have concentrated on the wages councils. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) put it well when he said that we should concentrate on the wages councils tonight. I accept that there is a case to be answered. At first sight, and when examined superficially, there is a beguiling case to be made for retaining the wages councils. It sounds like a good idea to have a council to protect the poorest members of society. Then we hear that the wages councils go back to 1909. So it is bound to appeal to the innate and reactionary conservatism on the Labour Benches.

We also hear that the wages councils were introduced by Winston Churchill. That is always a good thing to say to both Opposition and Conservative Members. So at first sight the wages councils seem a good idea. The idea seems to be self evidently right and to benefit the poor. However, the idea that the wages councils help the poorest workers in our society one jot is a manifest absurdity which masquerades as a self-evident truth.

Let us consider for one moment what the wages councils are supposed to do. They work on the assumption that a Whitehall bureaucrat or somone appointed for one day a month or one day every two or three months can say to an employer, "I do not want to hear about what you can pay, the demands of your industry, your problems of recruitment or pay differentials. I have decided that the right increase for you is X per cent." When one thinks about that, one realises what a thoroughly daft idea it is.

The only proper measure of a proper wage is what an employer feels it is worth his while to pay and whether someone is prepared to work for that sum of money. If the two are out of kilter, the bargain is not struck. If the employer believes that the service that he wants performed is worth a certain sum and someone finds it attractive to perform that service at that price, a sensible wage is fixed.

Earlier in the debate a sedentary intervention was made which was probably lost because it was not responded to. It was a fair point. Someone asked whether we would work for £2·50 an hour. Many of us have worked for less than that. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] The reason why that comment incites noises on the Opposition Benches is that Opposition Members have no experience. If one comes to the House via the polytechnic route, one does not experience anything like the problems that my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) or I had starting a business or what it is like to work as an articled clerk for 50 hours a week for £6. Opposition Members have no idea about that.

Opposition Members are apparently so concerned on my behalf—I am touched—because they assume that if people are on a low wage they are there for life, locked into that wage for ever and that they will be ground down as the years go by. That is nonsense. For many people, low wages are a phase in their working life: it does not last.

Coupled with the idea that once people are on a low wage they are locked on to the misery train to the end of their days is the idea that somehow people support their families on that low wage. That is piffle. The evidence shows that 80 per cent. of people who work in occupations covered by the wages councils have either two or more earners in their home. So the idea that those who are covered by the wages councils are locked into a low pay system for life and have to support their spouse and family on it is nonsense. It simply does not work that way.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset, spoke about the evidence that supports those propositions. In this short speech I do not have time to go through all the research. As I gently said to my hon. Friend earlier, a number of authorities show what the evidence is. A study by Kaufman in 1989 and a study by Beenstock and Warburton in 1984 both said that the effect of having fixed, statutory, low minimum wages is that, ultimately, people lose their jobs. Inevitably, those were academic studies but the experience that followed deregulation in 1986 for those under the age of 21 is yet more evidence. We were told that young people's wages would go down, whereas in reality the effect was that their wages went up.

The evidence does not stop there. Even if Opposition Members are neither interested in the academic evidence that supports the proposition nor concerned about looking at the experience of 1986, Labour Members have made the point time and again that minimum wages are not in the best interests of the poor.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning) has already quoted the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) saying:

> "I knew the consequences were that there would be some shake-out, any silly fool knew that".

Some people align themselves with the man on the Clapham omnibus. The hon. Gentleman aligns himself with any silly fool, but he has a point—even a silly fool would know that.

Someone who knows what he is talking about without being bullied into it is the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who has previously worked with the Low Pay Unit and is an acknowledged expert in the subject that we are discussing. He said that the employment consequences of a minimum wage > "would be little short of disastrous".

It does not matter where one looks—at the evidence, what has happened since 1986, or what Labour Members who take the trouble to think about it say—one cannot conclude that minimum wages are in the best interests of the poor.

The system is riddled with anomalies. It is absolutely potty that the wages councils will, for instance, cover those who work with cooked meat but not raw meat, those who sell a radio but not a tape recorder, and laundries but not launderettes. All those anomalies are implicit in a system that substitutes the judgment of bureaucrats for those of the people who work in the marketplace. There is only one of two ways to deal with those inconsistencies: either we regulate everything—a Stalinist mentality is still alive and kicking among Opposition Members from time to time —or we say that it is a complete nonsense and we cannot proceed in that way. All that we can do when faced with that problem is to say that those anomalies cannot be straightened out but are implicit in the system.

There is stacks of independent commentary. For instance, editorials in newspapers like The Times have made the point time and again, often quoting left-wing speakers, that minimum wages simply do not help.

I should have thought that we would want to do something positive for the low paid. We should be prepared to look at something that is beguilingly attractive but ask whether, ultimately, it sets out to help those who need help. We have heard nothing about that from Labour Members tonight. If we wonder why, given the fact that there is good authority from Labour Members about the destructive effect of minimum wages, we should look at how the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) feels about the employers that we are discussing. We all know that there are bad employers but, in the experience of most of us, those are a tiny few. But not according to the hon. Gentleman. What frames his policy on behalf of the Labour party? He set it out well in Blackpool in September and was quoted in The Independent by Barrie Clement, labour correspondent, who, whatever else he is, is certainly no Tory hack. He made careful note of what the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras really thought about the employers who provide work opportunities in this country. He said that the hon. Gentleman described them as "rich buggers"—I, too, am offended by the language, but I am quoting—

> "who paid poverty wages to their employees".

Just in case somebody could not understand his subtlety, he apparently said with a great flourish of his beard that rich business people who pay their workers low wages were "thieving scum".

That is the attitude of Labour Front-Bench Members and what pervades those who frame their policies. With that degree of malignant mediocrity which the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras brings to the debate, is it surprising that the Opposition are not prepared to consider the evidence?

8.4 pm

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): It is not surprising that Conservative Members' views on the trade union movement are based not on an intellectual argument but on the bias inherent in the Tory party since trade unions came into being.

As a trade union member of some 54 years, formerly a member of the National Union of Seamen at the age of 16 and a member of the Transport and General Workers Union since 1946, I have sufficient experience in the trade union movement to challenge many of the points that Conservative Members have made. I did not join a trade union for high political ideals but because, at the age of 15 when I went to sea, I was working under conditions that were deplorable in every sense of the word. Those conditions and my wages—28 shillings a month—made me aware that the person for whom I was working was not dealing with me fairly, so I became a member of the National Union of Seamen.

My experience over those years, excluding the war years, is that the trade union movement has been responsible for protecting workers from exploitation which Tory Members have not even mentioned, tonight or at any other time. The Bill confirms my view that the Conservative party's war of attrition against the trade union movement is on-going, and will continue while they remain in power. I do not believe for one moment that that arises out of pure ideological hatred, because there are other factors, such as those that can be seen in the demise of the construction industry.

In many areas, the construction industry has been deregulated. It is a diminishing industry due to the Government's economic policies. The unions deal not only with pay and conditions but with the health and safety of their members. The consequence of the Government's legislation is that cowboy outfits have come into the construction industry, and trade unionism is a thing of the past. Employers disregard health and safety measures in many places, resulting in record deaths in the industry.

In the docks industry, despite the promises by the Secretary of State that the post-abolition period would not mean an attack on trade union membership, we have seen a return to casual labour and everything that was prevalent in the bad old days. The consequence of the Tories' anti-trade union laws has been employers' derecognition of trade unions in virtually every port in the United Kingdom.

No one in the House believes that the Government have any other motive than to see the trade union movement made ineffective so that it will be difficult if not impossible for it to represent its members, as it has a responsibility to do. During the Government's term of office, we have seen the damaging effects that their legislation has had on the trade union movement. Government measures mean that a generation of young people have never enjoyed the advantages of belonging to a trade union, as they have been discouraged from doing so at their places of work, particularly in small businesses.

One reason that the Conservative party supports small businesses is that many of those businesses do not recognise trade unions. That is not to say that we do not support small businesses that act in the best interests of their workers, but many such firms take advantage of young people, paying them low wages and providing poor conditions.

I do not believe that the Conservative party is sincere in its attempts to improve the lot of the trade union movement. The Conservative party talks about the necessity of checking and re-checking whether the contributions of a union member have been authorised by him or her. I was originally opposed to the check-off arrangements. I have held every office at branch level of my trade union, and have been a district and national delegate of the docks and waterways section of the Transport and General Workers Union. The check-off system in my branch and many others resulted in a lowering of the attendance at the branches as contributions were deducted from members' wages. The convenience offered by the system has merits in the longer term.

However, it is wrong for Conservative Members and the Secretary of State to suggest that there is a need for employees constantly to refer to employers about the deduction of trade union contributions. Employees have a right to withhold union membership if they so wish. The employer is required to obtain the consent of the trade union member in order to deduct the payments from his or her wages. Therefore, there is no need for the clause in the Bill. That being so, the clause becomes an act of pettiness or a further sign of how the Government want to confuse the issue and escalate their persistent efforts to undermine the genuine work of the trade union movement on behalf of its members.

The trade union movement has rights that were established many years ago, when working conditions were such that even those who opposed the organisation of labour agreed that collective action by workers was necessary in order to remove many of the excesses that employers imposed on their work forces. The position has not radically changed. Since the Government have been in power, there has been a movement away from the recognition of trade unions and a deterioration in work conditions.

The Labour party believes that the trade union movement should have the rights that the Conservative party openly gives to employers. We believe that trade union rights should not be subject to constant Government interference. We believe that the trade union movement is entitled to continue to operate within the framework of the law, and should be in a position to represent its members.

During the past 13 years, the trade union movement has frequently been rendered ineffective when trying to represent its membership. It is almost impossible for a trade union to announce a dispute without falling into one or other of the traps set by the laws introduced by the Conservative Government. We believe that those laws have impeded the trade union movement. The Labour party must ensure that those laws are removed when a Labour Government come to power, as will certainly happen.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): I have sat on the Standing Committees considering most of the trade union reform Bills, and I hope that I shall be lucky enough to serve on the Standing Committee on this Bill. There will be endless opportunities for detailed discussions of many of the Bill's clauses in Committee, and I shall concentrate now on the strategic role played by the Bill in the development of industrial relations in Britain.

Having listened to the speeches made so far, I have a wonderful sense of deja vu. Labour Members trot out all the same phrases and make all the same speeches as in years past. They say that it is a "Bill too far", that it is "anti-union". The only thing missing from the Labour's speeches is a commitment from their Front-Bench team to repeal the Bill as soon as Labour comes into power. I suspect that that is because the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) is a far cannier politician than many of his predecessors and has the benefit of experience. He knows that, in a relatively short time, what the Government are now proposing will be the orthodoxy, and will be adopted by the Labour party.

I declare an interest in that I am a lawyer and, since the early 1970s when industrial relations law began to develop, I have been very much involved with it. I have represented unions as well as employers, and individuals as well as companies. One of the most interesting features of this subject is the way that realities have changed, but the noises made by the Labour party have not—although the voices of many of the more intelligent trade union leaders have significantly changed.

When unions were formed, and for a large part of this century, the working man had no real protection other than collective action. If a worker was to be dismissed, the only protection to be gained was from collective action by his or her trade union. In the early 1970s, the bulk of industrial actions, particularly the devastating wildcat strikes, related to dismissals.

In today's debate, the focus has switched from strikes over dismissals to pay and conditions. That is because strikes over dismissals are now so rare due to the alternative body of law that developed in the 1960s and 1970s, giving individuals a platform of rights that they can exercise in accordance with their own judgment. They are no longer dependent in the same way as they were on the collective support of a trade union.

The first changes related to rights against employers, with legislation on matters such as redundancy payments, unfair dismissal, health and safety and women's rights. The Opposition were happy with those changes because their long-term impact was, to a degree, obscured. They came at a time when industrial relations—as developed through much of the century—had reached their nadir.

In the 1970s, the system had become a parody of what good industrial relations should be. It was frequently based on mindless confrontation and poor emloyment practices by employers and trade unions alike. Some trade union leaders had political ambitions that overreached their duties as trade union leaders, and they were unable to distinguish between the two.

A corporatist approach was adopted to industrial relations and the economy generally. The great and the good of industry and the trade unions sat down to beer and sandwiches at No. 10 to discuss the issues of the day. However, the great and the good did not represent the overwhelming majority of people in this country. The unions did not represent what was going on in the minds of many of their members. The Confederation of British Industry certainly did not represent small and medium-sized businesses. The consequence was that we lost out dramatically in the growth of the small and medium-sized businesses which have been the mainstay of many of our industrial competitors around the world.

While Opposition Members were happy to accept changes in employers' rights, they were less happy when faced with the other side of the coin: the rights of the members of trade unions vis-a-vis their unions. To be fair, many of the changes that we brought in were just imposing on the whole trade union movement the best practices adopted by some of the unions—certainly in relation to ballots.

Many unions had always had effective balloting systems. Unfortunately, as we saw with the National Union of Mineworkers at the time of its national strike, those balloting procedures did not work well when a president was determined to ride roughshod over his constitution. Hence the rule of law was reimposed, with powers of sequestration for the courts, and balloting procedures were developed. Certain key issues were sent to ballot. There was an end to intimidation, which had become commonplace and which had caused so much distress to many people through the 1970s and the early 1980s

The Labour party always argued against these changes, but once they were in place they came to accept them as the orthodoxy, because most people in this country, including a majority of those in trade unions, saw the reforms as thoroughly desirable.

The role of the trade unions is inevitably changing. If they cannot dictate to their members what they should do, and if they cannot compel people on the shop floor to join, they have to sell the services which they have to offer. Many of the better unions and the cleverer trade union leaders see that there is an important role for trade unions in this changing world. The sort of industrial relations agreements reached by the best manufacturers in the world—as evidenced in Japanese investment in the United Kingdom and much else besides—demands a highly collaborative industrial negotiating machinery, which is based not on confrontation but on a will to collaborate.

Successful unions are good at this. They must look at new areas, such as the protection of pension rights. They must offer skilled advice and representation of individuals to enforce their rights. A whole range of ancillary benefits flow from this too. These services are necessary, and, contrary to what we have heard this evening, I do not believe that the changes will necessarily lead to the fragmentation of the unions. To be successful in these areas requires a critical mass of resources and skills within a union effectively to represent its members' points of view.

Against this background, the Bill is mainstream. It continues a series of developments that have featured in industrial relations changes since the mid-1960s. It brings in a range of changes in respect of employers and individuals and in respect of members and their unions.

Perhaps the Bridlington agreement focuses most clearly on this point. Until now, people have looked at the Bridlington rules as a sacred cow. The truth is that, when they were brought in, one of the major problems in industry was the demarcation dispute. The Bridlington principles were a successful solution to such disputes. Now the situation has changed, and working practices are much more flexible. The problem for which the agreement was devised has passed away, and the rules are now being used to stifle the will of members. There have been many recent examples of members of unions being dissatisfied with their leadership and wanting to join another union instead.

Hon. Members will recall that members of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers wanted to join the GMB because they were fed up with USDAW's stand against Sunday trading. Airline cabin staff wanted to leave the Transport and General Workers Union because they were fed up with the militancy of its leaders. They wanted to join the British Air Line Pilots Association, but were prevented from doing so. There are many other similar examples.

No union should believe that its members belong to it as of right or that anyone who makes a pitch for those members is a poacher and should be deterred by the collective weight of the TUC. Carrying through that logic, the sort of dispute that occurred between the TUC and the electricians would be just the first of many. Competition between unions for membership in modern circumstances is just as healthy as competition between companies. Unions that are in favour of Sunday trading will attract shop workers who want to work on Sunday. That competition will make union leaders reflect their members' interests better, and will provide the mechanism for evolution and change.

I look forward to detailed debates in Committee. This Bill stands bang in the middle of the mainstream of industrial relations development. Some of the best companies in the world believe that Britain is the best place in Europe in which to manufacture. We must ensure that we have in place the best industrial relations practices for those companies, and this Bill takes that process forward.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): I welcome the rights for employees enshrined in this legislation, and the protection afforded to citizens against unlawful industrial action, with the appointment under clause 19 of a new commissioner. I also welcome clause 20 and schedule 2, which add to current provision for pregnant women by giving a new right to all employees, irrespective of length of service, to 14 weeks maternity leave.

Many families throughout the United Kingdom rely on a mother's earnings to provide their basic standard of living. In more and more families mothers are the sole earner and the head of the household. For as long as that is so, every effort must be made to ensure that mothers-to-be enjoy the full protection of their rights as mothers and workers. Naturally I support clause 21, which provides for all female employees, irrespective of their length of service, a right not to be dismissed on the grounds of pregnancy or childbirth.

I also welcome clause 23 and schedule 4 which will give every employee who works eight or more hours a week the right, within two months of starting work, to a written statement of his main terms and conditions, including details of entitlement to pay, hours and holidays.

I am not persuaded by Conservative Members that the existence of wages councils has been holding back higher earnings for those protected by them, so I oppose clause 28 and the abolition of the wages councils. That is a step backwards for the rights of the workers who are covered. Wages councils provide a security net for low-paid workers, and by their removal the way will be opened to a minority of unscrupulous employers who have no respect for the rights of employees and who seek to exploit those already on low wages. Many who will fall victim to this lack of protection will have their spending power further reduced, and there will be an adverse effect on the wider economy.

The Government's statements of commitment to economic recovery will have a hollow ring, given this development. The Government cannot hope for an upturn in the economy while at the same time wrecking the means to that upturn for many families. The saving to the public purse from abolishing the wages councils and making their employees redundant will be greatly outweighed by the losses to the economy resulting from what will amount to a wage cut for many workers who will be deprived of their right to a fair wage.

In Northern Ireland, between 1971 and 1989, male employment fell by 9 per cent.; in the same period, female employment rose by 34 per cent. Of this rise in female employment, more than 97 per cent. was in part-time work. Part-time employees are traditionally less qualified and lower paid than their full-time colleagues; yet many families rely on the wages of a part-time lady to provide the basic necessities for a reasonably dignified existence.

The economic and social consequences of exposing so many families to further reductions in income are frightening to contemplate. Unlike the Government, I do not see the destruction of workers' rights as a means of achieving their end. We cannot keep people in work and out of social security benefits by destroying workers' rights. The abolition of the wages councils can only lead to an increased reliance on benefits in the longer term, as more and more families find themselves caught in the poverty trap.

It is time that the Government directed their attention away from conference rhetoric to please constituency associations and towards long-term measures to ensure that the United Kingdom has a well trained, adequately paid and willing work force. With unemployment queues nearing 3 million and the United Kingdom struggling to regain its economic strength, the last thing that we need is a demoralised and unwilling work force.

In Northern Ireland, the 1991-92 minimum basic hourly wage set by the wages councils varies from £2·60 to £3·60 per hour and 34,000 workers currently enjoy the protection of the wages councils. Considering that many of those are involved in physically demanding work, £2·60 per hour is not much to ask of any employer.

What can the Government seriously hope to achieve by removing the protection of the wages councils? If the Government hope that it will stimulate the economy by giving greater freedom to the employer in the labour market, they should think again. No self-respecting employer would pay below that level. The only employers who stand to gain by the abolition of the wages councils are those who have no respect for employees in the first place and therefore have little contribution to make to the wider economy.

Of the 34,000 employees covered by the wages councils in Northern Ireland, many are in the service sector, but some still remain in manufacturing. It is nonsense to endanger their right to a fair wage.

Finally, I call upon the Government to pay careful attention to the need to ensure that Northern Ireland has equal representation in the new careers organisation along with other regions of the United Kingdom. I support the call of the Institute of Careers Officers for a national council for careers guidance, subject to the inclusion of representation as of right for Northern Ireland in such a group.

Mr. John Sykes (Scarborough): First, I declare an interest. My family business in Yorkshire owns a number of petrol stations, at one of which we have a small grocery stand, a fact which, on its own, brings that service station under the wages council for groceries.

I wanted to speak in today's debate because, from leaving school in 1974 until I became the Member of Parliament for Scarborough and Whitby, I worked in the family business. Our activities include retailing, manufacturing, property and agriculture. The company was established by Joseph Sykes, my ancestor, in 1845. Therefore, one way or another, my family has seen a lot of employment law.

The Labour party remains responsible for some of the most reckless and damaging trade union laws this century; legislation which culminated in 1979 when we saw the alien practice of union men picketing town halls, factories, depots and hospitals and union men threatening the wives and children of those who dared to cross the picket line. Those were the every day alien practices of life in the 1970s under the Labour party.

We were elected to change all that, at which point Labour Members scurried off to ask their union bosses, "What shall we do now?" So it was that they could not quite bring themselves to support the Employment Act 1980, which banned the violence of the flying picket. They felt uncomfortable about the Employment Act 1982 which dealt with the corruption of the closed shop, and they did not like the 1984 legislation one bit—an Act which gave union members a secret ballot before strike action.

Labour Members tried to blockade the Employment Act 1988 requiring union bosses to submit themselves to election by secret ballot and they tried to scupper the Employment Act 1990 because it removed union immunity from secondary action prosecution. So, there we have it: five Acts in 10 years and the Labour party voted against every single one of them. That is how it comes about that we have this particular flying picket on the Labour Front Bench today.

Two of the Labour Front-Bench spokesmen on the issue supported in writing the violence and howling pickets of Wapping. There they sit huddled around their brazier trying to warm themselves against the cold facts; sent here, I might add, compliments of the National Union of Railwaymen, or the PMT, or the RMT, or whatever they call themselves these days, compliments of the Transport and General Workers Union, compliments of the Graphical, Paper and Media Union, whatever that is; sent here this evening no doubt to "down tools" over the question of secret postal ballots on strike action. The Leader of the Opposition came out of the closet on that recently. He said that ballots are an "irrelevant effrontery", "intellectually disreputable", while hard on his coat tails was the delegate from the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union who, on "Panorama", said:

> "on the restoration of a Labour Government strings will be pulled".

He went on to say:

> "and we would be definitely pulling strings of our sponsored MPs."

Strings have been duly pulled, not to say wrenched. The Leader of the Opposition, despite his carefully manicured appearance, is sponsored by the GMB—quite appropriate really when one thinks about it.

No doubt there are some Opposition Members who want to "call out the lads" over the question of trade union financial affairs, measures that will give their members information about union finances—the fat salaries of the union bosses, the loaded perks that go with the job for which the ordinary member has to pay. I say that it is right to stand up for the member who faithfully pays his dues year in, year out. Is not he entitled to know what, or perhaps even more relevant who, his money is being spent on? But at least we know that the Opposition will support us on that one.

We also know that it will be "one out, all out" over the question of the wages councils. We know, for example, that minimum wages cost jobs. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), the shadow Transport Secretary, came out of yet another closet on that one when he said:

> "I knew the consequences. There would be some shake out. Any silly fool knows that."

That is one down—270 to go.

I was forgetting. The Leader of the Opposition admitted that he had been hiding in the same closet when he said:

> "One or two jobs may be lost."

He may well be right—if he is talking about 1 million or 2 million.

No, we in the Conservative party will not take any lectures about the Bill from the Tolpuddle party. The only irrelevance that we have to deal with this evening is the TUC hymn sheet which Opposition Members have been sent here to sing all the way until Christmas. We will not take any lectures from Opposition Members whose only experience of employing someone is limited to the poorly paid research assistants who swarm about the Palace of Westminster every day.

No, the Bill is part of the process that takes trade and industry in Great Britain towards the millenium. It is part of the process that the Prime Minister set in train when he torpedoed the social chapter last December and which Jacques Delors acknowledged would make Britain a paradise for investment. Forget Labour's Europe. All one has to do to see Labour's Europe is to go to Sheffield or Liverpool.

No, as we head towards the 21st century, this is a Bill for more investment, more employment, more business, more output and more exports; a Bill for Great Britain; a Bill which is relevant for the 1990s; a Bill which consigns the alien practices, along with the Labour party, to the dustbin of history.

8.38 pm

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Today's debate takes place against the backcloth of massively rising unemployment and poverty which is so deep rooted in Britain that it is sad and tragic that all that the Government can do is to kick the boot at the worker and the trade union movement.

On 6 November, the Financial Times said:

> "In deciding now to abolish the wages councils the government is taking a risk. Attempting to reduce the wages of low paid workers, at a time of depressed confidence, rising unemployment, and with the public sense of injustice already aroused by the miners débâcle, is not the most politic of actions. In any case, the evidence does not suggest that the low levels set by the wages councils have a significant negative employment effect, as the government claims.
> Abolishing them now, in the current depressed economic climate, is likely to do little more than reduce the wages of some low paid workers, while increasing the amount of family credit paid to those low-income households that are adversely affected. The government is showing again a rare taste for the wrong battles."

The Institute of Management Consultants believes that the abolition of wage councils will severely damage the United Kingdom's productivity. Its director general said:

> "The success of organisations depends on the productivity of the work-force. A low wage policy leads to a vicious circle of low morale, low performance and low productivity. The UK cannot compete in the 1990s with a 19th century approach to labour. The way forward is through higher productivity and higher skill levels created and rewarded by higher pay . . . The government's belief that low wages will create jobs is mistaken in those industries with minimum wage rates only marginally above benefit levels. Growth and real employment will come only through rewarding skills. Instead of removing the remaining protection for the low paid, Ministers should be showing a public commitment to a better trained workforce."

I happen to be sponsored by the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers, and I am delighted and honoured to represent that union in the House. I know that it fights on behalf of low-paid workers and people who have not been given proper training, to take them into a higher pay echelon. It is unbelievable that this country can be at the bottom of the European league in regard to giving those who work for this country the conditions that they deserve.

The wages councils cover 2·5 million people, but they do not cover some of my constituents. I know a security man who works for £1·85 an hour. Conservative Members may say that everyone else in the family works, but that is not true: he is the sole breadwinner. Having spent 20 years in the armed forces, he left to work for a poverty wage. Is that what we want to happen? Do we want people who have spent a decade or two in the Army to end up earning a pittance?

That man worked for a Government establishment; that is, he worked in Coulport—under the Government's auspices—for a private security company. Why should we allow our people to be degraded by receiving such payments? Ultimately, the taxpayer will have to stump up housing benefit, income support and free school meals for that man's children. I think that it is appalling.

I am not a great lover of Churchill, but I recognise some of his main attributes. For instance, he fought and argued for the rights of wages councils. He knew that, out in the big bad world, there were employers who would speculate and get away with paying workers tuppence an hour. They would do what was done in the days of Oliver Twist—provide a bowl of soup, and give a belt in the ear to those who asked for more.

What happened when young people were taken out of the realm of wages councils? Were there more jobs for them? Not in my constituency. The facts and figures clearly prove that more young people are now unemployed; they also prove that young people are working for abysmal wages. They are forced to work seven days a week for about £1 an hour, with no rights, and they are sacked if they ask for half a day off to attend a wedding.

Christmas will be here in five weeks. What a Christmas present this Scrooge-like Government are offering to low wage earners. If they are still in power next year and the year after, there will be many empty stockings hanging up in our young people's homes. Many children will not know what Christmas is, and will never see Santa Claus—unless they are out begging on the streets. The steets of London, Glasgow and Edinburgh are full of folk begging. The Minister should consider them, and consider the workers who are trying to make a living wage and who need the protection afforded by the wages councils.

Every prediction that the Government have made has proved wrong. The Chancellor has kept telling us that the turning point is just around the corner. I feel that I am turning the corner at 100 mph, but all that I see is more poverty, more unemployment, more bankruptcies and more house repossessions. The Bill will not help the low paid. If the Government wanted to give working folk back their morale, they would establish the minimum wage proposed by Labour, and they would come up with a plan of action to train our young people to take on the rest of the world.

I believe that our young people have the necessary will and spirit; all that they lack is the mentality of this stupid Government, who do not realise that our people can make the nation great again. The Minister should abandon his proposals to abolish the wages councils, and consider the pleas of the trade union movement. The trade unions are the country's allies—not its enemies, as Conservative Members would like to think.

My father was a trade unionist who fought for this country; my aunts and uncles fought for it too, and they were all trade unionists. Opposition Members are as committed to Great Britain as anyone else, and we see the trade union movement as an integral part of the nation's heritage and the fight to make it great again. The Government, however, are prepared to drive our people further into poverty. They talk of individualism, but the only individuals they are concerned about are their friends in the City.

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): I am pleased to be able to speak in such an important debate. I do not wish to follow the passionate but misguided comments of the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham), who epitomises the dinosaur approach of Opposition Members who are always looking backwards rather than forwards.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on her excellent, vigorous and constructive speech. The Bill is modest but wide ranging, designed to make limited changes to a number of important areas affecting employment and the trade unions. I believe that it will be warmly welcomed in the country and among a considerable number—probably the majority—of trade union members.

Since becoming a Member in 1983, I have taken part in a number of debates on trade union reform Bills which have subsequently been enacted. I am extremely interested in this subject, not only because employment issues are important to the country in general and to my constituency in particular, but as a former trade union member. When I was a teacher in the 1970s, I was a member of the National Union of Teachers for a while, during which time I saw at first hand how archaic trades union organisations were and how undemocratic they had become. Branch meetings were held at inconvenient times. The propaganda and voting by show of hands were quite appalling, and interest in individual members was non-existent. There followed the disgraceful situation of the union instructing its members to withdraw from school on a half-day strike, at which point I left the union because I felt that it was wrong for professionals to strike—wrong because of the principle and the damage to children's education, and wrong for a strike to be called before a secret ballot of all union members.

I was delighted in 1979, therefore, when the Conservative Government embarked on a systematic programme of trade union reform and employment legislation. That was long overdue and reform had become even more necessary after the legislation enacted by the Labour Government of the 1970s, supported by left-wing trade union leaders and financed by trade unions. Much of the legislation enacted in that period was proposed and allowed by trade unions.

Throughout the 1980s, I supported the rolling programme of legislation. That legislation has proved to be a great success. The worst excesses of the 1970s and the abuse of power by unrepresentative and irresponsible trade union leaders is well known. In addition, the Government had, and still have, a dual role—to protect society from politically motivated trade union barons and to assist ordinary trade union members to gain control of their unions. [Interruption.] Despite the sedentary comments of Opposition Members, I am not opposed to trade unions. I believe that they have a valuable role to play in contemporary society, but it is different from their historical role. Of course their role is to look after and represent the work force and to ensure that working conditions are improved, but they must now give advice, look after issues such as pensions and ensure that individuals are looked after in the workplace. Some good trade unions have done that, but others have failed to do so because they have been more interested in political activity than in advancing the interests of the workers whom they are supposed to represent.

Trade union leaders are now elected on a more democratic basis to look after their members' interests in the workplace. It is not their job to be political animals. Trade unions must attract members by showing what they can offer the work force; they cannot take members for granted, as they did in the past. Needless to say, the Opposition always opposed the union reforms of the past decade and remain out of touch. That is why they remain in opposition and will not be elected to government in the foreseeable future.

Employees should have increased freedom of choice —not only whether to belong to a trades union but to which trades union they wish to belong. There must be no coercion to join one union. That is in line with Conservative philosophy of choice. We know that it is anathema to Opposition Members, who do not believe in choice in anything. The Government are determined to increase choice for ordinary citizens, and that is— [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. There are too many sedentary interruptions.

Mr. Evennett: We have provided increased choice in housing, education and many other areas. The Government are continuing to widen choice in all areas, including trades union membership. Under the Bill, individuals must not be excluded or expelled from a union without good reason.

I have confined my speech to trade unions. We have heard much about wages councils and most of what needs to be said has been said by Conservative Members, but the improvements for trade unions under part I are advantageous to ordinary union members, particularly the improvements to the conduct of union elections. I note and approve of the Bill's endeavours to improve the election system for trade unions. This must improve fairness for candidates and ensure that they are all treated equally. The Bill also addresses the secrecy of union affairs, such as membership and remuneration—

Mr. Jimmy Boyce (Rotherham): What about Tory party funds?

Mr. Evennett: The hon. Gentleman has a large mouth and nonsense keeps coming out of it. If he listened for once he might learn something—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already spoken about sedentary interruptions. If hon. Members want to say something, they should seek to intervene in the proper parliamentary manner.

Mr. Boyce: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Evennett: No, I have no time.

In 1992, union members should be furnished with important details about their union. Certification officers' powers should be strengthened to investigate apparent impropriety in union affairs. Those are democratic safeguards for individual union members. More information and power for individuals will make for better trades unions. More choice and increased rights for citizens are the order of the day in 1992.

The Government's commitment to the citizens charter has been well received by the general public. For far too long, individual members of the public have been powerless against the might of large unions. I welcome the fact that under the Bill ordinary members of the public will be able to seek legal redress if they suffer as a result of unlawful industrial action. We have all suffered when strikes have been held at short notice. Indeed, sometimes no notice has been given and such action has disrupted business and has disrupted and annoyed my constituents. When that has occurred, especially in the transport sector, people have experienced terrible difficulty in getting home after a long day's work. I know that Opposition Members do not care about ordinary citizens, but Conservative Members believe that they are very important and that they should be our prime consideration.

The Bill proposes seven days' notice of strike action, which will be of considerable benefit to the general public. I warmly welcome those provisions. Some of my constituents would like my hon. Friend the Minister to go further and would support no-strike agreements for public services, so perhaps he will consider that as part of the rolling programme which we warmly support.

Judging from the sedentary interruptions of Opposition Members, one would not have thought that this was a modest Bill, but it travels along a moderate road leading to improved and more responsible trade unions and more power to members of trade unions. It is a valuable addition, I believe, to the legal reforms of the past 13 years. It will strengthen the rights of the individual, the employment rights of people at work and the democratic rights of trade union members.

Mrs. Audrey Wise (Preston): There are just 55 wages inspectors, whose job it is to enforce the wages council legislation. Yet, even with this tiny number, their diligent work uncovered 5,971 establishments last year paying below the legal minimum rate. There were only, however, 15 prosecutions; that is, one quarter of 1 per cent. of the known, discovered offences were prosecuted. That hardly suggests wild enthusiasm for law enforcement, but of course this was a matter of whether money would be put back into the pockets of low-paid workers from whom it had been stolen by employers who were acting illegally.

Not satisfied with that, the Government are now embarked on a drive to cut the wages of the lowest paid. They must think that wages will fall; indeed, they say that jobs will be increased because wages will fall. They think that employers are so eager to take on extra staff that anything that they can save by cutting wages they will gladly spend on increasing their staff.

Employers employ as few people as they can possibly get away with. This can be seen by looking at the number of unstaffed check-outs, while customers have to queue. I declare an interest as a sponsored member of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. I know about check-outs, and of course unstaffed check-outs mean queues by customers. Customers have to wait just so the staff will not have one minute to look around. So as few workers as possible are employed, the hours of part-time workers are cut against their wishes and their hours are frequently lowered to remove rights to legal protection. Wherever possible, employers employ casual workers, temporary workers or home workers at the lowest possible rates. It is highly improbable that cutting wages will increase employment in that sort of situation. However, it will have the effect of worsening the conditions of the low paid.

We have been told that no damage has been done to the wages of the young since the wages councils were stripped of their powers in relation to young people. However, my union had a look at the job centres in the Manchester area a fortnight ago. It found an advertisement—one of many deplorable advertisements—for a junior trainee hairdresser to work from Monday to Wednesday 9 to 6, Thursday 9 to 8, Friday 9 to 7 and Saturday 8.30 to 4.30; age 16 to 17 only, at a rate of £35 a week. Assuming that she would get a one-hour meal break a day, which cannot be assumed in hairdressing, I make that 50 hours a week at £35 pay. That was in Bolton. In Bury there was an advertisement for a stock assistant: 40 hours; £1·66 an hour at 16, £1·86 an hour at 17.

As the Equal Opportunities Commission has said, the rates for young people have decreased as a proportion of adult rates, and it believes that there is the strongest possibility that the pay of women currently covered by wages councils will fall proportionately to men's rates. But the Government say that it does not matter. They say, in a letter to my general secretary—one of many similar letters sent by Employment Ministers:

> "Most Wages Council workers are part-timers contributing only a part of the income coming into the family home. There is no close link between the wage rates of such workers and their income."

There are a number of aspects to that. One is that the income coming into a household is not necessarily available to the woman of that household. It is not her income, and her husband or partner may not consider it to be their income; he may consider that it is his income. So the idea that women as workers can simply be subsumed into the household is absolutely anachronistic. Conservatives always accuse us of being old-fashioned. There is nothing more old-fashioned than that; nothing more insulting and damaging to many families.

The EOC refers to the fact that, in 1978, it was discovered through research that three times as many families would be in poverty if it were not for the earnings of the mother in the household. The EOC points out that women's earnings contribute more to the family now than they did in 1978. We are talking about family poverty.

The Government say that overwhelmingly people in poverty do not have a job. They are experts in increasing the number of such people. They are now going down the road of increasing the number of people who are in poverty despite having a job. They are adding to the poverty of unemployment the poverty of the working poor. [Interruption.] I notice a great sense of humour among Ministers. They laughed heartily when my hon. Friends talked about the problems facing families at Christmas. People can draw their own conclusions from such expressions of humour.

People will be in poverty; they are in poverty now. Earnings of women are essential; they are not frivolous. Their earnings are not second incomes in the sense of not mattering to the family. The earnings matter to the individual woman and they matter to her family. There is every evidence that women's earnings will be cut as a result of the Bill.

If wages will not fall as a result of the Bill, why do the Government say that there will be extra jobs? How will that come about? If the Bill will have no effect on wages, where will employers get the extra funds that they are deemed to be willing to spend on more employment?

What will really happen is that demand will be withdrawn from the economy, which is a fancy way of saying that people will have less money to spend in the shops. That will mean not only that shopworkers' wages will be cut because they are the biggest group of workers covered by wages councils, but that their job opportunities will lessen because the recession in retailing is likely to be worsened.

Anybody who continues to think that the Conservative party is good at managing the economy must be blind to facts. The one certain fact is that the Conservative party is greatly damaging the economy of private citizens, especially low earners. I am pleased to have had the opportunity of saying that and to draw attention to the fact that if one removes a floor, rates above are likely to fall as well.

There is no truth in the Government's press statement in which they say:

> "Where companies pay above the pay levels laid down by wages councils, they are irrelevant."

Wages councils provide the floor. If the floor goes, people earning above wages council rates will also be affected. The Bill is a drive against the wages of the poor, but it is also a drive against wages generally. I hope that it will be defeated.

9.7 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): If what the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) said about the unions is right, if they have a powerful role in acting for their members in negotiations, if they are able to influence contracts of employment without reference back to their members personally, if they are able to have subscriptions deducted from wages without reference to their members every year, and if they are important in our society, why should they not give basic rights to their members?

One such right is the right to a full postal ballot before industrial action. Why should they not give that right so that employees have the opportunity to consider the merits of industrial action in their own homes, away from the pressures of the workplace?

Why should not trade unions give an annual statement of their finances, saying what is happening to the money that the members have paid? Why should not the trade unions consult on subscription increases when they come up? Why should they not have to justify themselves to their members every three years if they are to continue to have the right to check off? Finally, if the institutions are so important, why should not the individual member have the right to choose which one he or she wants to join?

Over the years, we have heard trade union representatives and Labour Members repeatedly object to legislation, only to find a few years later that it has become official Labour party policy. It is too bad that, instead of a genuine debate, we hear nothing but the Labour party's parrot calls.

Winston Churchill introduced the legislation which laid the foundations for wages councils in circumstances very different from those obtaining today. He wanted to protect the disabled, the widows and the infirm. He was concerned that concerned should not be "undersold". I repeat that circumstances have changed since then. In those days, the social security system, which provides a safety net for low-paid workers, did not exist—and the trade unions were perhaps not so effective as they later became. Above all, we should remember that 80 per cent. of workers now covered by the wages councils do not rely on that money for their entire livelihood.

> "the worker whose whole livelihood depends upon the industry"

There was a time when trade unions would admit that circumstances had changed. In the 1960s, 1970s and early 1980s, the Transport and General Workers Union was opposed to wages councils. In its response to the Donovan commission, the TGWU said:

> "Wages Councils do not represent an effective means of raising the standards of lower paid workers and they should be abolished."

At the TGWU policy conference in 1981, at which a motion in favour of statutory control of wages was lost, the deputy general secretary reasserted the union's opposition to statutory controls on wages.

Under Labour, unions such as the Society of Graphical and Allied Trades took no part in the proceedings to abolish the wages council for box makers, but welcomed the change as soon as it had been abolished. It supported the abolition of wages councils. At one time, the Labour party defended proposals to get rid of 10 wages councils. It seems to me that, these days, we cannot have a genuine debate on these matters, even though there has always been a strong body of opinion in the trade union movement to the effect that wages councils are ineffective.

The councils are also inflexible. They interfere with employers' ability to provide incentive schemes for their workers and freeze differentials at low levels. They prevent new businesses starting up and moving from low wages to higher wages as they progress. They are anachronistic. Why are workers with woven cloth covered, whereas workers with knitted cloth are not? Why are hairdressers covered when beauticians working in the same establishments are not? Why is cooked meat covered but not raw meat? The time has come for the wages councils to be abolished.

I am amazed that measures to provide rights to trade union members should be opposed. Sensible measures to deal with anachronisms such as the provisions governing pregnant women must be welcomed, and it is a pity that Labour Members oppose the Bill.

The changes in the way in which industrial tribunals and the employment appeals tribunals work are important. At present, there are long delays and backlogs —indeed, I have written to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about one case involving a year's delay. Measures to allow chairmen of tribunals and the employment appeal tribunal to decide cases on points of law will drastically reduce such backlogs. That measure, too, should be supported.

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): May I start by recognising the speech of the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley)? I appreciate that compliments from the Opposition are often considered mixed blessings, and so they should be, but while I did not agree with all he said, I appreciated his comments on wages councils and the way in which he presented them. I also noticed the pre-emptive strike on him by his party through the mouthpiece of the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) and I thought that the hon. Gentleman might require some assistance. However, he was able to present his case splendidly. Therefore, I look forward to further contributions from him in Committee.

The best that one can say about the Bill is that it is a squalid, mean-minded, mean-spirited and ill-conceived piece of legislation—in fact, one of the worst pieces of legislation to come before the House for a considerable time. It has little to do with workers' rights or industrial relations, and nothing to do with employment. It is all about trying to keep the Tory troops on the Back Benches in order and in good humour. The Bill is nothing more than a vestigial remnant from the past, and, like all vestigial remnants, it is utterly useless. It is a piece of outdated Thatcherism from which the world has moved on, but apparently not some in the Tory party.

It is not so much a Bill whose time has come, as many Tory Members tried to maintain; rather it is a Bill whose time has passed, although the contributions from the Tory Members make it clear that many of them are living in the past.

The Bill is schizophrenic. It is not sure where it stands. It lacks intellectual rigour and honesty. There are good parts in it, such as the provisions on maternity rights, the transfer of undertakings and contracts, and the attempt to protect whistleblowers and the right to stop the job. But all those good parts are submerged in a deluge of mean and provocative clauses which attack a decent wage, decent terms and conditions, a decent future and, above all, the only organisation which will fight for all those aims—the trade union.

The whole basis of the Bill was given away by the hon. Member for Romford (Sir M. Neubert), when he said that the check-off provision was the basis on which the Government would bring about the fatal blow to trade unions. That is what it is about. It is not about protecting the rights of individuals, but about trying to kill off trade unions and their links and contributions to the Labour party. I am grateful to the hon. Member for being honest enough to say that in the House.

Apparently the Government are embarrassed by this tatty little piece of legislation. So they should be. I was not a Member when the Government started to introduce their industrial legislation in 1979 and through the 1980s, but I understand that the Tory Benches used to be crowded when that legislation came forward. It is significant that most Tory Members are so embarrassed by the Bill that they have been hiding.

The Secretary of State was so embarrassed that she did not want the Bill brought back until after Christmas, if not later. She had briefed industrial correspondents on that. Presumably she was hoping that she or the Government would move on, but she has not been successful, and the ideologues have won. The Government have every right to be embarrassed; in future, they will be not just embarrassed but ashamed of the attacks on individuals brought about by the Bill.

Let us look at this curate's egg. On the one hand, the Government plan to abolish wages councils, saying that they are a burden on employers. On the other hand, they are introducing measures which we greatly value, such as the right to contract, maternity leave, and the transfer of undertakings, all of which in the Government's own language can be classified as burdens on employers. Why the contradiction?

Part of the Government's problem is that they do not know the difference between burdens and duties. It is the Government's job to place duties on employers to safeguard the rights of employees—the right to a decent wage, the right to decent conditions and the right to maternity leave and to a contract. Those rights are guaranteed by duties on employers.

I dare say that many employers consider those matters to be a burden. However, the Opposition do not take that view. We believe that they are duties that any reasonable society would expect their Government to place on employers. The main reason for the apparent contradiction in the Bill and its intellectual dishonesty, opposing duties in one sphere—wages councils—while supporting them in respect of maternity rights, health and safety and contracts, is that the latter measures are not ones that the Government wanted to bring in.

The Government did not want to introduce maternity rights or provisions on health and safety and contracts. They did not introduce them through any generosity of spirit. They have brought them in simply because they were forced to do so by EC directives. The Government should not claim any credit for those provisions. The Government did not want them. They are in the Bill because they were forced on the Government.

Even when the Government are forced to include such measures, rather than concede them with a good grace, they have had to be dragged screaming and kicking into the latter half of the 20th century. The Government opposed the directives on maternity rights and the other beneficial effects every inch of the way.

Clause 26 deals with the transfer of undertakings. The directive about that has been around since 1977. The Government have been in office for 13 years, but they are only now introducing legislation to implement it in full. That does not show much commitment on the Government's part.

The Secretary of State made great play of the maternity benefits, but the Government did not want them and they fought them every inch of the way in the Commission. They had the original proposals watered down. That is another example of how the measure is mean in spirit, mean in action and simply rotten to the core.

The meanest part of the Bill is the part that the Government do want—the abolition of the wages councils. It is difficult to imagine a more pitiful response at a time of economic slump. With Britain in recession, unemployment rising, homelessness increasing and confidence collapsing, it is difficult to imagine a more inappropriate Government response.

Then again, the Government are only being true to form. At the height of the recession, following their own gross mismanagement, their only response is to put the boot into some of the weakest in society, to remove from the weakest their only protection, the wages councils. It is typical of the Government and the Tories that, when they are in trouble, they can only attack the weakest. They attack workers earning as little as £2·60 an hour, which represents a take-home pay of about £80 a week.

The Government give many reasons for their attack on wages councils, and they are all as pathetic as the action itself. The Prime Minister gave some reasons in response to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). The first of them was repeated tonight by the hon. Member for Teignbridge—that wages councils have been around since 1909 and therefore should be abolished. The Prime Minister said:

> "These days, wages councils are an anachronism. They no longer have a useful role. They were set up in 1909 and they are not relevant to 1992."—[Official Report, 5 November 1992; Vol. 213, c. 407.]

That is quite an interesting piece of political philosophy: because something has been around for a long time, de facto it must be abolished. The House of Lords has been around for much longer, and I therefore look forward in the next Parliament to a Bill to abolish the House of Lords for the same reason.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Or the abolition of the Government.

Mr. Galbraith: As my hon. Friend points out, the Government have been around for a long time and they are also in line for abolition.

The Prime Minister's next reason for abolishing the wages councils is that they are supposed to be bureaucratic. Whenever I hear that argument from the Government, I know that they are really struggling in their last refuge. Yes, wages councils cost just over £2 million, but new provisions in the Bill will cost that amount. Are those not bureaucratic? What is the difference? The councils and those provisions are not bureaucratic—they are the necessary price we pay to introduce decent terms, conditions and rights for individuals, and it is a price well worth paying.

Both those arguments are pulled together in what the Prime Minister said constituted a burden on employers. The Government's philosophy is laid bare—no burdens on employers, no regulations, no statutes, just the free market. Malnourished children up the chimneys and pregnant women down the mines—that is the Government's philosophy for society. There will be no rights, nothing for anyone, but there will certainly be exploitation.

The Government try to dress all that up as a measure to increase jobs. I heard much talk about that from the Conservative Benches. The Government contend that wages councils reduce employment. They have decided to abolish wages councils because of their ideology and they are now scrambling around for reasons. They have come up with the idea that they reduce employment. I am having difficulty finding evidence to support that case. They have trotted out the same hoary old studies on minimum wages. Even they must know that they do not necessarily apply to wages councils.

After considerable prompting by the hon. Member for Eltham, the Minister produced a long list of references, contending to support his case, showing a relationship between wages and employment. It was an impressive little biography, in nice alphabetical order, quickly pulled out of a computer. But the notable thing about the Government's list, which was also tripped out by the hon. Member for Teignbridge, is that it concerns the relationship between wages and jobs and not necessarily minimum wages.

Many of those studies are also fatally flawed. First, they presuppose the effect of a minimum wage on other wages, and set about calculating the extent of job losses based on the wrong premise. Because they work from the wrong premise, they get the wrong answer.

The second flaw in their argument, and the reason that the premise is wrong, is that the labour market is not a homogeneous body, with every part responding similarly, and I should have thought that Conservative Members would have known that. For example, take the rise in women's pay to equal men's, following the Equal Pay Act 1970. According to Government philosophy, as applied to the abolition of the wages councils, that would have reduced employment because it led to a rise in average wages; yet, far from falling, women's employment continued to rise.

The Government base their studies on the employment effect of wages councils and do not analyse any relative changes in wages. There is no conclusive evidence that wages councils decrease employment, and it may be quite the opposite. They may lead to an increase, and their abolition to a decrease.

In 1986, workers under the age of 21 were removed from the wages councils' responsibility. Wage rates for that group have fallen, but there has been no increase in the number employed. Nearly one in five young workers aged between 18 and 19 are registered as unemployed, which is double the rate among the rest of the population. Rather than helping young workers, removing them from the responsibility of the wages councils has led to their prospects deteriorating.

That was effectively summed up in the study by Machin and Manning, which I am sure the Minister has read in full, as I have. They studied wages councils in the United Kingdom—the councils that the Government hope to abolish—and concluded that there is no evidence of an increase in employment as a result of a decline in the councils' effectiveness.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Am I not right in recalling that that study excluded part-time workers, who are the majority of people covered by wages councils?

Mr. Galbraith: No, it did not exclude part-time workers, but I shall consider the Minister's question when I read the report again. The authors concluded that employment declined as a result of the decreasing effectiveness of wages councils, and added:

> "There is no evidence that the activities of wages councils have acted as a restraint on employment in Britain in the 1980s. If anything, it is easier to make the argument that minimum wages have been good for employment."

In other words, there is no evidence to suggest that wages councils reduce employment. Indeed, they have the opposite effect.

All that was admitted by the Government. In reply to a question from the hon. Member for Eltham, who asked what effect abolishing wages councils would have on employment, the Under-Secretary of State replied that the Government did not have such information. So the Government want to abolish wages councils even though they have no information on which to base their prejudices.

On the other hand, there are strong arguments in favour of wages councils, and many have been stated in the debate. In particular, they prevent the good employer from being undercut by the bad. The abolition of wages councils means pay rates falling so as to compete, staff becoming transient and jobs being used merely as a step further along the ladder. So good employers cannot maintain their pay rates, cannot retain or train staff, and cannot provide a better service.

The main argument in favour of wages councils is that of justice. My hon. Friends and I want not the abolition of wages councils but the abolition of the exploitation which will come from their abolition. With the abolition of wages councils, pay rates will fall, as my hon. Friends have pointed out. Indeed, that is the basis of the Government's argument, and they cannot run away from it. Their view is that wages will fall and employment will increase. That is the basis for a reduction in wages.

As part of the low pay review in the autumn of 1989, a study showed that the abolition of wages councils covering those under 21 resulted in their wages suffering. It also showed that, if the qualifying age had remained at 18, nearly 20 per cent. of the licensed hotels surveyed would have been paying below the minimum. A job survey by the Greater Manchester low pay unit in July 1988 found that 70 per cent. of jobs with advertised rates of pay were offering rates less than those that would have been paid had they not been under the protection of wages councils.

In a random analysis of cases referred to the Scottish low pay unit, the rates for those not covered by wages councils were absolutely atrocious. I will detail a few: hairdresser, £1·55 per hour; catering assistant, £1·80 per hour; security guard, £1·70; dental assistant, £1·95; clerical worker, £1·75; secretary, £1·67; car valeter, £1·67; care assistant, £1·75; and cleaner, £1·65. There was not one above £2 an hour.

That is the situation that the Government want to impose on the workers of Britain. Do they really want wages at such a pathetically low level? How long are they prepared to let wages fall? How much are they preparing for the exploitation of the workers? What standards do they want to set?

There are no reasons why wages councils should be abolished, and there is every reason to retain them. At the time of rocketing unemployment, with poverty increasing all round, the Government, with all their powers, pull themselves up to the grandeur of their office and all they can offer is a mouse—the abolition of wages councils—which is a response so pitiful, callous and inadequate that it is difficult to imagine it coming even from the present Government. Exploitation, poverty and injustice are clearly their vision for Britain.

The Bill is mean in spirit, spiteful in intent and callous in effect. It will do nothing to improve either the lot of employers or the economy of Britain. For all those reasons, we shall most certainly be pleased to vote against it in the Lobby tonight.

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Michael Forsyth): Listening to the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith), I found myself wondering why, if he thinks that wages councils are such a good thing, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) was so reluctant to tell the House that he would reinstate them after they were abolished by the House of Commons.

The changes that we propose in the Bill are entirely consistent with our successful step-by-step approach of the past 13 years. They will ensure that we have a legislative framework in tune with the needs of a modern economy: a framework which will contribute to, rather than impede, the promotion of individual rights; a framework which will enable businesses to respond quickly to changes and opportunities in a competitive market; and which will therefore help in the creation of new jobs, as my hon. Friends the Members for Romford (Sir M. Neubert) and for Meriden (Mr. Mills) said in their excellent speeches.

The Government's policy is clear, consistent and credible. But what of the Opposition's policies?

Mr. Graham: How will someone who is paid £3 an hour on a wages council scale be any better off if the wages are reduced to £2? Does that mean that for £1 an hour another person will be employed? Is that the logic of the Government's answer?

Mr. Forsyth: No, that is not the logic of the Government's answer. The hon. Gentleman ought to know that two thirds of the people covered by the wages councils are paid more than the minimum rate. I shall come to the point about wages councils later. The hon. Gentleman may well want to intervene again then.

We have all grown used to the ritual commitments of Opposition spokesmen to repeal successive Acts of Parliament since 1979. Those Acts have helped to transform the climate of industrial relations in Britain, for example, by introducing secret ballots for union elections and before strikes; by the effective outlawing of most secondary picketing and secondary industrial action; and by ending the iniquities of the closed shop—the abuses which my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Sykes) described so vividly.

However, I thought that tonight the sobering experience of a fourth successive electoral defeat, together with the appointment of a new, although hardly fresh, Opposition spokesman, would herald a long overdue acceptance of the Government's industrial relations reforms. Where the Government have advanced through step-by-step reform, the Opposition, like Napoleon pulling back from Moscow, have been reduced to grudging step-by-step retreat—an observation made by my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste), in the light of all his experience of the Standing Committees which have considered employment Bills. I hope that his experience will be extended further by his participation in the Standing Committee which will consider the Bill, but that is a matter for others.

The House will have seen what the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden and the Opposition have to offer in response to the Government's clearly formulated and detailed proposals. First, they have made a thinly disguised commitment to hand back more power to the trade unions. Secondly, they have a crass commitment to the disastrous minimum wage policy which would destroy so many of the very jobs for which they want artificially to increase the pay. Thirdly, they unquestioningly accept the Maastricht social chapter, in a misguided attempt to bring in by the back door the failed socialist policies so decisively rejected by the Government and electorate.

Labour's proposals are about as worthy of serious consideration as a Norwegian entry to the Eurovision song contest. But the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras deserves a prize for sheer brass neck in claiming that the Bill is irrelevant to the main employment issues that we face.

What is irrelevant about measures to give employees new rights and protections at work, new rights for pregnant workers and new protections for those with health and safety responsibilities? How can the Opposition pretend that it is irrelevant to protect the democratic rights of individual trade union members?

Mr. Burden: If the Government are so concerned about individual rights, why does not the Bill contain a clause to restore to employees who have been working less than two years the right to go to an industrial tribunal to claim unfair dismissal? Why can people be sacked unreasonably when their only crime is to have been employed for less than two years?

Mr. Forsyth: I should be more inclined to take advice from the hon. Gentleman on that matter if he did not intend to go through the Lobbies tonight and vote against a Bill that extends employees' rights to go to industrial tribunals of the kind that he described.

How can it be irrelevant to remove anti-competitive restrictions that hinder the creation of new jobs or to broaden the current straitjacket that regulates the management of the careers service? It cannot, and the Opposition know it.

The hon. Members for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham) and for Wallasey (Ms. Eagle) and others showed clearly that the Opposition simply do not understand—or perhaps cannot bring themselves to recognise—that there is and always will be a very fundamental and direct relationship between economic competitiveness and jobs. Measures to improve competitiveness—for example, by reducing anti-competitive practices and removing artificial barriers in the labour market—will help to create a climate in which more, rather than fewer, new jobs will be created; and fewer, rather than more, existing jobs will be at risk.

Opposition Members have presented some ingenious arguments for the retention of wages councils tonight. Their views now are somewhat different from those of the last Labour Government. When the Opposition were last in office, they abolished 11 wages councils. The last Labour Government freed more than half a million workers from wages council control.

What has changed? I am puzzled. It is simple: when the Labour Government held power, they believed that they could dragoon people into joining the unions. Wages councils were seen as a threat to their recruitment plans and collective bargaining, as the right hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Sir H. Walker), who was a Minister at the time, confirmed earlier in the debate. The argument at the time was, why join a union if the councils set the rates?

The trade unions have now changed their views in line with the new reality. As their membership and enthusiasm for trade unions has declined, the wages councils have become the last refuge. With the wages councils, the brothers could still negotiate the wages even if they no longer represented the workers.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Will the Minister give his own evaluation of those matters—he must have an opinion? What does he consider is a suitable minimum rate of pay for, say, a security guard who literally puts himself in the line of fire in the interests of society?

Mr. Forsyth: Oh dear, the hon. Gentleman has chosen a poor example because security guards are not covered by wages councils. He makes my point for me. The position for the 10 per cent. of workers who are covered by wages councils should be the same as for the 90 per cent., which includes security guards, who are not covered. They should receive a wage that reflects the ability of the employer to pay in a competitive manner.

What has been the Opposition's principled response? "Never mind the arguments or what we did in government", has been their response. The Labour dogs have continued to jump through the trade union hoops, as they always do.

I am still not clear what the Opposition's new policy is. I shall happily give way to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, who so gallantly gave way to me. He refused to tell us what he would do in the unlikely event of his being in government. We know that the hon. Gentleman would introduce the job-destroying minimum wage, but would he bring it in and keep the wages councils? Would he maintain the councils' present powers or increase them? Would there be new councils to cover the 90 per cent. of workers forgotten by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson)? Would there be more bureaucracy followed by more bureaucracy?

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras should tell the House what the Opposition's policy is exactly—it is all rather vague. The hon. Gentleman refused to give an undertaking that a Labour Government would bring back wages councils. I shall happily give way so that he can give that undertaking to the House——

Hon. Members: Give way.

Mr. Forsyth: Where now the crusade on behalf of wages councils? The leader of that crusade will not even give a commitment to bring back the councils.

Mr. Dobson: As the Minister should know, our crusade is not on behalf of any particular structure; it is about the people who are presently being paid less than £3 an hour and who the Government want to be paid even less. We believe that those people should and would benefit from the Labour party's proposal to introduce a national minimum wage at a rate far higher than they currently receive.

Mr. Forsyth: I think that the hon. Gentleman was telling the House that he has no intention of bringing back wages councils. Why? Because he has listened to the arguments advanced by my hon. Friends today and has been persuaded. The structure in which the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras should be interested is that of his own argument and campaign that has just collapsed around his ears.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) was even more opaque about the Liberal party's intentions in respect of wages councils and a minimum wage. I shall happily give way to the hon. Gentleman if he wants to tell us the Liberal party's position. Once again, we see an Opposition who oppose, but have no idea about how to make progress on the issue.

I have the impression that Opposition Members have convinced themselves that wages councils are wholly concerned with combating poverty. The Opposition ignore improvements in living standards and the changes in the work force. They ignore the existence of targeted benefits and the fact that the majority of workers covered by councils are in two-income households.

There are almost as many low-paid workers from the richest 10 per cent. of households in this country as from the poorest. The biggest cause of unemployment—[Interruption.] Wage fixing is a cause of unemployment, but the biggest cause of poverty in Britain is unemployment, and wages councils put more people on the dole.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), who was a distinguished predecessor in the Department of Employment, acknowledges that wages councils destroy jobs. He raised a number of other important issues, which I hope to have the opportunity of discussing with him in future.

Mrs. Gorman: Is my hon. Friend aware of the evidence from the United States—which does have a minimum wage law—which shows that every time the minimum wage is increased, there is an increase in the number of relatively low-skilled workers who lose their jobs? That has been happening since 1947 when the law was introduced in America, where it has been a disaster.

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend that there is no point in giving people the right to a minimum wage if the price paid is to have no job.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Forsyth: I should like to make some progress first.

The councils impose rigid and bureaucratic constraints on employers and workers. Every year the councils meet to set a new minimum rate. Every year there are percentage increases, sometimes well above the rate of inflation. Every percentage increase sets the going rate for wage increases over an entire industry. Every firm, large or small, whatever its position, comes under pressure to raise the pay of all employees, however much they earn. The hon. Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) must recognsie that the firms have to do so without regard to the factors that matter: market conditions, productivity, performance and ability to pay. As my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) told the House, employers, trade unionists, academics, and City experts all accept that legal wage fixing destroys jobs—yet the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden doubts the existence of the evidence.

The Opposition leadership refuses to accept the large body of independent research which shows the link between pay and jobs. It refuses to accept what is obvious to every family in the country: the more things cost, the less people can afford; the higher the pay increase, the lower the number of jobs. In Labour's "Alice in Wonderland" world, if things cost twice as much, people can have twice as many.

I am surprised that the Opposition's minimum wage is only two thirds of median men's earnings. If the minimum wage does not put jobs in jeopardy, why not pay everyone even more? Why not raise the minimum wage to average earnings? Why not increase it so that everyone is better off and no one suffers? This is the economics of the madhouse, and it is the economics of Labour Front-Bench spokesmen. The need for wages councils has long since disappeared. It is time for them to go.

It is also time individuals had the right to join the union of their choice. The Opposition, to their discredit, oppose that, claiming that it will jeopardise single union agreements.

We have heard many fine words about single union agreements from Opposition Members, and from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras in particular. They exhibit all the zeal of new converts. I have not forgotten how opposition to single union agreements by trade unions robbed Dundee and the north-east of Scotland, where I was brought up, of 1,000 jobs and £40 million worth of investment, as Ford was sent scurrying to Spain. Then, in the same year, the Electrical, Electronics, Telecommunications and Plumbing Union was drummed out of the TUC because it had signed single union agreements. For the TUC to defend Bridlington while extolling the merits of single union deals is breathtaking hypocrisy.

The provision in the Bill is concerned solely with trade union membership rights. It will mean that a person who wishes to join a trade union can no longer be told—by the TUC, by union leaders, by an employer, or by anyone else—which union he or she must join.

Mr. John Evans: Will the Minister explain something that the Secretary of State refused to explain? There is a single union agreement at Nissan in Sunderland. If a person who is a member of the Amalgamated Engineering Union decides to leave that union and to join, say, the TGWU, will he have the right to be represented in negotiations by the TGWU with Nissan management?

Mr. Forsyth: That sort of proposal was included in Labour's 1975 legislation, which was abandoned and which was not even supported by the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service because it proved unworkable. Employers will remain free as they are now to decide which, if any, trade union they want to recognise. That is an entirely separate matter from the right of individuals to join a trade union of their choice.

Contrary to claims by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, there is no question of our seeking to outlaw the so-called check-off arrangements, as they are outlawed in socialist France. That is neither the intention nor the effect of our proposals——

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Why not?

Mr. Forsyth: Because we are reasonable. Employers and trade unions will still be able to enter into an agreement to operate the check-off, but they will no longer be able to force a trade union member to accept such an arrangement against his wishes. As with other measures in the Bill, the Government on this occasion are on the side of the trade union member. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald) said in a splendid contribution, no one should have to suffer check-off deductions unless he has given his clear written authority in advance.

Mr. Dobson: Does the Department know of any examples of union deductions being checked off people's wages when those people have not given their consent? If it does, why were those examples not included in the answer I was given by one of the hon. Gentleman's ministerial colleagues?

Mr. Forsyth: A convener from the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians was reported in The Sunday Times last year to have said:

> "a member known to me thought he had been paying his contributions for two and a half years and subsequently found he was not a member . . . now he asks where the money has gone . . . is he alone?"

Is he indeed? The hon. Gentleman should know.

We no longer live in a world dominated by the collective; a world where labour is treated as a homogenous block——

Mr. Dobson: Is it true that the company that stopped the money itself gives money to the Tory party?

Mr. Forsyth: What an astonishing question. The hon. Gentleman made it clear early in the debate that he does not understand the position in respect of individual consent for deductions of subscriptions. He asks me for an example of abuse and he comes back with a comment like that. It shows where the hon. Gentleman's loyalties truly lie.

The Bill is about creating new rights and freedoms; rights and freedoms which recognise the responsibilities of employers to their employees, of trade unions to their members, and of those who provide goods and services to the community at large. It champions the individual, whether as an employee, a trade union member or a consumer. In doing so, it provides protection against the unscrupulous employer and against the undemocratic or improper actions of trade unions or their leaders.

The debate has demonstrated in stark terms one of the fundamental differences between the Government's policies and those of the Opposition. The provisions in the Bill reinforce the Government's commitment to an employment market and an industrial relations climate based on the principles of flexibility, freedom and fairness —flexibility to meet changing business needs and the aspirations and circumstances of individual employees; freedom from unwarranted Government regulation and from manipulation by anti-competitive trade union practices; and fairness which derives from an effective package of individual employment rights.

In opposing the Bill the Opposition reveal their true colours. Their job-destroying national minimum wage and social chapter, which they espouse in the name of fairness, would hit hardest those for whom they sanctimoniously protest their support.

Worst of all, the Opposition have shown themselves to be the party which puts the interests of collective organisation above those of individual rights and freedom. In opposing the Bill's proposals for further reform of trade union legislation—reforms which respond to clear evidence of shortcomings in the existing law—the Opposition are confirming their established role as the mouthpiece of the trade union movement.

Do the Opposition really want to deny employees the right not to be victimised on health and safety grounds? Do they want to deny pregnant workers protection against dismissal? Do they want to prevent people receiving a proper statement of their terms and conditions of employment?

None of those new rights will come into law without the Bill. Will the Opposition vote tonight to deny trade union members the new democratic rights and protections included in the Bill? Do they still want to be seen as the party which denies individual trade union members proper statutory protection against mismanagement or abuse in their union's affairs?

Are the Opposition happy to see those who misuse members' subscriptions go unpunished? Do they want to prevent union members from knowing how much their leaders are paid? Do they condone elections where mythical Mickey Mouse and dubious Donald Duck can cast their votes again alongside real union members?

Will the Opposition vote to deny individual citizens protection against disruption and hardship which will come through the new citizen's right and the requirement for unions to give at least seven days' notice of strike calls? Or are the Opposition, as so often in the past, still to be cast in the role of the striker's friend?

The Opposition are singing from the old-fashioned song book of the trade union barons on whose patronage and support they still depend. But they are out of tune not only with the needs of the British economy and labour market of the 1990s, but with the aspirations and expectations of millions of individuals, including many trade union members—trade union members who, as the results at successive general elections have shown, continue to ignore the advice of their leaders by voting for the Government and supporting our reforms in this area. In their name I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

Bill read a Second time and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Ways and Means Motion relating to Car Tax (Abolition) may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. David Davis.]

TRADE UNION REFORM AND EMPLOYMENT RIGHTS BILL [Money]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) any expenditure of the Secretary of State in securing the provision of careers services,

(b) any sum payable by the Secretary of State to or in respect of the Commissioner for Protection Against Unlawful Industrial Action, and

(c) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act.—[Mr. David Davis.]

10.14 pm

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellsemere Port and Neston): The section on "Financial effects of the Bill" says:

"The Bill is estimated to give rise to an overall net saving to public funds."

I question that judgment on a number of headings.

The Bill continues:

"The net cost to public funds arising from the provisions of the Bill which create new or extended grounds of complaints to industrial tribunals is estimated to be some £1·5 million in a full year."

I shall seek to show that those costs are indeterminate, and substantially higher than the estimated figures. In a period of alleged constraint on public expenditure, such an increase does not seem wise.

Clause 14 provides for independent scrutineers for balloting arrangements. Why do the Government not recognise that the scrutineers could enable people to be balloted in the workplace, thus saving substantial amounts of effort and time on the part of the scrutineers?

Clause 22 deals with the transfer of undertakings. The regulations will not create a high cost to the Exchequer, but if the Government are so keen to protect pension funds, why are pension funds excluded from the clause? Reference has been made this evening to Maxwell. Are the Government really taking the issue seriously, or are they protecting the interest of a few Lords who are in the business of buying and selling companies?

Schedule 4 deals with the rights of representation in disciplinary cases. Again, there is no reference to the rights of the individual. We have heard time and again today about the rights of the individual. The failure to incorporate the right of the individual to representation or clearly to specify that right in the Bill will increase the legal costs to the Exchequer from industrial tribunals, from the employment appeals tribunal, and from higher courts.

Extensive references have been made to an alleged £3 million to be saved from the abolition of the wages councils. We have had a long and impassioned debate today about that proposal. There may be savings of £3 million, but what will be the cost to the lowest paid? Has the Chancellor made the obvious calculation about the net effect of that abolition on social security payments? I should welcome a response from Ministers about the projections on such payments.

The functions of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service have been narrowed by the Bill. That is an interesting point. Narrowing the functions of ACAS may achieve some financial savings, but it contradicts what was said in the Government's official brief. Once again, fact stands in the way of dogma. The Government simply fail to understand a modern economy.

Clauses 29 and 30 narrow the scope and powers of tribunals. Chairmen will be given the right to sit on their own when working people who seek confidence in tribunals want their rights to be represented properly by a fully fledged tribunal. To cut the resources available to that service will be damaging in the extreme to the process of industrial relations. As a result of the change, more cases will go to the employment appeals tribunal and higher courts, and higher costs will therefore be involved.

The Bill is a reflection of the Government's failure, yet again, to understand. Contrary to what Conservative Members have said, the Bill attacks the structures of unions to the disadvantage of individuals, and it does so at indeterminate cost to the taxpayer.

The Bill could have afforded increased protection to individuals against unscrupulous employers and in the interests of industrial relations. It failed to do that. It could have promoted change that would have enhanced our competitiveness. It failed to do that. The mood of the House is clear: these matters will be dealt with in detail in Committee.

I take very seriously a financial point which has been made a number of times in a lighthearted manner. It is time that we had payment by results around here—including payment by results for Ministers. I am glad to see that they are not to take a pay rise this year—indeed, it is time for a pay cut. That would introduce TQM—total quality management—in style on the Government Front Bench.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Having listened to much of our proceedings today, I regard the Bill as a thoroughly sound measure. I am therefore happy to support the money resolution. The opinion of the House as a whole was also manifestly in favour of the Bill, as the result of the Division reflected a majority far greater than the Government's actual majority.

My constituents are economical by nature, as am I. The fact remains, however, that they do not begrudge expenditure on worthy causes. Who can describe it as other than worthy to secure the provision of careers services, as the money resolution requests? Which Conservative Member—and which of the saner members of the public—would begrudge money spent on protection against unlawful industrial action? We should have had that years ago. I am happy to support the money resolution.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I am pleased to discover that, rather than money resolutions going through on the nod, we are now to have genuine debates on them. I am grateful to my hon. Friends, a number of whom wish to speak, and to the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman). I hope that my information that this is the latest that the hon. Lady has been in the Chamber for more than 10 years is not true, and that she will be here regularly in future.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) to make a manifestly untrue statement? I am frequently in the House at 6 am; I am frequently here until late.

Mr. Cryer: I said that I hoped that it was not true. I hope that the hon. Lady will be here to take part in debates on money resolutions again and again. I welcome the fact that she is here. I find it extraordinary that she should take exception to my defence of her attendance record.

Why do we need a money resolution when, according to the Bill, it is estimated that it will give rise to an overall net saving in public funds? Paragraph (a) of the money resolution provides for the authorisation of "any expenditure of the Secretary of State in securing the provision of careers services".

Yet the explanatory and financial memorandum states:

"There will be no overall change in the forecast level of central government expenditure funding for careers services by reason of the new arrangement which may be established by virtue of clause 33."

Why, therefore, is there a need for paragraph (a)?

Paragraph (b) refers to

[Mr. Cryer]

"any sum payable by the Secretary of State to or in respect of the Commissioner for Protection Against Unlawful Industrial Action".

According to the financial memorandum in the Bill, that amounts to £300,000. I shall come to that in a moment.

Paragraph (c) refers to

"any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act."

The financial memorandum makes clear that there will be expenditure of £600,000 by the Department of Employment and the Scottish and Welsh Offices.

According to the Minister, the cost of the extension of the work of industrial tribunals is estimated at £1·5 million in a full year. The additional costs for the certification officer and the new commissioner will be £300,000. Together with the £600,000 for the increase in the careers services, the total expenditure is estimated at £2·4 million, but the income claimed in the financial memorandum is £2·8 million through the wretched, nasty, vicious abolition of wages councils. The Minister is giggling about it all, but that gives a net income to the Department of £400,000. Why, therefore, do the Government need a money resolution? The reason is that the Government have allowed for large increases over and above the estimates in the paragraphs dealing with the financial effects of the Bill.

The £300,000 allocated for the new investigatory functions of the certification officer and the activities of the new commissioner is a paltry sum. A function of the certification officer will be to investigate financial malpractices in trade unions, of which there is very little evidence. Perhaps the Minister can confirm that the sum is small because the Government do not expect to find any financial malpractice. When the Government were considering that function, why did they not apply the same criteria to the City, and particularly to Lloyd's insurance market? There is no legislation before us which offers to trawl over the board rooms and the accounts of the big businesses which back the Tory party. Instead, the Government are spending taxpayers' money in an area where there is very little evidence of financial malpractice.

In addition, the new commissioner is to be covered by the self-same £300,000. He will decide whether High Court or Court of Session actions will be financed. On that basis, I should have thought that £300,000 was a very small sum. The one closed shop that the Government do not oppose is the lawyers' closed shop. The Minister knows full well that that closed shop can run away with hundreds of thousands of pounds in a matter of days. The complicated libel actions and breach of contract actions which take place in our courts can result in costs of £100,000 and £200,000. The Bill specifically requires the new commissioner to deal with cases where, because of their complexity, an individual cannot take them any further. Therefore, I wonder whether £300,000 is adequate since the Government will use taxpayers' money to bolster up complaints about trade unions and send them into the courts. At the same time, the Government are going to cut legal aid when people seek redress in the courts for ordinary purposes, including criminal actions. That reveals a scandalous set of double standards.

The paragraphs relating to the financial effects of the Bill refer to a figure of £1·5 million in respect of complaints to industrial tribunals. Those complaints are being enlarged to include challenges to terms of collective agreements, breaches of contracts of employment, sex discrimination cases, suspension disputes over maternity leave and remuneration, and employment protection in health and safety at work cases. Opposition Members support the view that we should protect people who raise health and safety issues at work, but that is a very minor part of a generally very bad Bill. Will the £1·5 million referred to in the Bill and the power in the money resolution be sufficient?

My next point relates to the savings claimed from the abolition of the wages councils which protect the lowest paid people in the country. The Minister cannot justify their abolition by claiming that it will create more jobs. When the Minister was asked a parliamentary question about that, he was unable to quantify the number of jobs that would be saved as a result of the abolition of wages councils.

The Government claim that they will save £2·8 million. Is that figure accurate? If it is accurate, the Government do not need the money resolution. The Minister has replied to questions about the costs of the wages councils and the Government claim that their abolition will save £2·8 million. However, there were only 55 wages inspectors in post on 2 November—down nearly 20 on the correct number. Is the Government's calculation of the savings based on the wages councils in full operation or on actual expenditure?

The Minister has also said that one third of wages council employees are paid at, or just above, minimum rates, so they receive relatively low pay. As there were only 55 wages inspectors, and presumably only a small support staff, does that add up to £2·8 million? If it does, the Minister must explain how he reaches that figure. If the figures add up to £2·8 million, the Government do not need the money resolution.

There was a shabby parade of Tory Members through the Lobby to attack the lowest paid by abolishing the wages councils when most of those Tory Members are moonlighting and have six, eight or 10 other jobs which pay more than their parliamentary salaries. That is an absolute and utter disgrace.

Mr. John Hutton (Barrow and Furness): I wish to raise two points in relation to the money resolution. Both relate to legal aid.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has already referred to legal aid, but Ministers have not referred to the availability of legal aid to cover the new extended jurisdiction of the industrial tribunals. I am sure that I do not have to remind the Secretary of State and her ministerial colleagues that legal aid attaches to breach of contract actions brought in the county courts and in the High Court.

The Government propose today to extend the jurisdiction of industrial tribunals to include those breach of contract actions, and I fully support that. It makes much sense for the industrial tribunals to have that new jurisdiction, but will the £1·5 million referred to in the Bill cover the provision of legal aid in breach of contract actions which will now be brought before industrial tribunals? That is a very important point.

If the Government are saying that legal aid will not apply to new breach of contract actions brought before the industrial tribunals, we are witnessing yet another cut in the legal aid budget, which is under severe pressure. We know that the Lord Chancellor is trying to reduce the volume of legal aid. If legal aid will not apply, members of the public and of the House will be interested to hear what the Government's true intentions are. That is an important issue. Legal aid should be available for such actions. It is available in the county court and the High Court, and it should be available once such actions are brought before industrial tribunals.

Secondly, the Government propose to spend at least £300,000 of taxpayers' money to support the activities of the so-called commissioner for protection against unlawful industrial action. My view, and that of many of my hon. Friends, is that the commissioner is for the provision of vexatious litigation. Given the financial circumstances facing the Government—excessive borrowing, the public sector borrowing requirement, and so on—and the financial constraints on the legal aid budget, I wonder whether it is appropriate for them to propose to spend money which could be better spent on legal aid elsewhere, such as on civil legal aid, which is under severe pressure, on promoting silly claims which will cost taxpayers money that they can ill afford to lose.

I hope that the Minister will be able to respond, especially to my questions about legal aid and breach of contract actions, which is an important issue of practice and principle. I know that many people who are concerned with that field will be interested in his response.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): I join my hon. Friends to question some of the financial estimates that the Government have produced in relation to the Bill.

The part of the Bill which has been least discussed today is the provision on the careers service. In the section entitled, "Financial effects of the Bill", it states:

> "There will be no overall change in the forecast level of central government expenditure funding for careers services by reason of the new arrangements which may be established by virtue of clause 33. In fully implementing the legislation, a small increase in resources (£0·6 million) will be required by the Department of Employment and the Scottish and Welsh Offices."

I do not think that we should be confused about the new arrangements for the careers service. When one reads the Bill, it is clear that we are talking about privatisation.

This seems to be the night for hon. Members to declare their interests, so I shall declare mine. Before I came to this place, I worked as a trade unionist in the public services and the public sector. Sadly, I endured a range of privatisation experiments and I have yet to come across one which has not cost the Exchequer far more than it has saved, whether in monitoring arrangements put out to contract, or in wholesale privatisation. Nothing said by Ministers tonight dissuades me from the belief that the privatisation of the careers service, as envisaged by the Government in the Bill, will cost the Exchequer more than the £0·6 million estimated.

The provisions relating to the rights of pregnant women at work seem to have been welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, but the Government's financial estimate of their cost seems to have gone astray. We know that when the issue was discussed in Brussels, the British Government moved heaven and earth to water down the directive. Having succeeded in doing so, they could not even bring themselves to vote for it in the Council of Ministers. They went all the way to Brussels just to abstain. As we are discussing money, I wonder whether it was worth the air fare to go to Brussels to abstain on a directive that they had watered down more than it needed to be.

That directive was passed and, as a result, women in Britain and elsewhere will be entitled to paid maternity leave, irrespective of service. Or will they? This is where the financial implications come in. They will probably not be, because the proposed abolition of wages councils will inevitably take many women employees below the lower earnings limit of £54. More than 20 per cent. of working women—76,600 women—already receive pay of less than that figure. The abolition of wages councils will inevitably increase that figure, and the result of that will either be to reduce income to the Exchequer or mean more women turning to the social security system to make up their income. That, in turn, begins to undermine the estimated £2·8 million saving from abolishing wages councils.

Although working women will suffer in the main, many others will be affected. In my region of the midlands, it is estimated that about 270,000 employees will be affected by the abolition of wages councils. That represents about one in every 10 households. In other words, the crazy part of what the Government propose is that by attacking the pay of the already low paid, the recession will be prolonged and income to the Exchequer will be reduced. A pay cut of just 20p per hour in wages council industries means £10 million per week being removed from the purchasing power of the low paid, and——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The hon. Member is getting wide of the subject. Indeed, he is making a Second Reading speech. He must speak to the money resolution.

Mr. Burden: I apologise for digressing, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

In their estimates of the cost of the Bill, the Government have been highly selective in what they have chosen to include and exclude. We were told last week, when discussing the Department of Social Security's budget, that benefits would be index linked. I question the willingness of the Government to do that if, as a result of the effects of this measure, with the abolition of wages councils, the income——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member really must address his remarks to the money resolution.

Mr. Burden: My remarks are linked to the resolution, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because the provision to which I referred at the outset deals specifically with the consequential effects of the Bill on the budgets of other Departments. That is the point that I was about to make.

I shall not delay the House any longer, however, save to say that when the balance sheet is finally worked out it will show that the Bill has cost the Government money and has cost the low paid both money and rights. When, in due course, my hon. Friends and I show that to have happened, I hope that Conservative Members will have the honesty and dignity to accept that we were right and that they were wrong.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, for Employment (Mr. Patrick McLoughlin): We have had an interesting debate on the money resolution, although it was perhaps somewhat unusual bearing in mind the way in which the hon. Member for Bradford, North chose to attack my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman), saying that somehow——

Mr. Cryer: The Minister might get my constituency right.

Mr. McLoughlin: The hon. Gentleman has represented nearly everywhere, so from the point of getting his constituency right——

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Do you agree that it is important for hon. Members to get the names of constituencies right, thus enabling the Official Report to identify the Members in question? The fact that the Minister is here so rarely does not excuse him from giving the correct constituencies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. While that is not a point of order for the Chair, it is helpful if hon. Members get the names of constituencies right.

Mr. McLoughlin: That is a very wise ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will appreciate that we have a problem in that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has represented many constituencies both here and in the European Parliament. To say that Members of Parliament should not moonlight when for two years the hon. Gentleman was doing two jobs——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am at a loss to understand what that has to do with the money resolution.

Mr. McLoughlin: I am, of course, guided by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I was making the point made by the hon. Member for Bradford, South in attacking my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster.

The resolution provides authority for the provision, out of money provided by Parliament, of any public expenditure that may arise as a result of clause 33, which deals with the provisions for the careers service, clause 19, which makes provision for the new commissioner for protection against unlawful industrial action, and to grant assistance to individuals contemplating or taking proceedings against trade unions under the new right established by that clause, and for any additional public expenditure which may arise as a result of the other clauses in the Bill. That includes the expenditure arising from clause 8, which provides new investigatory powers for the certification officer and for the various clauses in parts I and II of the Bill which will extend and create new grounds for complaints to industrial tribunals.

It may be helpful if I explain that clause 33 of the Bill provides for the management of the careers service to be opened up so that it can be run in a variety of ways and be more responsive to the demands of local economic and education communities. It achieves that by placing a duty on the relevant Secretaries of State to ensure that careers advice is provided throughout Great Britain. That would be a tremendous advance for the careers service and not a diminution of it, as Opposition Members suggest. It is not our intention to diminish the careers service. Our intention is to secure more widespread availability of careers advice to the public in general.

The new provisions which may be established as a result of clause 33 will not lead to any overall change in the forecast level of central Government funding of the careers service. However, a small increase in resources—an estimated £600,000—is needed to cover the administration costs of my Department and the Scottish and Welsh Offices in implementing the legislation.

Clause 19 will enable an individual citizen deprived of goods and services because of unlawful organisation of industrial action to go to court to stop that happening. The citizen will also be able to apply for material assistance for the court proceedings. There will also be a new independent commissioner for protection against unlawful industrial action—something which the Opposition will undoubtedly oppose, as we have seen today. We believe in increasing, not diminishing, the rights of individuals.

Several of the clauses in parts I and II of the Bill create new and enhanced individual rights, the enforcement of which will be effected by providing extended grounds for complaints to industrial tribunals. Following any such application to an industrial tribunal, the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service will offer its conciliation services to both parties. The principal additional costs which will arise from those proposals will be those of the industrial tribunals in dealing with complaints under the new rights, and the corresponding increase in the workload of ACAS.

It is believed that, overall, the Bill will bring savings, as several hon. Members on both sides of the House have said. I commend the resolution to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) any expenditure of the Secretary of State in securing the provision of careers services,

(b) any sum payable by the Secretary of State to or in respect of the Commissioner for Protection Against Unlawful Industrial Action, and

(c) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act.

Ways and Means

CAR TAX

Motion made, and Question proposed,

Car tax (abolition)

That the following provisions shall have effect—

Abolition: the basic rule

1. In section 1 of the Car Tax Act 1983 (charge to tax) the following subsection shall be inserted after subsection (2)—

> "(2A) Where (apart from this subsection) car tax on a vehicle would become due on or after 13th November 1992, it shall not become due and shall be deemed never to have been charged."

Consequential amendments

2.—(1) The Car Tax Act 1983 shall also be amended as follows.

(2) In section 4 (registration of makers and importers) the following subsection shall be inserted after subsection (1)—

> "(1A) Subsection (1) above—
> (a) shall not make a person liable to be registered by reference to anything done in a calendar year falling after 1992;
> (b) shall not make a person liable to be registered by reference to vehicles made or imported in 1992, unless he makes or imports not less than ten chargeable vehicles before 13th November 1992."

(3) In that section the following subsection shall be inserted after subsection (3)—

> "(3A) Without prejudice to subsection (3) above, the Commissioners shall cancel the registration of any person when they are satisfied that all tax due from him has been accounted for."

(4) In section 6 (converted and adapted vehicles) the following subsections shall be inserted after subsection (6)—

> "(7) No direction may be given under subsection (4) above on or after 13th November 1992 except in relation to vehicles whose conversion or adaptation was completed before that date.
> (8) Where a person is registered in pursuance of subsection (5) above, the Commissioners shall cancel his registration when they are satisfied that all tax due from him has been accounted for."

(5) In Schedule 1 (administration and collection) in paragraph 5 (records, accounts and returns) the following sub-paragraph shall be inserted after sub-paragraph (1)—

> "(1A) The duties under sub-paragraph (1) above, except so far as arising by virtue of section 27(3) of the Finance Act 1989 (certificates), shall be limited as follows—
> (a) the duty under paragraph (a) shall apply only to records and accounts relating to tax which has become due and vehicles on which tax has become due;
> (b) the duty under paragraph (b) shall apply only to records and accounts relating to vehicles on which tax has become due;
> (c) the duty under paragraph (c), so far as relating to returns of vehicles, shall apply only to returns of vehicles on which tax has become due."

(6) In paragraph 5(2) of that Schedule after "tax" there shall be inserted "due".

(7) In paragraph 6 of that Schedule (information) the following sub-paragraphs shall be inserted after sub-paragraph (2)—

> "(3) The duties under sub-paragraph (1) above shall apply only to information and documents relating to vehicles on which tax has become due.
> (4) Sub-paragraph (2) above shall not apply where the conversion is completed on or after 13th November 1992."

(8) In paragraph 7 of that Schedule (entry and search) the following sub-paragraph shall be inserted after sub-paragraph (2)—

> "(2A) The powers under sub-paragraphs (1) and (2) above shall be exercisable only for the purpose of ascertaining whether tax is due and, if so, the amount of the tax."

(9) In paragraph 8(3)(b) of that Schedule (offences) after "tax" there shall be inserted "payable".

(10) In paragraph 12 of that Scheudle (regulations) the following shall be inserted at the end—

> "Any duty imposed by regulations under paragraph (c) or (d) above shall apply only where the vehicles are vehicles on which tax has become due."

(11) Paragraph 13 of that Schedule (protection of car tax through vehicles excise system) shall be omitted.

Special cases

3. The Car Tax Act 1983 shall also be amended by inserting the following section after section 7—

> "Abolition: special cases
> 7A.—(1) This section applies where (apart from this section) car tax on a vehicle would have become due before 13th November 1992.
> (2) In a case where—
> (a) the tax would have become due at a time mentioned in section 5(2)(b) above, and
> (b) the conditions mentioned in subsection (3) below are satisfied,
> the tax shall be deemed not to have become due and never to have been charged.
> (3) The conditions referred to in subsection (2) above are that—
> (a) the tax would have become due because an offer to sell the vehicle was made by the person to whom it was delivered as mentioned in section 5(2)(b) above and was accepted, or because an offer to purchase the vehicle was made to that person and was accepted,
> (b) at the end of 12th November 1992 no sales invoice had been issued in respect of the vehicle by that person,
> (c) at the end of that day that person had not received the full purchase price of the vehicle, and
> (d) at the end of that day the purchaser had not taken delivery of the vehicle.
> (4) Where the tax would have become due at the time mentioned in paragraph (c) of section 5(2) above but at the end of 12th November 1992 the vehicle—
>
> (a) was still in the possession of the person to whom it was sent from the premises mentioned in that paragraph, and
> (b) had not been sold by that person or appropriated to his own use,
> the tax shall be deemed not to have become due and never to have been charged.
> (5) In a case where—
> (a) subsection (4) of section 5 above would have applied in relation to the tax or (as the case may be) the tax would have become due at the time mentioned in subsection (6) of that section, and
> (b) the conditions mentioned in subsection (6) below are satisfied,
> the tax shall be deemed not to have become due and never to have been charged.
> (6) The conditions referred to in subsection (5) above are that—
> (a) the vehicle was made or imported by an unregistered person for the purposes of a business carried on by him,
> (b) at the end of 12th November 1992 the vehicle was still in the possession of the unregistered person or was in the possession of a motor dealer who obtained it directly from him, and
> (c) at the end of that day the vehicle had not been sold by, or appropriated to the use of, the unregistered person or the dealer;
>
> and in this subsection 'unregistered person' means a person not registered under this Act."

Cancellation of prospective amendments

4. In the Finance (No. 2) Act 1992, section 18, Schedule 4 and Part VI of Schedule 18 (which make prospective amendments of the Car Tax Act 1983) shall be deemed never to have been enacted.

Commencement

5. This Resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on 13th November 1992.

Provisional statutory effect

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.—[Sir John Cope.]

10.48 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): As this is a ways and means resolution, will the Minister say whether the ways and means are to be found by increasing motoring taxes in next year's Budget? There has been much suggestion in the press that the abolition of car tax, which may prove helpful to some car manufacturers and retailers, will be clawed back by an increase in motoring taxes. Those stories were not denied, or may have been fairly official, although at this stage the Treasury does not specify what it might do.

Clearly, by choosing that instrument, the Government have forgone the opportunity to use car tax as an environmental policy instrument by putting a higher rate of car tax on heavy fuel-using vehicles and none on low fuel-using vehicles. It would be useful to know whether, having chosen that instrument, they are saying that there will ultimately be no net cost, or only the cost arising between now and next April, because they intend to claw back the whole lot through an increase in motoring tax later.

10.50 pm

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): When my right hon. Friend the Minister concludes the case for the ways and means resolution, will he reflect on the need very quickly to bring the company car tax consultation document to the House and to finalise it before too long? That is part of the excise duty argument. Will he do it as quickly as he can, please?

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): First, I welcome the motion and the Government's partial conversion to a point of view which the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders, trade unions in the industry and Members of Parliament representing car manufacturing constituencies have been advocating for some time.

I hope that I can claim some credit for the fact that the tax is being abolished. I called on the Government to act on it, both in questions to the Leader of the House on 19 July last year and in an Adjournment debate four days later. On 12 November last year, I asked the Prime Minister in Prime Minister's questions to back the British car industry by reducing the absurdly high levels of sales tax on new cars, then running at 27·3 per cent.

Abolition will also get rid of the anomaly of double taxation, which is always resented, whereby value added tax has been levied on the car tax. Its abolition is all the more welcome for that.

As with some of the other measures in the autumn statement, the complaint from Labour Members is not that some of our proposals are being purloined by the Government—the more they do what Labour says, the happier we shall be and the better off Britain will be—but that they have taken too long to acknowledge that we were right, they are half-hearted about it and they are not adopting our whole programme for recovery, which is what the economy really needs.

So it is with the car industry. Although we welcome the measure and the extra car sales to which it will give rise, no one can claim that it will in itself be sufficient to produce the scale of recovery that motor manufacturing desperately needs. Indeed, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) has pointed out to me, if second-hand car dealers cut their trade-in prices because of the knock-on effect of cheaper new cars, as they might, there will not be the £400 stimulus per car which the autumn statement assumes.

Two other important points need to be made on this resolution: first, the sheer scale of the lack of consumer confidence, which has been locking the industry into recession; and secondly, the likely impact of the additional taxation on motorists, which the Chancellor warned that he is to impose in next year's Budget.

As the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders said to me in a letter on the abolition of the special car tax;

> "Consumer confidence remains very shaky due to high levels of unemployment and personal debt; fear of unemployment; and negative equity in the housing market. It must be remembered that whilst a reduction in interest rates is welcome, car dealers have been offering interest-free finance on many models, and reductions in interest rates matter only in that they add to individuals' personal sense of well-being, rather than enabling them to buy cars at a cheaper price."

Mr. Mills: Did not that communication also mention the increased number of cars that would be sold—60,000 in 1992-93?

Mr. Smith: Indeed—I am coming to that. The forecast was for 60,000 in the current year and for 70,000 when the full year's effect of total abolition is taken on board.

But that must be set in the context of the sheer depth of the recession in the demand for cars. Compared with new registrations, which reached well over 2 million a year between 1987 and 1990, there were just 1·59 million last year, and the latest projection for this year is, at best, 1·56 million. So, even if the abolition of car tax were to result in an increase in sales by as much as 70,000, sales would still be some 670,000, or 29 per cent., below their 1989 level. That is a measure of the depth of the recession into which the Government's incompetence has plunged us. It also shows us how puny the measures contained in the autumn statement are by comparison.

Mr. Roy Thomason (Bromsgrove): Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that car sales increased by more than 25 per cent. in the year up to this October, and that exports are up by well over a third, so the car industry is achieving much more than it did 12 months ago? Will he not acknowledge those facts?

Mr. Smith: I very much welcome the improvement in car production and sales to which the hon. Gentleman referred, but set against the scale of the overall depression in demand for cars, and compared with the levels of sales and production in the late 1980s, the figures provide scant comfort for those who work in the industry. I commend the truly heroic performance of the car industry and its work force in terms of the quality and competitiveness of new models, and the impressive productivity gains.

Nothing could more clearly demonstrate the fact that, helpful as the measure to abolish car tax is, above all the industry needs a massive boost to consumer confidence. That will not be created as long as unemployment is set to continue rising, as the Chancellor concedes that it will. It will not happen while people are fearful for their jobs and worried about their accumulated debt.

It will not happen for the 5 million workers in the public sector who now face the Government's 1·5 per cent. incomes policy. They will not rush out to buy new cars, and neither will the 2·5 million workers covered by the wages councils that the Government have tonight so disgracefully resolved to abolish. All those factors will leave the domestic production of cars struggling to sustain the small 1·8 per cent. increase on last year that it is presently registering.

The hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Thomason) mentioned exports. Welcome as any increase in sales is —exports are critical to the industry—the measure will not of itself help exports. It would be wrong for the Government to place too much reliance on devaluation as a means of boosting sales and output. As the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders said in its briefing on 9 November, after devaluation:

> "Despite impressive production figures in the face of the recession there are signs of growing difficulties in export markets, especially within the European Community. If this trend continues motor companies have warned that production schedules could be revised."

In its summary of the main issues that the motor industry is pressing on Government, the society states:

> "Inflation is still feared, the pound is regarded as unstable at its present level (which is much too low—the industry was competitive at DM2·90 to the pound) and there is great concern lest the industry again be subjected to taxation to help the government fund the PSBR. A two-speed Europe would speedily negate the purpose of the foreign investment so that new capacity would replace rather than add to existing capacity."

The lesson to be drawn from that is that it would benefit the car industry far more were the Government to get their act together on Europe and use the wasted British presidency to place at the top of the agenda for the Edinburgh summit the concerted European programme for economic recovery for which Labour has called.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): Will my hon. Friend join me in applauding the efforts of the socialist group in the European Parliament, particularly the work done by Carole Tongue MEP, in producing a report for precisely the sort of European strategy for the motor industry that my hon. Friend mentioned? Does my hon. Friend agree that, rather than adopting the sort of hands-off approach presently adopted by the Government, it would be better if they joined in the sort of initiatives taking place in Europe to ensure that the car industry has a stable and secure future? That applies not only to the big manufacturers, but to the many hundreds of car component firms in the midlands and elsewhere that need such a strategy.

Mr. Smith: I join my hon. Friend in commending our colleagues in Europe who, like us, have been pressing for this concerted programme for recovery. The car industry is a pan-European industry, so what happens in Europe is crucial to the prospects for exports and for the sale of British cars. However much importance the Government attach to measures to stimulate the economy, they are bound to run into balance of payments difficulties if the expansion does not also take place in other member states of the Community. We need to expand together. That is why the Government must put at the top of the agenda for the Edinburgh summit measures for recovery, to lift the fear of unemployment and jointly to stimulate investment. I understand that the President of the Commission wanted the Prime Minister to put those items on the Birmingham summit agenda, but the latter refused to do so.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): Given all that he has said about the need for Europewide expansion, why did the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues go through the Lobbies en masse against Maastricht?

Mr. Smith: Because——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. Both hon. Members have now gone very wide of the ways and means resolution.

Mr. Smith: We were registering a vote of no confidence in the Government, as Conservative Members know full well.

I must heed your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and return to the subject of the debate. The House needs to know from the Government exactly why and how they propose to recoup from motorists the £750 million which it is estimated the abolition of the special car tax will cost. In the autumn statement, the Chancellor said:

> "any action in this area will have to be paid for in my next Budget by higher motoring taxes after 1992-93."—[Official Report, 12 November 1992; Vol. 213, c. 998.]

I trust that the Paymaster General will tell us why this money is being clawed back from motorists. A great part of the case against the special car tax was that it was unfair to have a levy that was not similarly levied on other goods. If the Government accept that logic, how do they justify proposing to clobber car purchasers again to compensate for the removal of the tax? Will that not amount to a transfer of the tax burden from purchasers of new cars to motorists in general? So motorists who cannot afford to buy a new car will have to pay the tax instead of those who can afford to.

Why, on Government figures, is there a possibility that total taxation on motorists will rise? Is the £750 million which appears to be the gross cost of abolishing the tax the actual amount that the Government intend to claw back? If so, why do not they make allowance for the extra VAT which will be generated by the increased sales of new cars arising from the abolition of the special car tax? If the full-year effect of the abolition increased new car sales, including imports, by 70,000, at an average price of £10,000, the additional VAT revenues generated would amount to about £122 million; so even if the cost of abolition is to be recouped in the way the Chancellor proposes, should not the amount be £628 million, not £750 million?

What is more, even if this amount is clawed back, is it not wrong to refer to it as some new fiscal stimulus— except for the few remaining months of this financial year? Typically, the Chancellor claimed a great many benefits for his autumn statement, but on examination those benefits fade away even more quickly than his hallucinogenic green shoots of the pre-election spring.

We welcome the measure abolishing the special car tax, which was a Tory tax in the first place, but we want answers to the questions that I have posed, and we warn that this measure will not be enough to provide the uplift in confidence that the car industry and the wider economy so desperately need. A full programme for economic recovery is needed for that—and that, sadly, is not on offer from the Government.

11.5 pm

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): Briefly, and in contrast to the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), with his sour and rather grudging welcome, I want to say how much the measure has been welcomed in my constituency where both Honda and Rover manufacture cars. They consider that this has been a real boost to their work and see it as a sign of hope for the future.

The workers in those two plants will have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman said about confidence. They believe that the measure gives them a real hope that they will see their industry come out of recession. All they will have heard tonight from the hon. Gentleman, speaking for the Labour party, is the usual talking down of their industry, confidence and hope.

I welcome the measure, and I hope that the House will also welcome it.

11.6 pm

The Paymaster General (Sir John Cope): The hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) welcomed the measure, admittedly in what my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) called a grudging way, and he was right to do so. He had no alternative but to do so, because the measure had been widely welcomed by not only the motor manufacturers, to whom the hon. Member for Oxford, East referred, but also by the retail trade and many other people. It is not surprising because it is a welcome measure.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the car tax as a Conservative tax in the first place. In fact, it carried into VAT in 1973 the extra rate of purchase tax that there was and had been for a long time under the previous Labour Government. The car tax continued throughout the subsequent Labour Government, and it has fallen to a Conservative Government to abolish it in this year's autumn statement, after having halved it in the Budget earlier this year.

The hon. Gentleman also claimed credit for the abolition of the tax by saying that he thought of the idea first. As you well know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, having been here for some time, when a tax is reduced or abolished, nearly everyone claims credit for it, but no one ever does when it is the other way round.

I shall not follow the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the autumn statement—apart from anything else, we are about to have two days of debate on that—but it is undoubtedly the fact that this measure, taken together with the other measures in the autumn statement, will boost confidence and help to assist the welcome improvement in domestic car sales and car sales generally.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of exports, which do not arise under the resolution, and drew attention to the difficulties in other markets, which is another way of saying that other countries have problems of recession as well as us. But I noted what he said about a two-speed Europe and it came oddly from one who voted against Maastricht the other day along with most of his hon. Friends—all his hon. Friends.

Attention has been drawn to what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in the course of his autumn statement—that any action taken in this area will be paid for in the next Budget by higher motoring taxes. That, in a sense, is the answer to the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). That was made clear by the Chancellor in the autumn statement, and I can confirm it.

I can also confirm that the hon. Member for Oxford, East is right to say that the £750 million is the gross cost next year—that is to say, car tax plus VAT. What I cannot do, and have no intention of doing, is anticipate next year's Budget statement and the way in which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will approach this aspect of it. It would clearly be wrong for me to do that.

Mr. Burden: I do not wish to press the Paymaster General too hard about what his right hon. Friend may say next year, but will he give some preliminary responses on taxation levels and the method of taxing company cars? The Government have claimed considerable credit for what they describe as taxation of perks in that connection. If it is possible that they will look at that next year, will they bear in mind the fact that the extent to which taxation has been levied on company cars has principally affected the possession rather than the use of such cars? As a result, a company director who has all his or her—it will probably be his—private mileage paid for will be affected disproportionately, not as greatly——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions are supposed to be brief, and they are not supposed to be speeches.

Sir John Cope: I was about to intervene on the hon. Member myself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I suppose that you were right to dissuade me.

Company car tax has nothing to do with the motion, but my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) mentioned it as well, and I will pass on what has been said to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. We are in the process of considering company car tax, and we shall continue to consider it between now and the next Budget.

Mr. Beith: Is the Paymaster General saying—or does the Chancellor intend to imply—that the Budget announcement in April, projecting a tax forward into the forthcoming year, will feature a tax sufficient to recoup all the costs in the current financial year, together with those in the next financial year following the abolition of car tax?

Sir John Cope: I have no wish to add anything to what my right hon. Friend said in the autumn statement, and I do not think that, on reflection, the hon. Gentlemen would expect me to.

Mr. Andrew Smith: I must push the Paymaster General on that point. The Chancellor has said that he intends to recoup the cost from increases in motoring taxation next year. May I repeat the point that I put to him earlier? Does he not accept that the VAT on extra sales will bring in some £122 million, and would it not be right to take that off the extra cost? Otherwise, will there not be additional overall motoring taxation?

Sir John Cope: I heard what the hon. Gentleman said the first time, including his speculation about VAT yield.

[Sir John Cope]

Yes, he may push me if he wishes, but I will not add to what I have already said, and I do not think that he would really expect me to do so.

The motion introduces the abolition of car tax, and, of course, primary legislation will put that into effect. The move has been widely welcomed in the car industry—both the retail and manufacturing sectors—and even more widely than that. Moreover, it has been welcomed in the House this evening, and I commend it.

Question put and agreed to.

Ordered,

That a Bill be brought in upon the foregoing resolution: And that the Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Clarke, Mr. Secretary Heseltine, Mr. Secretary MacGregor, Mr. Secretary Hunt, Mr. Secretary Lang, Mr. Secretary Lilley, Mr. Michael Portillo, Mr. Stephen Dorrell, Sir John Cope and Mr. Anthony Nelson do prepare and bring it in.

CAR TAX ABOLITION BILL

Sir John Cope accordingly presented a Bill to abolish Car Tax: And the same was read the First time, and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow; and to be printed. [Bill 87.]

PETITION

Samuel Merry

11.15 pm

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): The background to this petition was the brutal killing of Samuel Merry, a constituent in Ayr, earlier this year. The sentences passed on his killers were widely perceived to be inexplicably lenient. Immediately thereafter, some 3,000 or 4,000 people in Ayr signed a petition prepared by the family, but its format was not acceptable to the House. Accepting that, a new petition was prepared and signed by 100 neighbours and relatives of the late Samuel Merry. Tonight, I present that petition, which states:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the honourable House will introduce legislation at the earliest possible date to provide the Prosecution in Scotland with the right of appeal against sentences. And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

I beg leave to present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Social Fund

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

11.15 pm

Mr. Jamie Cann (Ipswich): I think that I can safely say that this debate is not being televised. Given the number of Members present, I thought of cutting short my speech but as the Minister is present and cannot go until I have finished I have decided not to do so.

I was elected in April, so I bring fresh eyes to the social fund; they do not look very fresh at this time of night, no doubt, but in parliamentary matters they are. I did not know about the social fund until I was elected, and I have had to learn much since. The question that I want to pose is, does it achieve what the Government set out to achieve when they established it?

The social fund, as hon. Members will be aware, if we are still in the plural, covers by regulation a number of areas that I do not wish to consider tonight. I wish to consider two discretionary areas—budgetary loans and community care grants.

The aim of the social fund is to provide for exceptional and unexpected calls on household budgets that cannot be dealt with through the normal use of income support. It was stated that the Government wished the administration of the grant and loan to be more flexible and responsive to individual need, and with a minimum of formality. The question is whether it is more flexible and responsive, whether it offers the minimum formality and whether it copes with the exceptional and unexpected. I should like to share with the House three cases that have arisen in my constituency in the past few months that cast some doubt on that.

The first is a case of a budgetary loan. I shall call the person concerned Paul. In all three cases, I shall use an assumed name. If the Minister wants the proper names, I shall give them to him afterwards. Paul has a wife and five children. His total income from invalidity benefit is £136 a week, and after fixed costs the family of seven is left with £65 a week to cover food, toiletries, household expenditure, bus fares and so on. Paul and his wife asked for a loan of £200 to purchase shoes for their five children ready for the new school term. The response that he received was that > "The Social Fund Officer has decided after considering your application and your personal circumstances that your needs do not have enough priority and we cannot pay you the money you asked for. There is a limited amount of money in the Social Fund available for loans and grants and the Social Fund Officer has to decide when looking at individual applications which of them have the most priority."

If children's shoes do not have sufficient priority it appears to me that not enough money has been put into the system.

At least Paul thought that he could afford to repay a loan. Those who cannot are utterly dependent on a community care grant. I will read out the criteria for determining whether someone can have such a grant. It > "may be awarded to promote Community Care . . . by assisting an applicant with expenses . . . where such assistance will

> (i) help that person or a member of his family to re-establish himself in the community following a stay in institutional or residential care; or
> (ii) help that person, or a member of his family to remain in the community rather than enter institutional or residential care; or
> (iii) ease exceptional pressure on that person and his family; or
> (iv) allow the applicant or his family to care for a prisoner or young offender on home leave; ".

That is admirably flexible, until we come to the case of Ray.

Ray is single. He got into trouble and was put in gaol. He has been out of gaol now for just over a year. He has gone straight. He is on income support but he has debts. The income that he can spend each week is £30. All the agencies have tried to help Ray—the probation service, the housing service, the social services together have helped to keep him straight. They got him a furnished bed-sitter and when it was found that there were a considerable number of undesirable people with him there—not his fault—they got him a flat. But he has not got a bed, a cooker, a fridge, a chair or pots and pans. He has walls, a roof and a floor.

Ray, on £30 a week, cannot repay a budgetary loan, so he applied for a community care grant. What happened? He thought that he would be all right under section (i), but the social fund officer said:

> "I acknowledge that 'Ray' has had to leave accommodation that was unsuitable to his needs. He has however been living within the community for some twelve months prior to his application for a grant. There is no evidence . . . that he has not re-established himself during this time."

So, no job, no bed, no furniture, no real income, but it is not, apparently, to be assumed that he has not re-established himself successfully in the community. I would say that he has not.

Ray has said

> "that he is likely to have to return to care if a CCG is refused"— this is the second category.

> "I can see there to be no tangible prospect of such an event occurring. . . . It may be that he will have to give his flat up and seek alternative accommodation if he does not get the grant. He is not at risk, however, of having to go into some form of care."

So he was ruled out on that as well.

What about the stress element—section iii? Ray

> "is single and without family ties. The situation that he finds himself in has and is no doubt causing him pressure."

Well, it would, would it not?

> "An award of a CCG would, however, only assist him. It would not help anyone else."

But the regulations say "the person and his family", so as it would not help anyone else, it would help only Ray, the tests set out in section iii are not met. So Ray does not get his grant.

That is how a supposedly flexible system has inflexibly damaged that young man. I do not believe that that is right and I am sure that the vast majority of people in this country do not believe that it is right.

Bill is another young man, who lives with his mother and his step-sister, who has a baby and another on the way. He is on income support. He has debts and cannot afford a loan. He wanted some money to buy a suit so that he could go for job interviews, because he has qualifications but he just does not happen to have any money. His application was refused. He said that he needed the suit because getting a job would mean that he could put more money into the family and could relieve the stress on the family. That argument was not accepted. The social security officials said that the only stress that would be relieved would be his stress, so the tests had not been met.

A young man cannot get a job because he cannot get a grant. A young man cannot sit at home although he is trying to go straight because he cannot get a grant. Yet the system is supposed to be flexible and adaptable to people's needs. It is not flexible or responsive. It is certainly not informal; it is bureaucratic. People cannot afford the loans and they cannot get grants. The system is more about budgets than it is about need, as I realise from the people who come to see me.

The system is hated by the people who are supposed to be able to depend on it in their hour of need and it is even hated by the people who have to run it. The system and the funding should be urgently reviewed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Alistair Burt): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Cann) on obtaining this Adjournment debate. I have listened carefully to what he said. Despite his apparently coming here with little knowledge of the social fund—I cannot believe that an experienced council leader in Ipswich has no knowledge of the social fund—he was able to outline not only his cases, but his general feelings about the social fund extremely well.

I shall deal with some of the hon. Gentleman's specific points. He will appreciate that I cannot discuss individual cases, although I am more than willing to receive from him details of the cases that he mentioned. It was kind of him to outline the circumstances without using the real names, and I appreciate that. If he wants to bring particular circumstances to my attention, I shall be more than happy to receive a note from him.

I hope, therefore, that I can provide some useful points in reply. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, we undertake close monitoring of the social fund. From that, there is clear evidence that, despite the cases that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, the fund is providing extensive help for those who need it.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about budgets. The total cumulative expenditure on the social fund, including the regulated maternity, funeral and cold weather payments, now exceeds £1 billion. Since the start of the scheme, more than 1 million non-repayable community care grants and more than 5 million interest-free loans have been awarded.

We were pleased to note that a Policy Studies Institute report published earlier this year showed that social fund loans were a helpful source of interest-free credit for people on the lowest incomes.

By April 1994, the level of planned gross expenditure on the discretionary part of the scheme will have increased by 105 per cent. since the introduction of the scheme—greater than both inflation or any temporary increase in the number of people on income support. It should also be remembered that the social fund is just one part of the overall social security system which next year will cost almost £80 billion, equating to more than £11 per day for each tax and national insurance payer.

I recognise that the hon. Gentleman was concerned about expenditure and budgets, and I have even better news for him. I am sure that he will have welcomed the announcement on 2 November by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security of an £8 million increase to the 1992-93 budget. That means that this year's discretionary social fund budget, which is now at £310 million, has already increased by 36 per cent. since April 1991. That increase far outstrips the 5 per cent. increase in income support case load between May 1991 and May 1992.

There is even better news for social fund budgets for 1993-94. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced in his uprating statement, he expects the gross discretionary budget from April 1993 to be £340 million. That further substantial increase is possible, first, because of the continuing excellent performance on the recovery of loans, which shows the success of the loans system which enables more people to be helped by the fund; and, secondly, because of an increase of £5 million in the net budget. The cash limit has been increased from £130 million to £135 million from April 1993. Those increases mean that the April 1993 gross budget will be 12 per cent. up on the gross budget at April 1992 and 50 per cent. up on the gross budget at April 1991.

I am sure that even the hon. Member for Ipswich will agree that that increase in the cash limit, which comes at such a difficult time, indicates the Government's continuing determination to help those most in need through the social fund.

There is also good news for the hon. Gentleman closer to home, in Suffolk. It is absolutely clear that the hon. Gentleman's constituents have benefited from the increases in social fund budgets to which I have referred. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have welcomed the large increase of 18 per cent. in the social fund loans budget for Suffolk for 1992-93 as a consequence of the statement of 2 November to which I have referred. That increase is significantly above the increase in the income support case load for the same period. More significantly, if the hon. Gentleman looks at the overall increases in allocations for the past two years up to today, he will find that the grants budget in Suffolk district has increased by some 82 per cent. since April 1991, and the loans budget by some 75 per cent. in the same period.

Those figures speak eloquently of the Government's commitment to the social fund, and of the benefits that it has brought to the hon. Gentleman's constituency. The hon. Gentleman pointed out some of the difficulties; his remarks should be seen clearly in the context of the additional assistance already provided to his constituency.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Burt: Such is my affection for the hon. Gentleman that I shall, of course, give way—if the hon. Member has cleared it with the hon. Member for Ipswich, that is.

Mr. Cann indicated assent.

Mr. Dewar: I am somewhat alarmed by the thought that the Minister holds me in affection, but I shall ride my luck.

Is the Minister confident in his sunny predictions about the present situation? He will know that the Social Security Advisory Committee report and work by York university, commissioned by the Department, contain stringent criticisms of the way in which the social fund is operated, and suggest that in many cases it is impossible to define the difference between applications which succeed and those which do not. We all know of cases in which the cash-limited nature of the fund means that applicants are told that, although they qualify and have a certain measure of priority, it is just not possible to pay out and thus meet what is undoubtedly a real need. Can the Minister live happily with that state of affairs?

Mr. Burt: My affection for the hon. Gentleman is undiminished and fully justified. With a telepathy not often found on the Opposition Benches, he has touched on the very point to which I was coming next—in relation both to the reports received on the social fund and to the budget itself.

Opposition Members should be aware that a number of positive points were made in both the main reports on the social fund this year—by York university's social policy research unit and by the Social Security Advisory Committee. Perhaps I may help the Opposition by referring to some of them. The SPRU report showed that many people are being substantially helped by the fund. Moreover—this answers the final point made by the hon. Member for Ipswich, which was somewhat over the top by his standards—so far from people hating the fund, there was a high degree of satisfaction among many groups who received awards. There is also a general acceptance of loans, and certain factors—such as having a lower income or more and younger children—are associated with receiving awards. Finally, community care grants are being focused on elderly people receiving disability-related benefits where a household member has a severe health problem. We are hitting the target much more often than Opposition Members would concede.

The positive points mentioned in the Social Security Advisory Committee's report include the good work done by social fund officers in their difficult job of making discretionary decisions. The effective immediate help provided through the fund for unpredicted events—for example, help to families returning home from the Gulf in 1990—was also commented upon favourably. The independence established by the social fund commissioner was also welcomed by the Social Security Advisory Committee. The committee also went on to accept the restriction of eligibility to those with little capital receiving income support, the need for reasonable financial limits at this time of constraint on public spending and the broad criteria on which budgeting loans were offered.

The reports make other proposals as well. As I have stated, we shall look at them carefully. It is important to note, as Opposition Members rarely do, that the endorsement of many of the principles of the social fund is significant in demonstrating that the fund represents an important leap forward from previous schemes.

Mr. Dewar: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but I do not want him to get away with that rather rosy image. I accept that positive points are made in both reports, but will he agree that they both recommend fundamental changes to meet fundamental criticisms? Can I take it from his remark about the reports being carefully considered that there is some hope that their major recommendations will be dealt with favourably by the Department?

Mr. Burt: As the hon. Gentleman has been straight with me, I will be straight with him. Yes, indeed, there are positive aspects of the reports which I have been able to mention. If he is prepared to concede those, I acknowledge that other things in the reports cause us concern. They are being carefully considered. It is too early to say what the response will be, but the hon. Gentleman has it from me that the negative aspects mentioned in the reports are noted, and there will be a response in due course.

In the interests of balance, it is fair to recognise that in trying to administer a fund which caters for difficult and exceptional payments, it is hard to get the right scheme. We saw problems with the single payments scheme. This scheme has done much better than opponents would concede. The positive points that I have quoted are genuine and I am happy to acknowledge some difficulties, provided that some of the good points are recognised by the Opposition. If that happens, we shall have made progress.

In regard to budget limits, the hon. Member for Ipswich raised some concerns about the budget in itself. The budget is an integral part of the fund. The discretionary part of the social fund was designed as a flexible system for helping people, mostly those on income support, who have to meet large, intermittent or unexpected expenses. There are relatively few rigid rules as to what help can be given. We see the discipline imposed by a budget as a necessary framework for the exercise of how social fund officers apply discretion.

Most organisations—including the Government and, I suspect, also the Labour party—have to operate within an annual budget and there is no reason why the social fund should be different. Indeed, the previous rigid and inflexible single payments scheme suffered from spiralling expenditure, with the cost doubling every two years from 1980 to 1986, even allowing for inflation. This was out of all proportion to the increase in the number of people on benefit—less than a two thirds increase between 1979 and 1985. That expenditure was poorly targeted on needs, with four fifths of the money going to fewer than one in five claimants in 1987. It was therefore essential to refocus it on the greatest needs.

As to the points which the hon. Member for Ipswich made on community care grants, I appreciate that he mentioned particular cases and I look forward to receiving information about them. It would be inappropriate for me to comment on those cases. However, I am satisfied that the overall framework of the social fund provides appropriate assistance to those who need it, particularly in relation to community care grants. More than 1 million people have received community care grants since the scheme began.

The grants are intended to help people in priority groups, such as the elderly or disabled, to lead independent lives, including assisting them to re-establish themselves in the community after a stay in care, and to help people to carry on living in the community—the hon. Gentleman was right to illustrate some of the criteria—as well as aiming to ease exceptional pressure on families.

Local authorities, of course, have the major responsibility for community care, and community care grants complement that responsibility rather than replace it. It is, however, for the social fund officer to decide in an individual case whether the applicant's circumstances meet the basic eligibility criteria for a grant and then to decide whether the need is of sufficient priority to be met. I am confident that that is a suitable way in which to assess those exceptional needs in a flexible manner. There is a rapid and flexible system of review which also assists in dealing with those grants.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Ipswich will appreciate that some of the decisions taken by social fund officers in the situations that he described are taken in the most difficult circumstances. It is difficult at this distance to decide on such cases across the Dispatch Box. I am sure that, in the vast majority of cases, social fund officers apply themselves properly and carefully to the needs before the them. The fact that so many awards are made and so much money spent on the system shows that the Government and the system try to meet people's needs.

However, we are not simply content to consider the way in which the system has worked in terms of theory and principle and not consider improvement. We have made a number of operational improvements to the scheme which assist in dealing with some of the difficulties mentioned by the hon. Member for Ipswich. The operation of the fund has not stood still since the field work for the SPRU report that I mentioned earlier was completed. We are constantly considering ways in which to improve its administration and operation. In difficult budgetary conditions, one examines the administration of the benefit system to discover the most effective ways to deliver.

As we deal with people, we find that they want speed, efficiency and accuracy from the benefit system. They can be dealt with through improvements to administration. The social fund and those responsible for it have not been slow in coming forward with operational developments.

Those developments have included the continuing development of a major main frame computer system which will start to roll out early next year. That will be a major assistance to the fund. Secondly, all letters and forms used in connection with the social fund have been redesigned. That is not cosmetic: the way in which information is presented to claimants is important. Although some people claim that they find forms difficult to understand, the forms are carefully examined and researched. Those genuine and real improvements will help the constituents of the hon. Member for Ipswich.

A third development is improved guidance on local priorities. The hon. Gentleman referred to priorities. They are set and are difficult for the fund to operate. However, we are constantly looking at ways in which to improve guidance and particularly at local areas and their difficulties.

The fourth development is improved training for social fund officers. We all recognise the importance of training —no one more so than I—in the Benefits Agency. Finally there has been a recent major process review by the Benefits Agency which reviewed social fund delivery and administration.

Those improvements are only part of the changes, but they clearly show that the fund is under constant review and is continually responding to new pressures and the need to provide an even better service.

In responding to the problems that the hon. Member for Ipswich described, I hope that I have shown some of the ways in which the Benefits Agency and social fund seek to meet need. They will not always meet need as much as people want. Sometimes demand is not always equated to need. However, the determination of those who run the system and of the Government is to do their best to meet needs.

The social fund had a difficult origin in that the difficulties produced by single payments translated into the current system. It seeks to meet the needs of society flexibly. It is not always possible to create a rigid structure. No doubt there are similar cases to those mentioned by the hon. Member for Ipswich elsewhere where similar circumstances have been met by some form of payment. To try to create consistency over such a large system that has already £1 billion and approved 5 million loans has been extremely difficult. However, the search and the determination are always there.

When the Opposition consider the problems that the Government have to face, they seem to think that we are trying to be difficult to people in hard circumstances. I know that the Opposition Front Bench spokesmen are looking hard at the benefit system. I give them full credit for the way in which they are approaching their task, and they know that I do so generously. They will accept that we are not alone in Europe in studying the benefit system carefully and finding that it cannot meet all the demands that people place on it. As I said, demand is not always equated to need. Many other European countries also face difficulties in providing for one-off payments. Some make far less central provision than we do, relying more on local government provision and help from charities and voluntary organisations.

I hope that I am not being unfair, but I sometimes think that the Government do not get the credit that they deserve from Opposition Members, who find it easy to criticise and to be churlish but have no conception or understanding of running such a complex benefit system, of which the social fund is part.

In conclusion, I hope that my remarks have assured the hon. Gentleman that the Government are keeping the operation of the fund under constant monitoring, that we have already taken significant steps to increase the resources available to the fund, and that we shall continue to take any steps which we consider necessary to ensure that it continues in its role of providing assistance with exceptional needs for those experiencing the greatest difficulties.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Housing Waiting Lists

1. Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on current housing waiting lists held by local authorities in Scotland.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): Details of supplementary housing capital allocations to local authorities will be announced shortly. Those measures will be helpful in relieving pressure on waiting lists, although I have to say that housing waiting lists themselves are not always a reliable indicator of housing need.

Sir David Steel: Will the Minister acknowledge that my local authorities are not alone in reporting record waiting lists, since his own Scottish Office "Statistical Bulletin", which has just been published, shows that the number of applicants under the homeless category has increased by 133 per cent. in the past 10 years? Are those figures not an affront to the conscience of Scotland? Will the Minister recognise that last week's statement is equivalent to tinkering with the housing repair problems and that what is needed is to get the unemployed building workers cracking on a house building programme?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am delighted to be able to announce this afternoon that we are making available, this year, an additional £7·5 million to local authorities for projects to combat homelessness. Bids will be sought by 11 December and I plan to announce the distribution of those new resources before Christmas.

The right hon. Gentleman should remember that waiting lists are not the same as the homelessness application lists returned by local authorities. Households may be on the waiting list of more than one authority. Those lists include households that wish to be rehoused at some time in the future and may include households no longer seeking accommodation. However, the right hon. Gentleman's point about homelessness is well taken. We hope to have the bids for resources in from the local authorities very soon and we shall inform them about the £7·5 million allocation straight away.

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Conservative Government need no lectures about out track record on Scottish housing given that, since 1979, home ownership in Scotland has risen from a paltry 35 per cent. to 52 per cent? Does he agree also that our fellow Scots should be congratulated on that achievement and not patronised, as they are, by the Opposition parties?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes; what is more, the home ownership programme will be greatly increased through the rent-to-mortgage scheme, which we are introducing in the Housing and Urban Development Bill, which will give each tenant the right to take up that option.

Mr. McLeish: What about the homeless?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The answer lies with the £7·5 million allocation, which will help particularly with specialised bids from local authorities. When we asked in the past for such special bids, they resulted in 1,800 accommodation units for the homeless in Scotland, which was welcomed by those who worked in housing.

Dr. Godman: How much of the £7·5 million will be allocated to Inverclyde district council? In Inverclyde, homelessness, that terrible social evil, is on the increase and many other housing problems bedevil or make miserable the lives of far, far too many of my constituents. I have asked the Minister over and over again to play the game by my constituents when it comes to housing.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In the hon. Gentleman's district council and others, priority will be given to projects that aim to reduce the use of bed-and-breakfast accommodation for homeless people and help single-parent families. It goes without saying that the hon. Gentleman should ensure that all the relevant circumstances are put in the housing plan for his district authority because we shall announce provisional allocations for next year in due course.

Water Industry

2. Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the progress of his consultations about the future of the water industry in Scotland.

3. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has for privatising Scotland's water.

6. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is now in a position to announce his plans for the future of the water industry in Scotland.

15. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to publish his consultation document on the future of the water industry in Scotland.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Ian Lang): I made a statement yesterday on the future of the water industry and have published a consultation paper.

Mr. Wilson: Does the Secretary of State recognise that the water industry has operated for more than 100 years in the public sector in Scotland without the need for recourse to domestic disconnections? Does he accept that we are a healthier and more socially just nation as a result of the absence of those powers? Will he give an undertaking today that, whatever the other considerations about whether water is privatised, he will not change the law as a result of that consultation to make it possible for poor people to have their water disconnected, with all the consequences that flow from that, which we are already seeing in England and Wales?

Mr. Lang: I answered the hon. Gentleman's question yesterday. Disconnections do not affect the viability of the options laid out in the White Paper. The hon. Gentleman talked about the history of the water industry. Significantly, at the end of the second world war, there were more than 200 separate water authorities. It is only since 1946 that the Water (Scotland) Act has given general powers to local authorities in that matter. Gradually, the number of water authorities has been changed and the structure of the industry in Scotland has been reformed and modernised. We now face the need to make further changes and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will make a submission in response to the consultation paper.

Mr. Wray: Will the Secretary of State tell the House that the Government put no money into Strathclyde Water? Under section 94 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973, it is given a borrowing limit of £83 million and the revenue comes from meter and water charges of £94 million. The total running cost of sewerage services in Strathclyde is £86 million, the water debt is £170 million and the total debt of sewerage and water is £417 million; that means that Scottish and British taxpayers pay £66 million a year. Has not the Secretary of State for Scotland the guts to ask the Government to do exactly the same as they have done in England and Wales, by wiping off £500 million? We want a tartan dowry in Scotland, like the green dowry in England and Wales.

Mr. Lang: The water and sewerage industries need capital for investment every year. The only time they were denied it was during the 1976-79 period of the last Labour Government, when water investment was cut by one third and sewerage capital investment was cut by half. Such vulnerability exposes the difficulty of relying on private sector funding when massive new capital investment of some £5 billion will be needed in the next 10 to 15 years. Does the hon. Gentleman think that that £5 billion should be taken from health, housing, roads, education or some other source, or will he look at the consultation paper and try to find a more positive approach to the problem?

Mrs. Michie: I do not think that the Secretary of State has answered that question. He is threatening the people of Scotland by implying that the capital debt will be written off only if water is privatised. Does that not amount to plain blackmail?

Mr. Lang: I do not know how the hon. Lady thinks that existing debt can be written off—it must be repaid. Although the industry needs some £600 million a year, roughly £400 million of that comes from revenues, and the remainder comes from capital. The capital expectations, which have doubled in the past four or five years, are anticipated to go on increasing in the next 10 to 15 years. That money must be found and I await the hon. Lady's submission in response to the consultation paper and her suggestions about where it can be found.

Mr. Kirkwood: On the issue of accountability, does not the Secretary of State accept that one of the unique qualities of the existing system is that local people have the ability and the opportunity to influence the priorities of their local water and sewerage services? Some of us are concerned about the priority given to legislative standards enforced from on high. It is important that customers have a chance to influence what the water organisations do in their name. Will the Secretary of State give an assurance that whatever system is introduced, it will enshrine and retain that essential accountability?

Mr. Lang: The setting of standards to which the hon. Gentleman refers is something which should be done above local level—at national and European level. It is in order to meet those standards that we are inviting public consultation on the various options for the best way forward. The degree of accountability that can be derived from the options laid out in the consultation paper varies. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will send in a submission underlining that point.

Mr. Jenkin: I am an English Member of Parliament and my right hon. Friend will decide whether to privatise the industry in Scotland according to his consultation process—it is not so much a matter for me. However, should my right hon. Friend choose to privatise the industry, will he reassure the Scottish people that in England and Wales privatisation has led to a huge investment programme, a great improvement in water quality and improved conditions of employment for employees of the water industry?

Mr. Lang: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for telling us of his experience of the industry in England and Wales. During the 20 years to 1989, investment was below £6 billion and it is expected to be more than £28 billion over the next 10 years. That shows how the resources can be found in an imaginative way.

Mr. Adley: Without wishing to influence my right hon. Friend one way or the other—and I also declare an interest in the hotel business—may I ask him to look at that section of the legislation in England that affects infrastructure charges? Is he aware that an hotel in Leeds with which I have been associated for the past five to six years started off under the good offices of the Yorkshire water authority, which produced a quotation of £3,000 to attach the hotel to the mains? Now, the Yorkshire water company proposes to charge £208,000 for the same service. That fact does not need to influence my right hon. Friend's overall decision, but he should look carefully at the small print of anything that he introduces.

Mr. Lang: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for telling us of his personal experiences with the Leeds water authority. However, I must disappoint him, as I have no responsibilities for water in England or Wales.

Mr. John Marshall: When considering the possibility of privatising Scottish water services, as most Conservative Members wish my right hon. Friend to do, will he consider the experience of Thames Water, where there has been a 50 per cent. increase in investment and where water costs 45p per house per day—a reasonable charge? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the abolition of the drinking water directive would help the water industry throughout the United Kingdom?

Mr. Lang: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for telling us of the experiences of Thames Water. The drinking water directive and other European Community directives set standards to which we want to aspire. The investment programme on which we in Scotland have embarked means that we intend to aspire to those standards.

Mr. Tom Clarke: In view of the Secretary of State's self-imposed confidentiality about the Quayle Munro report, will he tell us whether Quayle Munro is free to give advice to potential buyers and precisely what Quayle Munro said to him about disconnections?

Mr. Lang: The Quayle Munro report did not address issues such as disconnections, but dealt with matters such as the viability of a range of options, which are now laid out in the consultation paper. Whether Quayle Munro later becomes involved in giving advice to individual companies is a matter for Quayle Munro.

Doctors and Nurses

4. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many doctors and nurses there were in Scotland in 1979 and at the latest available date; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): At 30 September 1979 there were 9,839 doctors, including general medical practitioners, employed in the national health service in Scotland and at 30 September 1991, the latest available date, this had risen to 11,079. The number of qualified nurses in the national health service in Scotland rose from 31,931 to 43,011 over this period.

Mr. Burns: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Will he confirm that that shows an increase of just over 10 per cent. in the number of doctors and an increase of about a third in the number of nurses in the health service in Scotland? If my mathematics are correct, does he agree that they more than underline the Government's commitment not only to health care and patients in Scotland, but to the national health service throughout the nation?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The figures are correct and beyond dispute, even by Opposition Members. They represent an increase of 12 per cent. in the number of doctors and an increase of 35 per cent. in the number of nurses since the Conservative party came to office. That underlines the Government's real commitment to the national health service and to its improvement in Scotland and throughout the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. McAvoy: Is the Minister aware of the threat to the employment of doctors and nurses and to services to the public by the threatened closure of hospitals in Glasgow, especially the Victoria infirmary and Rutherglen maternity hospital which serve my constituents? There will be a consultation period, but, as Mr. Laurence Peterken has displayed his absolute determination to close the Victoria infirmary and the maternity hospital, will the Minister ensure genuine consultation by removing Mr. Laurence Peterken from office for the period of that consultation?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman, who is widely respected in the House, does himself no good by personal attacks on a distinguished servant of the national health service. The hon. Gentleman referred to the Victoria infirmary and will know that it serves my constituency as well as his. The Government welcome the production by the Greater Glasgow health board of a consultation document in relation to changes in medical practice and changes in population. I assure the hon. Gentleman that there will be the fullest public consultation before any decisions are taken.

Mr. Kynoch: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that we are spending 44 per cent. more in real terms on the national health service in Scotland than was spent in 1979. I hope that my hon. Friend will take an interest in the review of acute services currently being carried out by Tayside health board and ensure that Stracathro hospital, the only major hospital between Dundee and Aberdeen for acute and emergency services, is retained. That hospital serves many of my constituents and those in neighbouring constituencies.

Mr. Stewart: As my hon. Friend may know, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State may wish to consider a trust application from Stracathro hospital. He will also be aware of the immense success story of the Aberdeen Royal hospitals NHS trust, about which I could detain the House with details for some time. However, Madam Speaker would not wish me to do so. Undoubtedly, the success of the Aberdeen Royal hospitals NHS trust shows that trust status hospitals in Scotland are working well.

Mrs. Fyfe: It seems a little odd that the Minister has to be told that information in the Library shows that the true full-time equivalent increase in nurses and midwives is only 6 per cent. Is it not true that numbers have been increasing anyway since the health service was founded? I should like to ask about future funding for doctors and nurses. How many doctors and nurses will there be if five Glasgow hospitals are allowed to close? How much income does the Minister expect to get from selling 82 acres at Stobhill or 10 acres at Victoria infirmary? How many patients will be refused treatment in his market system because the health board will not pay the costs?

Mr. Stewart: Oh dear, the hon. Lady does talk nonsense. However, I am glad to have a reassurance that even the hon. Lady——

Mrs. Fyfe: Read the statistics.

Mr. Stewart: I also go to the Library. I am glad to have the hon. Lady's reassurance that, however defined, the number of nurses in Scotland has increased under the Government, as has the number of doctors. I am glad that the Opposition have today conceded that, on any measure.

I am surprised that the hon. Lady does not think that there is a case for considering the future of acute services in Greater Glasgow. I should have thought that anyone looking at changes in medical practices and in population would concede that it was sensible to look at the options. We are moving from the stage at which we invested massively in district general hospitals in peripheral areas to a strategy of massive investment in district general hospitals in urban centres. I should have thought that the hon. Lady, representing Glasgow, Maryhill, would welcome that. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order so as to hear the Minister. Has he finished his response?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: In that case, I call Mr. Oppenheim.

Mr. Oppenheim: Does not this huge increase in the number of doctors and nurses in Scotland give the lie to the common Labour smear that we do not care about the health service? Is it not also the case that we have further committed ourselves to huge increases in NHS funding for this coming year, despite economic difficulties? Is that not in sharp contrast to the period when the Labour party was in power and got into economic difficulties, when the first thing that it cut was the hospital building programme?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is right. The Government's commitment is clear, and is shown by the figures. We are committed in broad terms to capital expenditure of £500 million over the next 10 years in the national health service in Scotland. As my hon. Friend rightly reminds Opposition Members, when the last Labour Government were in power, capital spending on the NHS was cut in real and in money terms. Under the Conservatives, it has increased and will continue to increase.

Training Provision (Autumn Statement)

5. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the implications of the Chancellor's autumn statement for training provision in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: Training provision for Scotland is one component of the figures for my right hon. Friend's overall programme that were announced as part of the autumn statement. It reflects a division of overall training provision for Great Britain, determined on the basis of relevant factors, such as relative unemployment. The marked improvement in Scotland's relative unemployment position since last year means that our share of overall training provision is smaller.

Mr. Worthington: In September, the Department of Employment let it be known that there was a shortfall of more than 9,500 training places for young people in Scotland, and there is a mounting level of long-term unemployment. Can the Government promise that when there is an allocation of resources to training, there will be an increase to meet that shortfall?

Mr. Stewart: I can give the hon. Gentleman the absolute assurance that in the past couple of days I have checked with Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise on the youth training guarantee. It is being met and will continue to be met.

Mr. Bill Walker: Will my hon. Friend confirm that, since 1979, the Government have increased the allocation of funds for training to thousands of millions of pounds, that additional training places have always been found to meet the requirements and that this is far in excess of anything ever achieved under any Labour Government?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. This Government are clearly committed to an effective training policy. It is output which matters, not input. Even on the measure of public expenditure to which Opposition Members pay such attention, in real terms this Government are spending two and a half times more on training than the last Labour Government.

Mr. McFall: Statistics on the youth training programme in Scotland show that at the end of the scheme year, more than 60 per cent. of young people find themselves back on the dole. With the economic slump closing 200 Scottish firms every week, and unemployment having risen 30 months in succession and touching almost 250,000, what advice does the Minister have for those youngsters? They must feel, at that early age, that there is no future for them. They followed the Government's advice, underwent training, and now find themselves unemployed and worse off than before. Is it not the case that the autumn statement holds out nothing more than the bleakest of Christmases, and beyond, for Scotland's young?

Mr. Stewart: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman undermines the effectiveness of the youth training scheme. No one suggests that everyone who undertakes training will automatically obtain employment at the end of it, but the Government's youth training guarantee for young people is given by no other European Community country.

Mr. McLeish: But it is not being honoured.

Mr. Stewart: My answer to the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) is that the guarantee is being met, though I know that he constantly issues press releases saying that it is not. I checked with Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise in the past couple of days that the youth guarantee is being met.

Housing

7. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland who he has met in the past year to discuss the supply of housing in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend and I have frequent meetings with individuals and organisations involved in the provision, management and sale of housing in Scotland.

Mr. McAllion: Scotland faces a national housing crisis in terms of increased homelessness, which has risen 133 per cent. over the past 10 years, and the loss, over the same period, of 250,000 homes for rent. Does not the Minister understand that his recent spending announcements come nowhere near the sums required to meet the targets set by the Institute of Housing in Scotland of 15,000 new affordable homes for rent every year? Does he not comprehend either that people in Scotland with the most desperate housing need cannot afford owner occupation and rent-to-mortgage schemes? Most of all, they cannot afford the Minister's obsession with forcing tenure changes at the expense of the Government's failure to meet the demand for decent homes at an affordable rent.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There is a large amount of activity in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. The Scottish Homes allocation in Dundee has increased from £10·9 million in 1991-92 to more than £15·8 million. As the hon. Gentleman will be the first to recognise, the remarkable transformation at Whitfield is continuing—as I know, having visited the Ormiston people's housing co-operative and Vale of Duntrune community housing association. The hon. Gentleman will welcome, as I do, the £70 million extra that will be made available to Scottish Homes' enabling programme as a result of the excellent settlement that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State managed to obtain, which will increase the programme by some £20 million in each of the next three years. I will bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's own district council's needs before we make provisional allocations.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Surely the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McFall), in his question, has done exactly the reverse——

Madam Speaker: Order. I am not seeking comments at Question Time. I must have questions, from all parts of the House.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Surely it needs to be said to people in all parts of the country, and particularly in Scotland, that they can afford to buy their own homes—and that by purchasing their council houses, 100 per cent. of the money raised can be spent on providing the new homes for which right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House seem to be asking.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I agree. We know that 52 per cent. of Scots now own their homes, and that many more aspire to home ownership. I had the good fortune to visit the first rent-to-mortgage owner in Dundee, who works for the council. The scheme is welcomed by those who seek the right and the opportunity to own their homes, and it provides a new home ownership market which will be appreciated by those who cannot quite afford to exercise the right to buy.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: The Minister will know that there are some excellent sheltered housing complexes throughout Scotland, including my constituency. They provide high-quality housing for elderly people who are protected by wardens 24 hours a day. Why does not the Minister give more funds to the local authority, to Scottish Homes and to the housing associations, so that more good housing can be provided for our elderly people?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The extra £20 million a year over the next three years which constitutes the extra enabling programme for Scottish Homes should allow more progress to be made in that regard. We shall bear Glasgow's needs very much in mind if any supplementary allocations are made, or else when the provisional allocations are made.

Green Belt

8. Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to protect the green belt.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Sir Hector Monro): My right hon. Friend's policy for protecting green belts is set out in Scottish development department circular 24/1985. Our consistent policy has been to maintain and enhance the green belt.

Mr. Galbraith: The Minister will know that much water authority land lies within the green belt. That land is much used and appreciated by my constituents in Strathkelvin and Bearsden. Will the Minister guarantee that, in the event of privatisation, no restrictions will be placed on access to the land, and, furthermore, that it will not be released for development so that private shareholders can rip off the public sector once again?

Sir Hector Monro: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. Most of our water resources come from land that is particularly attractive—the lochs and reservoirs—some of which may include sites of special scientific interest. No concern should be felt about the future ownership of that land.

Water Industry

9. Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to publish the report by the consultants Quayle Munro on the future of water services in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Hon. Members: Answer the question.

Sir Hector Monro: It is a good answer, worth waiting for.

As part of the Government's review of water and sewerage services in Scotland, consultants were commissioned to give advice under conditions of commercial confidentiality for the purpose of informing policy. That advice is reflected in the consultation paper that my right hon. Friend published yesterday.

Mr. Welsh: Actually, that was not much of an answer. Why have the Government allowed access to the local government report, but not to the water privatisation report? Have they something to hide? Surely, "commercial" sensitivities are in fact political sensitivities—the sensitivities of an isolated Government who are swimming against the tide of Scottish public opinion. Will the Minister confirm that the price of his secrecy is about £50,000, and will he now abandon this unwanted, unnecessary privatisation scheme?

Sir Hector Monro: Even after 24 hours' reflection, the hon. Gentleman is getting most of it wrong. Does he not understand that the document published yesterday by my right hon. Friend is a genuine consultation document? There are eight options, and variations may be produced in the intervening period. If Opposition Members put their minds to producing constructive reports for my right hon. Friend, they would be doing something really valuable for the Scottish people whom they represent.

Mr. Wallace: The Secretary of State said yesterday that he had engaged Quayle Munro to look into the technical aspects of water organisation. What technical qualifications—as opposed to financial qualifications—did Quayle Munro have? Do any of the commercial sensitivities relate to any French companies? Finally, is not the Secretary of State under a statutory duty, under section 1 of the Water (Scotland) Act 1980, to publish information relating to water services in Scotland? What is more fundamental than information that relates to the future organisation of those services?

Sir Hector Monro: I hope that the hon. Gentleman too has read the report which he has now had in his hands for 24 hours. Of course, the Quayle Munro report was valuable to my right hon. Friend for its technical and financial information. What the Secretary of State has published is a fair reflection of the position. It gives many alternatives. In fact, Opposition Members were all rumbled; they thought that it would be a privatisation document, and it is not. It gives alternatives which the country can consider. We will look at it carefully and come to conclusions later next year.

Mr. McLeish: Does the Minister accept that it is a scandal for a company that has access to confidential information to be allowed to advise possible bidders in the privatisation process if the Government proceed with that crazy idea? Will he tell the House that the real reason for commissioning Quayle Munro was the cosy clique of Ministers and favoured consultants seeking private information about quotations and franchising, and had nothing to do with any of the other six options? Will he tell the House why his office is behaving in such a deplorable manner, abusing the taxpayers' money and the office of the Secretary of State? It is a scandal. When will the report be published so that we may know what is in it?

Sir Hector Monro: The hon. Gentleman should count up to eight rather than to 10 and he would realise that there is a great deal of valuable information in the report. [Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman does not want to hear the answer, he need not listen. Quayle Munro was one of a number of companies that tendered for the consultation process. There was no question of a cosy operation; it was very competitive tendering.

Local Government

10. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will report progress on the consultations regarding future local government of Scotland.

Mr. Lang: I am very encouraged by the substantial public response to our second consultation paper on local government structure. More than 15,000 copies of the consultation paper and more than 70,000 shorter leaflets have been issued. The consultation period continues until the end of January next year.

Mr. McKelvey: The Secretary of State either forgot or deliberately did not mention subsidiarity. When he gets from the Prime Minister a definition of subsidiarity, will he relate with clarity to Charity McGarrity from Inverarity that she will not have subsidiarity, but that she, like the rest of Scotland, will have to remain in the mode of subserviarity? Does he realise that that breeds subversivarity? [Laughter.]

Mr. Lang: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman's question was greeted with hilarity by his colleagues. I must remind him that his original question was about the consultation paper on local government reform, but his supplementary had nothing to do with that. Nevertheless, I hope that he will read the consultation paper and let me have his thoughts ahead of our decision.

Sir Anthony Durant: Would my right hon. Friend care to comment on the press reports about the conduct of Monklands council which I understand is in the constituency of the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Lang: I do not think that I want to pry into that private grief. I am happy to leave that to the Leader of the Opposition and the shadow Secretary of State.

Scottish Enterprise

11. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chief executive of Scottish Enterprise to discuss the Scottish economy.

Mr. Lang: My ministerial colleagues and I often meet both the chairman and the chief executive of Scottish Enterprise to discuss a range of economic development and training issues. I contacted the chairman this morning to inform him that as part of the package of special measures that I announced last week, Scottish Enterprise will receive an additional £6 million added to this year's budget and Highland and Islands Enterprise an additional £1·5 million.

Mr. Salmond: Does the Secretary of State remember the boast of his friend, party supporter and instigator of Scottish Enterprise, Bill Hughes, who said that the aim of the organisation was to eliminate Scottish unemployment? What time scale does the Secretary of State envisage for the achievement of that ambition, given that Scottish unemployment is rising remorselessly, that the modest aspects of recovery announced in the autumn statement were geared to the south-east of England and that it is widely reported that there will be substantial staffing cuts in the Scottish Enterprise training network? How can that combination lead to the elimination of Scottish unemployment, as promised by Bill Hughes?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman seems to have forgotten that Scottish Enterprise was the latter manifestation of the Scottish development agency, with its functions changed dramatically so as to prevent it being the acquisitive engine of nationalisation that it was under the Labour Government. Now it is an engine of economic regeneration and is doing its work extremely effectively both at its own hand and through the local enterprise companies all over Scotland. The hon. Gentleman will no doubt also like to know that in the package I intend to increase the allocation for the trunk roads programme by £8.5 million, for local authority roads projects by £5 million, for health service and social work capital programmes by £10·25 million and for the water and sewerage programme by £6·5 million. That commitment of resources will go directly towards improving Scotland's infrastructure and reducing unemployment.

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to reaffirm to the House—and when he does it will he do it slowly so that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) takes it in—that gross domestic product, per head, in Scotland is currently at an all-time high and that male take-home pay in the hon. Gentleman's part of Scotland is the highest in Scotland? Will he further encourage the hon. Gentleman to stop talking Scotland down every time he gets the chance to do so?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. As a result of the improvement in the underlying economic infrastructure in Scotland, it is significant that the unemployment rate in Scotland is lower now than it is in the south-east of England. Whereas a year ago it was 0·1 per cent. higher than in the United Kingdom as a whole, it is now 0·4 per cent. lower than in the United Kingdom as a whole.

Dr. Reid: Why does unemployment keep going up in Scotland, and who is to blame?

Mr. Lang: Unemployment is rising in Scotland, as it is rising elsewhere in the United Kingdom and in every industrialised country in the world, as a result of the world economic recession. However, what is significant is that unemployment levels in Scotland were, in June of this year, at broadly the same level as they were a year ago. Last month, and the month before that, the headline unemployment total in Scotland fell. Last month, job vacancies in Scotland were up. The indications are that the Scottish economy is responding to the measures brought in by the Government, Scottish Enterprise and others in order to improve our competitiveness and help to create jobs.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the Secretary of State recall telling me last month that Scottish Enterprise had been set up in order to help the recovery of the Scottish economy? Since Scottish Enterprise is to lose jobs and since Scottish Enterprise knows that the effect of the autumn statement will be job losses all over the country, does the Secretary of State accept that he seems to be the only person in Scotland, given all these job losses, who thinks that Scotland is experiencing an economic recovery?

Mr. Lang: It is a pity that the hon. Gentleman should be so derisive of all the efforts of Scottish Enterprise and all the local enterprise companies in Scotland. Business men, with many preoccupations of their own, are lending their time and effort to help to generate employment and to improve the economic infrastructure and the environment. That is creating a climate in Scotland in which our unemployment figures are standing up so much better than they are elsewhere. The hon. Gentleman anticipates the future budget for Scottish Enterprise, but perhaps he ought to wait until it is allocated.

Governance

12. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what further consideration he has given to the issue of improving the governance of Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: Our review of ways of making the government of Scotland more responsible to Scotland's needs within the Union is continuing.

Mr. Galloway: As my hon. Friends say, "Oh dear, oh dear." The Secretary of State has now been taking stock for 224 days. We have not had the merest whimper of an acknowledgment, that although he governs our country, 75 per cent. of our people voted against him. In Edinburgh on 12 December the Secretary of State, with his Cabinet colleagues, will be closeted with the European Heads of Government and grappling with them over the British Government's demand for subsidiarity, defined as the right of people to have local decisions taken as locally as possible. How can it be that it is right for this House of Commons and this British state to have subsidiarity when it is wrong for the people whom the Secretary of State misrepresents in this House and in the British Cabinet room?

Mr. Lang: I understand the hon. Gentleman's sense of frustration. After all, he laid out his own programme in July of this year when, Scotland United, an organisation which existed at the time, and to which he belonged called for > "more extra-parliamentary work . . . a less reverential approach to Parliament itself; a shadow Scottish parliament meeting in Edinburgh; selective boycotts of set-piece parliamentary occasions like the now farcical Scottish Question Time; a greatly expanded Scottish Labour front bench; and the planned disruption of strategically-selected Commons business. No 'business as usual' until the Government comes to the negotiating table."

Plainly, as I look around me, Madam Speaker, I see that the hon. Gentleman's negotiations have not made much headway.

Mr. Bill Walker: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that in the taking-stock exercise, the Conservative and Unionist Government are not considering the flawed proposals put forward by the Labour party or the unworkable proposals put forward by the Scottish Convention? They would be bad for the Union, bad for the unitary Parliament and eventually very bad for the people of Scotland.

Mr. Lang: I am happy to reassure my hon. Friend that our proposals will do nothing to undermine the integrity of the United Kingdom or this sovereign Parliament, unlike the Opposition's proposals in the general election. I can also assure my hon. Friend that I and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister continue to give the matter our close attention. We should welcome any constructive, positive and sensible suggestions from any quarter.

Mr. Trimble: In considering the future governance of Scotland, is the Secretary of State considering the introduction of safeguards against political and religious discrimination to avoid controversy such as that in Monklands district at the moment?

Mr. Lang: I would certainly deplore the discrimination to which the hon. Gentleman refers. I am not aware that the problem is widespread in Scotland and I would not anticipate our measures being directed towards that end.

Mrs. Ewing: When does the Secretary of State expect to end the stock-taking exercise and when will he make a statement to the House to advise all of us and the people of Scotland about the improvements he envisages in the government of Scotland?

Mr. Lang: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her eager anticipation of the outcome of the deliberations. We shall make an announcement as soon as we sensibly can. I am sure that the hon. Lady agrees that it is more important to get it right than to get it quickly.

Hospitals (Argyll and Clyde)

13. Mrs. Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next plans to meet the chairman of Argyll and Clyde health board to discuss the management of hospitals.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to meet the chairman of Argyll and Clyde health board at present, but my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State meets health board chairmen regularly.

Mrs. Adams: I was gravely concerned when I saw the Under-Secretary of State rising, because I knew that I would not get an answer to my question. Does the Minister accept that we are told that we have a listening Government who consult the people on the management of hospitals, on water privatisation and on the governance of Scotland? Will the Government give us one iota of evidence of their having listened to the results of consultations and of their having implemented the results of those consultations?

Mr. Stewart: I gave the hon. Lady a completely accurate answer to her question. If she is asking about the consultation process in relation to the application for trust status by the Royal Alexandra hospital in Argyll and Clyde, I can assure her that my right hon. Friend will look carefully at all the evidence and arguments.

Mr. Graham: When the Secretary of State meets the chairman, will he consider testing properly the democratic rights of the people of Renfrewshire by giving them the opportunity to vote to see whether they accept our local hospital becoming a trust? I am sure that if a ballot were held, the Secretary of State would get the clear message from the people of Renfrewshire that they have no truck with the Tory trust.

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman expresses himself with his customary clarity on these matters. My right hon. Friend will consider the representations made in his customarily objective, well-reasoned and non-partisan way.

Scotch Whisky

14. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were employed in Scotch whisky production in Scotland in each of the last five years.

Mr. Stewart: In 1987, 11,100 people were employed in plants whose principal product was Scotch whisky and which had 11 or more employees. The equivalent figure for the following four years was on average 10,300. I will give details in the Official Report.

The following is the information:

	Number
1988	10,100
1989	10,000
1990	10,700

[1] Provisional.

Mr. Steen: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister is not too surprised about the fact that the amount of Scottish whisky consumed in the British Isles over the past few years has been declining dramatically. Does he agree that one reason for that is that the unit of alcohol in Scottish whisky is charged at double the rate per unit of alcohol in French, Italian, Spanish, or German wine? Bearing in mind the fact that the number of people employed in the Scottish whisky industry over the past 10 years has declined by 40 per cent., does he agree that our job in Britain is not to create jobs in Europe and France, but jobs in this country?

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stewart: The reaction to my hon. Friend's question shows the popularity of his views on all sides of the House. As my hon. Friend will appreciate, taxation is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—[HON. MEMBERS: "Here he is."] I can now doubly reassure my hon. Friend that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is fully informed of the views of the whisky producers on those matters.

Mr. Darling: Does the Minister accept that the Scottish whisky industry needs a constant supply of good quality, cheap water? If water is privatised and a private company has a monopoly, as is the case in respect of the supply of electricity, prices will rise and that will increase the price of whisky. In addition, there will be a constant threat of disconnection for the whisky industry as there is for ordinary members of the public. Does he not accept therefore, that the threat of the privatisation of water is a major threat to the future of the Scotch whisky industry?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman is living in a fantasy world which is even more absurd than that inhabited by most of his hon. Friends. I do not think that that question requires a serious answer.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Will my hon. Friend contemplate the fact that in order to achieve the glory of the Maastricht union, the French are willing to forgo drinking French wine and we should ensure that we drink our whisky and that they do not drink their wine?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. and learned Friend will no doubt be drinking a toast this evening to the extra £1 million that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced for the Historic Buildings Council in his package this afternoon. With regard to my hon. and learned Friend's more general point, it is worth recording that the Scotch whisky industry was appreciative of the outcome which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer achieved in discussions on the duty regime with his European colleagues earlier this year.

BCCI

16. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on what assistance he will give to local authorities that have lost money in the Bank of Credit and Commerce International.

Mr. Stewart: Two of the four Scottish authorities that had money deposited in BCCI applied for and were granted borrowing consent to enable them to cope with their losses.

Mr. Vaz: The Minister is no doubt aware that since those arrangements were entered into, the Bingham report has been published which severely criticises the role of the Bank of England. Those criticisms have been accepted by the Government and the Bank of England. Since the publication, the Bank has now decided to issue a health warning with its list of authorised institutions. Bearing in mind the fact that Scottish local authorities relied on that list and that there has been severe criticism, does the Minister agree that there is a compelling and overwhelming case for compensation to be paid to those local authorities? Is it not outrageous that Scottish poll tax payers and future council taxpayers have to pay for the mistakes of the Bank of England?

Mr. Stewart: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's analysis. Only two Scottish authorities requested any assistance. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State granted Western Isles islands council consent to borrow £24 million and Ross and Cromarty district council consent to borrow £1·8 million to help those councils to cope with their losses. On the hon. Gentleman's other point, although the Bingham report makes a number of criticisms of the Bank of England in its supervision of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International, it makes it clear that prime responsibility for the losses rests with those who devised, directed and implemented the fraud.

Mr. Macdonald: But compensation was not within the remit of the Bingham inquiry, which leaves the Government as judge and jury of their own case. Does the Minister acknowledge that an independent verdict on compensation for local authorities and all depositors can come only from the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee? Should the Select Committee come up with a new report including a verdict on compensation, will the Government undertake to respect the findings of that report?

Mr. Stewart: Of course the Government will consider most seriously the recommendations of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, as they consider seriously the recommendations of all Select Committees. I must repeat to the hon. Gentleman that, following representations from himself and from the Western Isles islands council, my right hon. Friend granted that council consent to borrow £24 million. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have been sympathetic to the economic case that has been put forward by the Western Isles islands council in relation to the other aspects of the general programmes.

DSS Offices

3.31 pm

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. On 2 November, in answer to an oral question about the additional £8 million to local Department of Social Security offices, the Secretary of State for Social Security stated:

> "Details will be placed in the Library in due course."—[Official Report, 2 November 1992; Vol. 213, c. 1.]

Since that date, I have been asking the Library for that information, but unfortunately it is still not available. I have since found out that the local district offices are now in possession of that information. As late as today, I was told that it will be two weeks before the information will be available to right hon. and hon. Members. Surely that is just not good enough. It is embarrassing for us all. The matter shows that the Secretary of State and his staff are either incompetent or are treating the House with contempt.

Madam Speaker: I hope that Ministers on the Treasury Bench have noted the hon. Gentleman's points so that the matter can be looked at in order to ensure that documents which should be available outside the House are not denied to hon. Members inside.

We now come to the ballot for notices of motion. It would be most helpful if hon. Members would sign outside the Chamber and not at the last minute.

BALLOT FOR NOTICES OF MOTIONS FOR FRIDAY 4 DECEMBER 1992

Members successful in the ballot were:

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend
Mr. Kevin Barron
Mr. Malcolm Moss

Oath of Allegiance

3.34 pm

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I beg to move,

> That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide that persons seeking United Kingdom citizenship should be required to take an oath of allegiance to the Crown.

The present position of permanent residents in Britain is a mess and a muddle. Some of us are full citizens. Other people come from various parts of the world to work here as foreigners. Refugees come to take refuge here. People from many parts of the world come to Britain for other reasons. People are given the right to settle in Britain, and after five years that right becomes a right to live permanently in Britain.

Yet there is no obligation on the part of such people to accept the responsibilities of citizenship as well as the benefits. I know that the Labour party will give its knee-jerk reaction to the Bill, and assume that I am talking about race. I assure them that I am talking of nothing of the sort. My Bill is a cohesive measure which will make people who live here feel that being British means that they are part of the way of life and have a citizenship they enjoy, uphold and are prepared to defend if the necessity arises.

The oath of allegiance is set out in the British Nationality Act 1981. After five years of residence or, in the case of spouses of people who are already citizens, three years of residence, people can apply for full citizenship. However, there is no obligation on them to do so. I believe that that is wrong. It would have a cohesive effect on people to take an oath to the country.

The requirement to take an oath of allegiance is commonplace in other parts of the world. People who settle in America, Australia, Canada and New Zealand —all countries which are extremely generous in allowing newcomers into their society—require that most people, after an appropriate period, take an oath. In the United States, young children swear their oath and salute the flag every day of their school life. An oath makes them think that they are Americans or Australians first and that their country of origin comes second.

I should like all people who settle permanently in Britain to feel that they are British, just as those of us who were born and bred here do. Those of us who are native citizens affirm our citizenship and our dedication to Britain in special circumstances by taking an oath. Members of Parliament do so when they enter Parliament. Judges do so when they take up office. Members of the armed forces take an oath of allegiance. So do bishops in certain circumstances. Therefore, it is not an alien concept even for people who are already acknowledged citizens by birth to affirm their allegiance to Britain when they take up special duties.

In the European legislation which we are currently engaged in debating, we are informed about a new type of citizenship—a citizenship of the union. When I go round the country, I find that many constituents are worried about that type of citizenship. They want to know whether it will interfere with their British citizenship. They want to know how it will affect Britain if a great many people from Europe choose to settle in Britain permanently. Such people would benefit from being in Britain, yet would have no obligations to Britain, for example, in time of war or when questions of treason arise. They would have the benefits but not the obligations.

People in Britain would welcome the requirement that people who reside here permanently accept the obligations which go with that privilege. Therefore, I should like to introduce a Bill which will require those who decide to settle here permanently, as they are able to do after five years of being allowed to reside here, to make a commitment to the Crown, using the oath of allegiance set out in the British Nationality Act 1981. That will have a beneficial effect on our country. We know what happens to societies where people are drawn together under the name of one country, yet feel no allegiance to it. Those countries are fracturing and falling apart, and their people may even be involved in fratricide.

As Britain becomes more open to people from many parts of the world, including Europe, there needs to be a sense that the British nation has an identity—that being British means something to all those people, wherever they come from. By taking an oath, they would have to do no more than they would in other countries which exercise the same sort of generosity as Britain. I beg leave to introduce my Bill.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I understand that Mr. Tony Banks seeks to oppose.

3.40 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I wish to oppose the ten-minute rule application. The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) is a feisty individual, who has espoused some worthwhile causes in her time, but this is not one of them.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Name one.

Mr. Banks: A woman's right to choose was one very good cause espoused by the hon. Member for Billericay.

I cannot support the measure, because it seems to be a regal variant of Lord Tebbit's cricket test. I oppose the Bill on a number of grounds. First, it is unnecessary. Existing citizens would not be required to take such an oath, as the hon. Lady rightly pointed out. If the Bill got on to the statute book, which it will not, it would create two classes of citizen and would add one further hurdle to the process of application for citizenship, which is already tedious, expensive and time-consuming.

When one thinks about it, the requirement to take an oath of allegiance is not onerous. I imagine that, if it were a requirement of citizenship to stand on one leg and sing a chorus of "My Old Man's a Dustman", most people would do so to secure their objective. Rather than create more obstacles to citizenship, the hon. Lady would do better to use her undoubted energies to propose a fairer and faster method of citizenship application.

Secondly, why should an oath of allegiance be restricted to the Crown? If we were going to insist on such a thing, it would be far more appropriate to take an oath of allegiance to the country. Most of the powers of the Crown, especially in respect of the royal prerogative, have long since passed to the Government of the day and to the Prime Minister—[HON. MEMBERS: "And to Brussels."]—yes, as my hon. Friends say, to Brussels. Perhaps we should take an oath of allegiance to Jacques Delors and the European Commission.

I realise that, since the Prime Minister has so many of the powers of the royal prerogative, it would be attractive to Conservative Members if new citizens had to pledge allegiance to him. Before we move down that road, perhaps they should apply that test to Tory Back Benchers, especially in view of the impending debate on Maastricht, and start with the hon. Member for Billericay.

Finally, what about citizens who hold republican views? This country still passes for a free society, and it is not illegal to believe that, in a proper democracy, the Head of State should be elected and be accountable to the people. To hold such views should not be used as a way to call into question the patriotism of any citizen, new or old. With an oath of allegiance to the Crown alone, people with republican views would be forced either to break their oath or to disown their beliefs. That is an invidious choice, and it should not be imposed on any individual.

The hon. Member for Billericay said that MPs are required to swear such an oath before taking their seats after an election. I find that anachronistic. My allegiance is to the country and to the people who elected me, and to no one else. If oaths are to be taken, they should be to the country, to democracy, the rule of law, civil rights and the liberties of the people. Because the proposal in the Bill is restrictive in extent and limited in application, I beg leave to oppose it.

Autumn Statement

[Relevant documents: Minutes of Evidence taken before the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on 16th and 17th November (House of Commons Papers Nos. 250-iii and -iv)].

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment standing in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. Between the hours of 6 pm and 8 pm, I have imposed a 10-minute limit on speeches, and I ask other right hon. and hon. Members to exercise some voluntary restraint over the length of their speeches.

Mr. Adam Ingram (East Kilbride): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I understand that today the staff and unions at AE Technology were advised that the Government have decided to cancel the European fast reactor programme, to which Britain was committed to the tune of £12·87 million. Given that that announcement pre-empts the Government's review of their energy policy, which is on-going as a result of a resolution of the House, is it not out of order for the Government to act in such a way as to put at risk many hundreds of jobs in districts such as Dounreay in Scotland?

Madam Speaker: I find it strange that hon. Members should raise points of order about such documents, which are not of a parliamentary nature, of which I have no knowledge and which I have not seen, and that a point of order which is out of order is used in order to raise the matter.

3.56 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Norman Lamont): I beg to move,

> That this House approves the Autumn Statement presented by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer on 12th November; welcomes the Government's continuing commitment to the firm control of public expenditure; supports the new expenditure plans, which honour the Government's commitments and provide protection of capital spending; applauds the specific measures the Government has taken to encourage confidence and foster recovery; and congratulates the Government on achieving a substantial reduction in underlying inflation, which has laid the foundations for sustainable growth.

I welcome the opportunity to have this early debate on the autumn statement. The principal aim of the measures that I announced was to restore confidence and to hasten recovery. To secure that objective I set out four key elements in the Government's strategy for growth: first, spending plans for the next three years which are fully consistent with what the economy can afford; secondly, within that tight overall settlement, special protection for programmes, particularly capital programmes, which strengthen the long-term health of the economy; thirdly, a substantial package of measures to boost activity in particular sectors of the economy; and fourthly, a further reduction in interest rates, following the dramatic progress that we have made in reducing inflation. That is the right strategy for Britain, and it has been warmly welcomed, not just by my right hon. and hon. Friends, but by industry and the country at large.

Conservative Members have never believed that the Government can spend their way out of recession. It is the private sector that generates growth and creates jobs—not the state. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) takes a different view. He believes—as he told a recent press conference—that the state is what he calls the "engine of growth", a view that has been discredited and discarded right across the world. It is not even fashionable today in Albania.

What the Government can, and must, do is to create an environment in which businesses can plan, invest and succeed, and that is exactly what we have done. British business now has an underlying inflation rate below the European Community average, interest rates that are lower than anywhere else in the European Community, one of the lowest rates of corporation tax in the industrialised world, and the best industrial relations record that we have seen in this country for very many years. On top of all that, British exporters are now nearly 15 per cent. more competitive in foreign markets than they were just two months ago. That gives British industry massive new opportunities to win back markets both at home and abroad.

All too often, economic commentators—joined by Opposition Members—talk down the prospects for business and the outlook for the future. Well, in the months and weeks ahead, Conservative Members will be encouraging business men to seize the opportunities provided by the new environment. Low taxes, low inflation and low interest rates—that is what business has been asking for, and that is what it has got.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): While that may be so, are there not two things that business men do not know? One is what will happen to the exchange rate, which they knew—or thought they knew—when we were in the ERM; the other is whether Britain will be in the single currency system or in the forefront of the development of the European Community.

Mr. Lamont: I have repeatedly made it clear that the Government are not operating an exchange rate target, that I believe in a strong currency, and that we will take the exchange rate into account in formulating our anti-inflation policy. The right hon. Gentleman asked about a single currency. We have always made it clear that a decision will be made at a later date. That is the right and appropriate course.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): In the light of the widespread view in business circles and elsewhere that the figures in the autumn statement do not add up, will the Chancellor confirm the briefing given to The Sunday Times by "senior Treasury and Downing street sources" that, come what may, the PSBR next year will be kept to 7 per cent.?

Mr. Lamont: I have no idea what the hon. Gentleman means when he says that the figures do not add up. They are set out clearly in the Grey Book. We have published what we believe is a realistic forecast for the PSBR for this year. We do not make a forecast for next year, but we have made an assumption. The PSBR for next year will be set at the right time, which is in the Budget. The hon. Gentleman is concerned about the PSBR, as I am. I should like to know what expenditure Labour intends to cut to bring the PSBR down. I hope that we shall not have any more such talk.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East) rose——

Mr. Lamont: I shall give way in a minute.

Economic activity is the product of millions of separate decisions by consumers, investors and business. They are about whether to spend or to save, to invest today, or to wait until tomorrow. Confidence is the key to unlocking that activity, and Governments must do all they can to build and sustain it. That is why I introduced my package of measures in the autumn statement.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East could not raise even half a cheer. However, I was not surprised, because for him every piece of good news is just another page that has to be ripped out of his speech. With his shopping lists and his grim sound bites, the hon. Gentleman likes to seize on a critical report, perhaps from the CBI, or a gloomy report, perhaps from the Institute of Directors.

I look forward to the hon. Gentleman's quotes in this debate from the CBI, which said that the package > "will rebuild industry's confidence in itself".

The chairman of the CBI's economic affairs committee said:

> "We needed a whole package of measures and that's what we got. The Chancellor has listened to what industry has said to him."

He said that that was what industry needed.

Mr. Brown: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lamont: I shall give way in a minute. I have given way twice.

The Association of British Chambers of Commerce said:

> "Businesses have heard the right messages".

The Institute of Directors said:

> "the Chancellor has given businesses the framework needed to begin the recovery."

Those are the views of the leading business organisations in this country. They speak for British business men and know what is actually happening in industry, and they have all endorsed the measures that I have taken.

Mr. Brown: Will the Chancellor also confirm that Mr. Howard Davies, the director-general of the CBI, said that no one could be sure that these measures are sufficient to take us out of recession? The Engineering Employers Federation said that they did not add up to a coherent strategy. Will the Chancellor look at his own figures and confirm that the autumn statement assumes, first, that unemployment will continue to rise; secondly, that it assumes in the budget to be awarded to the insolvency service that business bankruptcies will continue to rise? Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that it also assumes that business investment will stagnate? Does that add up to the recovery that the right hon. Gentleman said he would give us?

Mr. Lamont: It was absolutely predictable that the hon. Gentleman would, as always, come out with his long shopping lists. He did not cite the most significant quotations from the largest, most important, and most representative business organisations. If the hon. Gentleman had quoted Howard Davies, the director-general of the CBI, in full, he would have said that Mr. Davies warmly welcomed my measures. To say that nothing can guarantee what happens in the next year is to say something that is true of all measures. There are no measures without risk and none with complete security attached to them. However, the package was warmly welcomed, and rightly so, throughout British industry.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Lamont: No, because I should like to get on a little further.

My autumn statement was based on two fundamental principles—low inflation and tight control of public spending. Those are the key requirements for any lasting economic recovery, and they are the crucial conditions for the sustainable reduction in unemployment that all of us want to see. Opposition Members have never learnt those basic principles. They have never understood that inflation is the enemy of investment and saving, that reckless spending is the route to slump. That is why, in the past two years, we have fought a remorseless battle to get inflation down to the sort of levels that our European partners enjoy—levels that give our exporters the chance to compete abroad, and give consumers the confidence they need to spend rather than to save.

On Friday, we had some more excellent news on inflation. Underlying inflation is now down to just 3·8 per cent.—below the European Community average and the lowest for four years. The dramatic progress that we have made on inflation has allowed me to reduce interest rates since we left the ERM. More than anything else, that relaxation of monetary policy will help get Britain back to work. Interest rates are now at their lowest level for nearly 15 years; they are the lowest anywhere in the European Community, and they have fallen by a full 3 per cent. in the past eight weeks. That is a considerable injection of extra spending power in the economy—£45 a month off the typical mortgage payment, and over £3¾ billion off industry's interest bill. That comes on top of the interest rate reductions that we have seen continuously over the past year.

If we are to keep interest rates down, however, it is vital to maintain firm control over public spending. A prudent approach to spending is important for another reason, too —the more of a burden the state becomes, the less companies and individuals strive and prosper.

That means that we have to hold the growth in spending below the long-term growth level of the economy as a whole. That is why we decided to stick to cash plans for next year and to set tight ceilings for public spending for the following two years. Those ceilings are consistent with growth in the new control total of 1½ per cent. a year on average. Spending will grow in real terms each year, but the new system that I have put in place will ensure that we spend no more each year than the country can afford.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): We have heard about the CBI, and it always has a loud voice, and about the Institute of Directors, and it gets a fair showing in the House. However, the Chancellor fails to recognise that there are 4 million to 5 million low-paid people who he is demanding should have either a pay cut or a pay freeze. Their voice should be heard more often.

I have news for him. If he wants to balance the books, why does he not claw back, through taxation, the £26·2 billion that the richest 1 per cent. in Britain had in the first 10 years of the Tory Government? He should get that back, and then, instead of having a pay freeze for low-paid workers, he could use that money to finance the health service, to pay pensioners and to start building houses again. He should not be calling on low-paid people to clean up the mess created by the Tory Government.

Mr. Lamont: Perhaps I misheard the hon. Gentleman, but I thought that he began by saying something about people with loud voices. No one would accuse him of not having a loud voice. He has what often goes with loud voices—a tendency to get his facts completely wrong. It is not true to say that low-paid people are exclusively or predominantly in the public sector. I am afraid that that does not accord with the facts.

In my Mansion house speech, I made clear that I was determined to protect capital wherever possible within this survey. I have done that in two ways: by giving priority within the new spending plans to capital programmes, and by liberalising the rules on private finance.

The new plans support capital projects across a wide range of programmes. We will invest £6·3 billion on roads in the next three years. That is what we promised at the election, and that is what we will do. We will invest more in British Rail next year than in any year in the 1980s. That means that investment is up by one fifth compared with 1979, even after inflation.

We will invest a record £2·1 billion next year on capital projects in the national health service in England; why do not Opposition Members even begin to welcome that? We shall more than fulfil our election pledge to provide 153,000 homes through the Housing Corporation over three years.

There will be hundreds of capital projects—almost 400 major projects in the NHS; £1·4 billion of channel tunnel-related projects; £170 million on new rolling stock for commuter services in Kent; and twice as many new road starts next year as this.

On top of all that, we have made provision to move ahead quickly with one of the biggest projects that London Transport has put forward for decades—the Jubilee line extension. That means more work for the construction and engineering industries—perhaps as many as 12,000 on one project alone.

Those plans and proposals ensure that, after a rise this year, total public sector investment will be maintained in the year ahead.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): My right hon. Friend is truly to be congratulated on his spending announcements last week and today concerning the Jubilee line—which even Opposition Members must welcome. However, perhaps he will clarify one point that mystifies me. Following last week's statement, London Transport's chairman said the following day that he was aggrieved that core funding is to be cut over the next three years. What is that supposed to mean? My right hon. Friend announced good news for London Transport, so why does its chairman complain?

Mr. Lamont: Investment in London Underground will be at the highest level for 20 years since records began. Even taking out the Jubilee line—which is an extraordinary way of looking at things, as though it were not a major project that must be paid for—investment will be higher than in any year other than the current year. By any standards, that is a major injection of funds into London Underground.

Improving the nation's infrastructure is not just a job for the Government. The radical new approach to private finance that I announced last week will, for the first time, really open up infrastructure projects to the private sector.

I have abolished the need for comparison between private and public projects which used to prevent schemes going ahead. Provided a project is self-financing and conforms with regulatory requirements, there is no reason, in my opinion, why the Government should stand in its way. I have opened the way to more joint ventures between the public and private sectors, and I have liberalised the rules for leasing, so the public sector can make the best use of the capital resources available.

As a start, British Rail will be allowed to lease some £150 million of new rolling stock in the next three years, which will help to develop the leasing market and pave the way to privatisation. That provision comes on top of BR's existing Government funding.

There are now immense opportunities across a wide range of projects. I listed some when I made my statement. The way is now clear for the private sector to come forward with further specific proposals for projects that they would like to carry out in partnership with the Government.

The Green Paper on motorway charging, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will publish in the new year, will be another radical step. Road charging raises many difficult questions, which will need the most careful consideration, but a future decision to proceed with electronic road pricing would open up enormous opportunities for new private sector investment in Britain's roads network.

Of course, the best way of involving the private sector in capital projects is through privatisation directly. The Government have been following that policy for many years, and many successful private companies have been created as a result. Next year, the Government will hold another major sale in one of those companies, British Telecom. That will be done to promote further our policy of wider share ownership.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Does the Chancellor remember telling me on Thursday—this can be found in column 1009 of Hansard—that Scotland, or "the territories" as he put it, would gain more from the changes in the Barnett formula than it would otherwise have done? Given that the Scottish Office has since estimated the loss over the next three years at £27 million from this year's block allocation, would the Chancellor care to amend his remarks and bring them closer to reality?

Mr. Lamont: I do not believe that I told the hon. Gentleman anything that was incorrect, but I will have a look at what I said. I was explaining that the consequentials formula for Scotland had been adjusted in line with the results of the latest population census; that strikes me as sensible and, indeed, overdue.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Last week, the Chancellor said that he would recoup the £700 million from the car tax in further taxes for road users. Is he now telling us that his April Budget will feature that plan for all road users? If so, what form will it take?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman would be amazed if I gave the full details; indeed, it would be amazing if I were able to do so. What I said was that the cost of the motor tax abolition would be recouped, and I think that it would be reasonable to expect—[Interruption.] I have not made up my mind about which part will be recouped from particular taxes.

Capital spending does not just mean more roads, more hospitals and more rolling stock. The Government have also been determined to invest in the future of our people: that is why, in this very tight public spending round, we have continued to give priority to both education and health. Education spending will rise by 6 per cent. next year, and by 1995-96 it will be £1½ billion higher. That will allow 222,000 more students to enter further education; it will also allow Britain to rise nearer to the top of the international league for participation in education by 16-to-19-year-olds. At the same time, we are providing for a growing proportion of school leavers to take up youth training places.

Spending on the health service will rise in real terms in each of the next three years. Next year, it will rise by 3 per cent., enabling 2½ per cent. more patients to be treated. We have also kept the promises that we made to pensioners and to the less well off, who rely on benefits for their standard of living. That is why child benefit, pensions and other benefits have been indexed in full.

We could not have maintained capital spending, while at the same time focusing on health and education and uprating benefits, unless we had been prepared to adopt a firm stance on public sector pay. If we are to control current spending, the choice comes down to restraining the growth in wage bills or restraining the growth of services. In current circumstances, I judged that a policy of pay restraint in the public sector was the correct response.

I know that the limit of 1½ per cent. for settlements will seem hard to many who work in the public sector, but the facts must be recognised. In the past two years, earnings in the public sector have outstripped those in the private sector, where settlements are now at a 25-year low. Many private sector employees have experienced a pay freeze or a pay cut. I believe that a 1½ per cent. pay ceiling for one year is quite justified in the circumstances, given what it will yield.

The public sector pay bill represents an immense claim on the public finances. Controlling public spending is what we had to do, and what the autumn statement is all about.

I know all too well that the recession has been difficult for businesses and home owners, and particularly for those who have lost their jobs. More recently, the gloomy world background and the blow to confidence caused by the suspension of our ERM membership has raised renewed concern. But the fact is that, over the spring and into the summer, car production rose, being up 19 per cent. in the first half of the year, manufacturing production rose in the first and second quarters, and retail sales rose in the second quarter and again in the third.

Despite the gloomy headlines of the last few months, some of these hopeful indicators have been maintained. Car production again in October was 22 per cent. higher than a year earlier; industrial production rose in the third quarter; and today's new figures show that retail sales were up for the third month in a row, to their highest level for well over two years.

Over the months ahead, we need to see that this progress is consolidated and spread to those sectors, particularly housing and construction, which have been especially hard hit. It was to reviving confidence in those hard-pressed areas that the package of measures that I announced last week was addressed. Those measures, together with the cuts in interest rates, will provide major opportunities for businesses.

First, on the housing market, the Government are providing £750 million in the next four months to remove at least 20,000 empty properties off the market. The more private finance, and the better the terms, that can be secured, the more such properties will come off the market. Housing associations will be looking to builders, building societies and the whole range of lending institutions to get involved. This measure has been warmly welcomed by all those who care about the housing market. The National Association of Estate Agents has already described the move as "a recipe for recovery".

Secondly, as to the construction industry, local authorities now have a one-off opportunity to spend all the receipts they get over the next year. That should boost capital investment by local councils by over £1¾ billion—extra money for house renovations or refurbishing schools. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has taken steps to ensure that the extra investment is spread widely and has the maximum impact. Opposition Members were asking the other day why more could not be done. It can. They should go and tell Labour local authorities to sell their council houses and spend the money on the improvements we all want to see.

Thirdly, I have given exporters new opportunities to compete and succeed. I have increased export credit cover by £700 million for this year and next to help exporters take advantage of their new competitiveness and win new orders in world markets.

Fourthly, in regard to investment, with increased capital allowances and the lowest interest rates in Europe, every company has opportunities to invest. Even today, business investment accounts for a higher share of GDP than at any time during the 1970s. The higher capital allowances that I announced will add to this by giving firms the extra incentive they need to bring their investment plans forward.

Fifthly, the abolition of car tax will provide another major boost to Britain's car industry and to suppliers and component manufacturers throughout the country. That is why the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders said:

> "we can now look forward to the motor industry leading the economy out of recession".

British industry, which is the largest purchaser of cars produced in this country, will also benefit. The chairman of Lex Service, the car retailers, said that the abolition of car tax would > "reinforce the improvement that has already been seen in the new car market in recent months".

As I have said, there have indeed been improvements in the car market in car sales and in car production.

Low interest rates, low inflation, a package to build confidence and recovery—those are the steps which we have taken to tackle unemployment. Governments beat unemployment by encouraging growth and creating the conditions which business needs to invest and prosper. Job creation is a consequence of economic recovery, not its cause. Unemployment cannot be solved simply by letting the state sector grow year by year, as Opposition Members seem to believe.

Indeed, because of their commitment to minimum wages, any Government formed by the Opposition would increase unemployment, not reduce it. That is not just my view. After the election, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) explained it all. He said:

> "I knew that the consequences were that there would be some shake out. Any silly fool knew that."

I repeat:

> "Any silly fool knew that."

Apparently not. No one would accuse the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) of being a silly fool. However, it was the right hon. and learned Member who described Labour's minimum wage plan as > "an unwavering commitment, not open to negotiation"—

even by any silly old fool. However, Labour's confusion over the minimum wage is nothing compared with the shambles of its tax plans.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): How dare he?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Lady shouts, "How dare he?" Does the hon. Lady mean, how dared we tell the British people at the time of the election, and was it not outrageous for us to do so?

Before the election, Labour's finely tuned, finely targeted answer to the recession was the biggest increase in taxes on incomes since the war. Since the election, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East, has been unrepentant. He explained:

> "I strongly defend these proposals."

However, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East takes a different view.

Mr. Gordon Brown indicated dissent.

Mr. Lamont: He told a press conference last week:

> "Further tax increases at this time would be a mistake."

So who is right? Is it the leader of the Labour party, or is it the shadow Chancellor? Opposition Members will remember that there is only one way to settle this sort of dispute. They did it before the election and they can do it again: clear the diary; get on the phone; call in the journalists; book a table at Luigi's; and settle down to a bit of spaghetti diplomacy. The fact is that the Labour leader's tax plans have been buried by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East. His shadow Budget, launched in such splendour and media hype, has been quietly, thank God, laid to rest.

However, Labour's problems will not go away that quickly. As usual, the Labour party's response to the outcome of the public spending round defies, as it always does, every known law of arithmetic. On pay, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East believes that we have been too tough and he would like more. I should be surprised if he were to deny that. On capital spending, the hon. Gentleman says that we have not spent enough. Again, he would like more. However, when it comes to borrowing, the hon. Gentleman says that it is too high and should come down. On taxes, he says, "No, not today."

It does not even begin to add up. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East does not know how much he would spend; he does not know how much he would tax; he does not know how much he would borrow. [Interruption.] We are not talking about next year's Budget. We are talking about the situation today and Labour's response to the plans that we have put forward.

When the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East was asked what was wrong with the Government's plans and what he was proposing, he replied:

> "I'm not prepared to put a figure on it."

He is the first shadow Chancellor to have volunteered for permanent purdah. This afternoon, we on this side, and the country, would like some answers. If the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East wants higher public sector pay, where would he get the money from? Would he take it from patient care in the health service? Would he cut spending on schools? Would he axe the Jubilee line? Would he cancel the hospital building programme? That was the pattern followed by previous Labour Governments. These are the questions that the hon. Gentleman must answer when he seeks to make any points about the statement that I have presented to the House.

The autumn statement is about tight control of public spending, protecting capital programmes and encouraging recovery in key sectors. This party alone has the policies and the determination to achieve those goals. British industry now has its best opportunity in years to attack the markets of its competitors and show what it can do. Low inflation and a competitive pound, the lowest interest rates for nearly 15 years, time-limited tax measures, low rates of tax and good industrial relations all give Britain the edge as a place to invest and to do business.

Yes, we have been firm on public sector pay—firm so that we can build roads, so that we can build hospitals, so that more and more of our young people can have the education that they deserve. We have been firm on what we pay ourselves today so that we can build a more prosperous country for tomorrow.

Now is the time for business leaders and managers to make the most of these opportunities to invest, to export and to build for the future. They can do so in the knowledge that behind them are a Government investing record sums in the nation's infrastructure and in the nation's future.

That is why this statement has given an opportunity to every business man and has set the right course for this nation's spending priorities in the years ahead. It has been warmly welcomed across the country, and it deserves the wholehearted support of this House.

4.29 pm

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): I beg to move, to leave out from 'House' to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

'regrets that the Autumn Statement confirms that the recession is continuing and that unemployment and bankruptcies will continue to rise; regrets also that investment which has fallen substantially during the recession will fall again for 1992 and will at best, according to Government forecasts, rise by only one quarter of one per cent. during 1993; deplores the worsening balance of payments and the failure of the Government to recognise the need for a policy for manufacturing and for the regions; demands an emergency employment programme to reduce unemployment and the fear of unemployment and additional investment measures to boost the construction industry and business as a whole; and calls for a long-term industrial and training policy for Britain.'.

When unemployment is approaching 3 million, when long-term unemployment is almost 1 million and when investment is falling, I do not think that the House has heard such a complacent statement from a Chancellor as we have heard this afternoon. If the Chancellor is in any doubt about the problems that British industry faces, will he talk to the Government's own Insolvency Service?

In the autumn statement forecast, the Chancellor assumes a large increase in the budget of the Insolvency Service merely to deal with the problems of business bankruptcies over the next year. Does he agree that the number of bankruptcies—20,000—with which the service dealt two years ago will rise to more than 40,000 in the year to come? Far from redundancies and bankruptcies falling as a result of the autumn statement, they will rise significantly.

Our argument is that last week's autumn statement and the measures that the Chancellor was forced to announce were an admission that his entire previous strategy had failed. He should apologise for three years of recession when measures that he is now being forced to consider were rejected and even ridiculed as unnecessary.

More important, the Chancellor should admit that the policies that he has explained this afternoon do not in any way measure up to the problems that we have at present. Most fundamentally of all—it became clearer and clearer as the Chancellor spoke—the Government still have no long-term industry or economic strategy for rebuilding the industrial base of this country.

The Government are unable to recognise that the fear of unemployment is the biggest barrier to the return of consumer confidence, so they have failed to introduce the employment measures that are urgently needed to bring down unemployment and to reduce the fear of unemployment.

The Government are unable to recognise that a complete policy shift and not just a series of ad hoc, piecemeal measures is necessary for industry. They have, therefore, failed to bring forward the industry strategy that is essential. The result is that the budget for the Department of National Heritage for the preservation of our past will soon surpass the budget of the Department of Trade and Industry for investment in our future. The Government are unable to distinguish between the cosmetic initiatives as a tactic and the real changes that are necessary to make Britain an economic world leader. That is why they have failed to provide a stable, long-term environment for industry.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that his criticisms of Government economic policy would be far more convincing if, last summer, when British industry was being squeezed by excessive interest rates and by an overvalued pound, especially against the dollar, he had joined some Conservative Members in urging the Government to leave the exchange rate mechanism, to float the pound, to reduce interest rates and to have the economic policy that the Chancellor is now putting forward?

Mr. Brown: Who was squeezing British industry? Who was responsible for the rise in interest rates? Who failed by not having an industrial policy for the country? Who was pushing up unemployment? It was none other than the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): Given that situation, why did the hon. Gentleman urge the Government to remain in the ERM up to the very last minute?

Mr. Brown: Our policy was not the devaluation of the pound; it became the policy of the Government. Let us be absolutely clear about what has happened over the past three years. The Government told us that they would stay in the exchange rate mechanism. They promised at the election that they would not devalue. I have the election manifesto in which they said that the exchange rate was the cornerstone of their anti-inflation policy. Who left the ERM and devalued? It was none other than the Chancellor.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Would the hon. Gentleman have left the ERM? If he had, would the pound have been devalued?

Mr. Brown: We have said to the Chancellor that he had the option of realigning within the exchange rate mechanism. The Chancellor has failed to give us a convincing answer. I ask him again today: was realignment discussed within the Government—yes or no? Was he not aware that if the Government had put that proposal to the authorities in Europe it would have had a sympathetic hearing? The answer to that is, of course, yes.

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North-West): The hon. Gentleman has just said, as many of his colleagues have said in the past, that the pound should have been realigned a week or two before 16 September. What should the central value of sterling have been at that time? What should have been the corresponding rate of interest?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman has the audacity to ask me, when the Government have devalued the pound by 15 per cent. The difference between us and the Government is that we believe in a managed exchange rate. The Chancellor cannot even tell us this afternoon whether he believes in a floating or managed exchange rate.

Let us be absolutely clear about the autumn statement. First, unemployment is going to rise and the Chancellor cannot deny that. Secondly, our industrial capacity will continue to shrink. Thirdly, we are bottom of the league in Europe for investment, employment, output and growth. Fourthly, the Chancellor's figures in the autumn statement admit that, even at the depths of the recession, the balance of payments of this country will worsen and import penetration, even as we fail to grow, will mean that foreign producers will benefit from any sales in the shops and more so than British industry.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I will give way only once more.

Mr. Mans: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with his colleague the shadow transport spokesman who said that any silly fool knows that minimum wages result in lost jobs?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman has taken the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) completely out of context. My hon. Friend was defending a minimum wage. He was not opposing it. He was saying that the abolition of wage control in the wages councils is completely unacceptable and would even have been offensive to Winston Churchill who brought them in. It is obscene that Conservative Members continue to tell us that there is no floor below which wages should not fall, while they have been absolutely silent when some executives in British industry have awarded themselves huge pay rises above £10,000 a week—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. While I fully appreciate from the Chair the advantage of interventions in debate, I will never tolerate a deliberate policy on either side of the House of shouting speakers down.

Mr. Brown: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not know whether the interventions are voluntary or as a result of arm twisting on the Conservative Benches. However, I am happy to deal with Conservative Members whether they intervene from a desire to do so on their part or because of prodding from the Whips.

Let us consider the autumn statement. Last Thursday, Conservative Members not only cheered and waved their Order Papers; they stood and congratulated the Chancellor on his autumn statement. I can tell the Chancellor now that they were cheering his admission that the housing market would not recover of itself; that industry would not revive of itself unaided by the Government; and that investment would continue to decline without special measures. They were cheering the admission that simply waiting for free market forces to work was simply not enough.

When the Chancellor introduced the investment incentives that he himself once called phoney, which the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry before the election called vague and misplaced and which the Conservative election briefing called misdirected, and when the Government said that the use of capital receipts that the housing Minister once called fool's gold were acceptable forms of intervention in the marketplace, what we saw from Conservative Members was the belated and enforced admission of the failure of all that they had held most dear—the experiment of the 1980s in a free-for-all economy. That admission should lead them to apologise to the thousands of people who have lost their jobs, their homes and their businesses over three years of recession when the Government were, by their own admission now, pursuing the wrong policy.

Let us remember what happened at the election when the Prime Minister said not that a recovery programme was needed but that all that was needed was a Conservative election victory to bring about recovery. He said:

> "Our re-election will make recovery certain. Don't let anyone tell you that the recovery isn't there for the taking. The return of a Conservative Government is the remaining ingredient to ensure a return to growth."

In a speech called "Thumbs up for Recovery", he said:

> "All Britain is waiting for is the confidence a Conservative victory will bring."

Such phrases show that the election was not so much about the representation of the people as about misrepresentation to the people about Conservative views. At the election, when the Prime Minister was asked about a recovery programme, he said:

> "£1 billion on a recovery programme"—

roughly what the Chancellor is giving in the recovery measures—

> "any economist will tell you that that will make no impact whatsoever."

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I am not giving way.

The Prime Minister said:

> "It is sticking-plaster over the lack of policy. I have never heard such ludicrous nonsense in my life."

Mr. Oppenheim: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I am not giving way.

Last Thursday, we witnessed the final——

Mr. Lamont rose——

Mr. Brown: Every time I give way to the right hon. Gentleman I have to remind him of the promises that he made in his party's manifesto that he was never able to fulfil.

Mr. Lamont: We all know what the hon. Gentleman was promising at the election—it was very large tax increases. If Labour had won the election, presumably the hon. Gentleman would have implemented those tax increases which he now thinks should not have been implemented. What has caused him to change his mind? Why is his view today different from what it was at the election?

Mr. Brown: I thought that it should have been obvious to the Chancellor that the recession has become a slump. British industry is faced with problems that it cannot of itself solve, and that is why the Chancellor has had to introduce a recovery programme.

Last Thursday we witnessed the final recognition of how wrong it was to say that the recession would end of itself and that recovery was inevitable and how wrong it was to assume a spontaneous free market end to the recession. Let us remember what the Chancellor said: he is reminding other people of what they said. In a speech on 27 June, 1990, as the recession began, he said:

> "The real test of Thatcherite economics is only now beginning. The slow-down in prospect will put to the test the new-found flexibility and resilience of the economy and the effectiveness of the labour market reforms. It looks as if we may now be seeing the beginning of a reverse of the long-running trend which has seen the share of manufacturing in GDP fall. I feel that the resurgence that we have seen so far is nothing like the resurgence that we are about to see."

That was the Chancellor speaking just before the recession finally got going. But the problem that the Government face is that, having had to admit that past policies have been wrong, and having had to admit, as they cheered, that the free market solution was insufficient, they have not in any way measured up to the scale of the problems that they themselves have created by their policies.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I am not giving way.

As with the coal crisis, the Government are wrong and have been shown to be wrong. As with the coal crisis, they have modified their policies in the light of being shown to be wrong. But my fear is that, as with the coal crisis, they are doing the right thing belatedly, half-heartedly and with the continuing intention, as soon as circumstances allow, of reverting to their original destructive course of action.

Let us look at the scale of the problems that the Chancellor should have dealt with—the seventh quarter of recession, the longest recession since the 1930s, £30 billion lost output, unemployment rising for many months to come, manufacturing investment down 20 per cent., and business saying that industrial capacity is becoming so small that some people doubt whether in key sectors British industry will be able to benefit from recovery.

What do the Government's proposals achieve? Even if the Chancellor's forecasts were right, having lost 7 per cent. of our industrial output during the recession, he assumes that we can win only 1 per cent. of it back next year. Having lost 20 per cent. of our manufacturing investment, his proposals assume that we will recover none of that over the next year. Investment in our manufacturing future is 20 per cent. lower than when the recession began—no wonder many people are doubting whether the autumn statement in any way measures up to the problems that we face.

If the Government's forecasts are right, we will reach a position by the end of 1993 when national income in recession-hit America will have risen by 4 per cent. since 1990, in Italy by 4 per cent., in Canada by 5 per cent., in Germany by 5 per cent., in Japan by 10 per cent., even in Greece by 8 per cent., and in Spain by 5 per cent., but will have fallen by 2·5 per cent. in Britain. That is the scale of our problems in comparison with other countries.

As everyone knows, the question is whether the test of the sincerity of the Chancellor's conversion from the failure of his previous policies can be seen in the actions that he proposes in the autumn statement. Let us look at what it adds up to in practice. We know that the Jubilee line, which was announced and then re-announced and which was in the election manifesto, has still to secure a starting date. We know also that many of the other projects that the right hon. Gentleman put before us last Thursday have no starting dates at all—for example, the proposals that were going to help us with new public-private partnerships for investment and the east-west crossrail which he mentioned in his autumn statement. Of course, that project was first announced in 1989, but construction cannot begin until 1 April 1996.

The central Scotland fast link that the right hon. Gentleman mentioned on Thursday—again, first announced not by him but several months ago—has an earliest possible starting date of 1996. The Birmingham west orbital road, again announced some time ago, has a first possible starting date of 1996. The channel tunnel rail link, which was announced in October 1989, has a first starting date of 1996. Perhaps the Government plan to help with the next Tory recession—they will make absolutely no difference to the current Tory recession, because not one truly new capital investment programme was announced last week for Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland or the west of England.

It is not so much an autumn statement as an autumn restatement of projects that were previously announced and have been repackaged by the Chancellor. We must take into account the facts that transport expenditure is to be cut by 20 per cent. in real terms by 1996, that, as has been mentioned by a Conservative Member—the Chancellor did not deny it—London Underground financing will be in difficulties over the next few years, and that, whatever people say about the roads programme, the one thing that is absolutely certain is that roads that need urgent repairs will not be repaired. The promise of action is not for now, in the depth of the recession, but for a long time into the future.

Last week, Conservative Members were cheering not action now but the possibility that, at a later date if funds become available, things might be done long into the future—when we needed, in addition to the housing measures that the right hon. Gentleman announced, a home owners' rescue scheme and a direct boost to building houses, when we needed the construction industry to be directly assisted, when we needed the release of capital receipts that had been accumulated by the sales of the past, and not those receipts that local authorities do not even possess in most cases for the future and that are certainly likely to be far lower than the Chancellor's figures. People will see that the measures that the Chancellor announced last week were limited, too little too late, and of course they will not deal with the substantial problems of homelessness.

Let us examine the Government's car industry initiatives. Some people might be excused for feeling a little cynical. The Chancellor looked at the problems facing 3 million unemployed, the financial difficulties of 5 million people on public sector pay who will have a pay cut, and the utter hardship of a quarter of a million people whose homes have been repossessed. He decided that, of all the measures that he proposed, the most generously funded would be the £400 off the price of the average new car. That measure could not bring joy to the unemployed miner or the underpaid home help who will receive an increase of at best £1·50 a week. As a result of the Government's policies, such people cannot even contemplate buying a second hand car, let alone a new car.

Let us examine the abolition of the car tax. I welcome it, but the measure has to be part of a full national recovery programme. The measure will cost the Treasury £750 million. The motor traders predict that, such is the recession in the economy, only 70,000 additional cars will be sold next year as a result of the initiative. That means that the cost to the Treasury of each additional car sold will be £10,500. Yet the average car costs less than £10,000. [Interruption.] It is absolutely right.

As the Chancellor has failed to contemplate additional measures to ensure industrial recovery and make it possible for people to afford to buy cars, it would have been cheaper to give cars away to 70,000 people. [Interruption.] Conservative Members may laugh but if 70,000 additional cars will be sold in the next year as a result of the expenditure of £750 million, it works out at almost £10,500 per car sold. The Chancellor would have been more sensible if he had spent the money on the first hand-out from the national lottery. That would have been a more sensible central element of his recovery programme.

The point that I make illustrates—[Interruption.] Conservative Members claim that they know how to add up, but the fact is that the measure costs £10,500 per car. Such is the false economics of isolated random and assorted measures. If they are not part of a co-ordinated recovery strategy——

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Have you had any request from the Opposition to lay a paper before the House which explains that if 70,000 additional cars are sold, additional moneys will be earned through VAT and——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is a frivolous point of order and the hon. Gentleman knows it.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: No, I shall not give way. I have given way quite enough.

Conservative Members do not seem to understand that if the Chancellor does not introduce a full national recovery programme which includes investment, housing, industry and employment measures, the isolated measures that he takes will be costly and will not yield the benefit that he expects. The main point is that so long as people are afraid of losing their job, and so long as the Chancellor fails to recognise that fact, an isolated gesture will achieve far less than it should. It becomes a huge cost which does not achieve great benefit for the country.

Let us summarise the net effect of the Chancellor's measures. He expects £300 million in additional investment in the next year. He expects investment to rise from slightly less than £71 billion to slightly more than £71 billion. He expects a 0·25 per cent. boost in investment. Let us examine the shortfall since the recession began. Investment has fallen from £80 billion to £71 billion—an 11 per cent. fall.

The best that the Chancellor can hope for as a result of his car tax and other measures in the next few months is that a £9,000 million fall in investment will be made up by only a £300 million increase. In other words, for every £100 in investment lost to the economy during the recession since 1990, only £3 will be put back in the next year. Investment will be a smaller share of the economy at the end of next year than at the beginning. Far from the investment-led recovery which the Chancellor argued that he would bring about, we have the opposite: Britain's share of investment in its economy will fall.

The problem is that, while the Chancellor admitted under pressure that he was wrong to pursue a wholly free market solution in the past few years, through lack of conviction he has failed to apply the remedies that we need. The first element that he should have considered was an industry policy for Britain. Germany, Italy, Japan and France are introducing programmes for manufacturing and technology. France and Italy are using this period to boost their computer and information technology industries. Japan has announced special measures for small businesses, technology and the new generation industries of the future. In Germany special action has been taken for engineering and technology. America is preparing to introduce an industry policy of its own.

Yet here in Britain, the Chancellor is happy to contemplate Britain producing fewer ships than Norway, Denmark or China, fewer cars than Spain, fewer commercial vehicles than South Korea, less steel than Brazil, fewer computers than Taiwan and a quarter of the machine tools that Germany produces. We import some of the most basic consumer goods which we could produce here. Is it right that the Government are prepared to preside over a massive cut in our industrial capacity? Worse than that, the autumn statement figures reveal that the Government propose to cut support for industry, technology, regional aid, small businesses and research and development.

The only budget increase of any significance at the Department of Trade and Industry is for the closure of coal mines. Yet the Government should build an energy policy that will make coal an essential element in our planning for the future.

The second element missing from the Chancellor's autumn statement is vital to the economic future of Britain. It is a long-term strategy for investment in people. We have fewer students at universities and colleges than Taiwan or Korea. The autumn statement admitted that, although there are more qualified people, only the same number of people could expect college places. Is not the net effect of the predictions in the autumn statement that training, which is central to our future, will be cut? The training and enterprise councils will have smaller budgets at a time when they have even greater need.

What does the Government's strategy add up to? We hear nothing now about zero inflation, nothing about the British economic miracle, nothing about the pound replacing the deutschmark as Europe's central currency and nothing about the first green shoots of spring which the Chancellor saw before. The Chancellor now tells us that he discounts forecasts. But for the past two years he has predicted month in month out that we will recover from recession.

What is the basis of the Government's economic strategy now? They have given up the medium-term financial strategy; they have given up shadowing the deutschmark; they have given up membership of the exchange rate mechanism. What does the policy now rest on? The Chancellor told the Treasury Select Committee that the economic policy rested on none of those strategies but simply on the Chancellor's judgment.

We have come through M0, M3 and sterling M3, the medium-term financial strategy and membership of the ERM. Now, after 13 years of experimentation and all the pain of it, we have the answer that economic policy, interest rate considerations and what happens to inflation must rest on the soundness of the Chancellor's judgment. "Lamont puts faith in judgment", as The Daily Telegraph put it on Friday 9 October. The Chancellor said:

> "My aim will be to reach a judgment on inflationary trends."

The Chancellor intends to build an economic strategy on the element which no one can claim is credible with the City or the country—the soundness of the Chancellor's judgment. He will bypass the relative certainties of astrology, reading the tea leaves, palmistry and cutting a pack of cards. The Chancellor's judgment is to be the central element of economic policy in Britain.

I suppose that each day, the Chancellor wakes up and reads the newspapers; he gets into his bath and sings, or not, as the case may be; he looks out of the window and sees, or does not see, the green shoots of spring; he hears, or does not hear, vague stirrings; and then he considers the economic issues of the day and what the judgment should be on inflation and interest rates. Every day is judgment day—the Chancellor's judgment—Norman's wisdom. That is the basis of economic policy—unsound before breakfast, unsound before lunch and unsound before dinner.

This is the Chancellor who told us that there would be no recession, and there was. He told us that there would be a recovery two years ago, six months ago, at the election, and after it. He told us that he would not devalue, and he did. He said that he would not leave the exchange rate mechanism, and he did. He told us that he would give us a new economic strategy, and now we find that it does not add up to much. That is the problem which the economy faces.

Mr. Lamont: Since the hon. Gentleman has talked about adding up, will he tell us precisely where he thinks the funds for all the programmes that he has put forward would come from? He told us that, although the 1988 to 1995 roads programme is to double, it is inadequate. He told us that, although London Underground's investment is to be the highest for 20 years, it is inadequate. He told us that the Department of Trade and Industry budget is inadequate, and that the budget for training is inadequate even though it will increase next year. Can he tell us whether he is proposing to fund his programme by more borrowing, more taxes, or a combination of both?

Mr. Brown: The Chancellor does not understand that the public sector borrowing requirement is rising because of the recession and unemployment. Policies for growth will bring it down—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer!"] I have set out a number of measures that the Chancellor could take. One includes a public dividend on the utilities that have made excess profits, which Conservative Members have defended, throughout the recession.

If the Chancellor could achieve proper growth in the economy, the cost of unemployment would fall and the investment that we would make in the economy would yield the necessary results.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Does the hon. Gentleman think that his projected tax on utilities will increase investment? Does he really believe that?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to have considered the fact that the utilities have huge amounts of cash in the bank which they are not using productively in the economy. He does not seem to realise that during the past three years, when the Government have done little to regulate them, the utilities' profits have exceeded £20,000 million, which is roughly £800 for every family in the country. I shall ask him and his hon. Friends a question: do they believe that the utilities have made excess profits during the past three years? I do not think that anyone is in any doubt that that is what has happened.

My argument is that the country can have little confidence in the economic leadership of men and Ministers whose every prediction has failed and whose every promise has been broken. Having told us that a recovery programme was not necessary for recovery, they now tell us that it is a prerequisite. Having promised year-on-year tax cuts, which is what the Prime Minister did to win the election, they are saying that tax increases can neither be ruled in nor out. Having promised balanced budgets—initially annually, when the Prime Minister was Chancellor of the Exchequer, then over the trade cycle—they have redefined what they mean by a balanced budget. Because of the vast cost of unemployment and recession, they have retreated to the assertion that the best that they can promise is to balance the budget in one or two years of the cycle.

Having told us that a pay policy in the public sector was inflexible and unnecessary—the Prime Minister said that specifically—and would mean recruitment and retention of staff difficulties and make it difficult to offer incentives, the Government now tell us that a pay policy that hits the poorest and weakest hardest is essential for the economy. Having been told that wage norms were unnecessary in a free market, two nights ago—when everyone expected a speech on foreign policy—we are now told that a wages policy is part of the economic policy for the private sector as well. Having promised a classless society, opportunity for all and a nation at ease with itself, the Government, by underfunding the health service, allowing waiting lists to rise and allowing huge increases in poverty, inequality, deprivation and homelessness, have reneged on any promise that opportunity for all was ever possible under such a Government.

What is at stake is not merely the Chancellor's personal fate—that has long since been decided—or the political fate of the Conservative party. What worries me is the economic fate of millions of people who cannot depend on any consistency in economic policy while the Conservative party is in power. How can people spend with confidence or plan ahead? How can people move home? How can businesses invest when they do not know from week to week what Government policy will be and whether they will have the guts to stick with it? That is why it is the Government who have become the obstacle to economic recovery; people do not have any confidence in them.

The Conservative party is fond of comparing everything to what happens in business. Let it be clear that if the senior executives of any company had been responsible for the Government's mistakes; if they had consistently misrepresented the true state of their finances; if they had recklessly entered into promises that they were never able to keep; if they had published a series of false prospectuses and said that they stood wholeheartedly behind them and would not change; if they had lost billions off the reserves in a few days as a result of speculation; if they had presided over the rundown of core manufacturing activities, with more goods having to be imported from abroad; if they had to say that all past statements that they had made were virtually inoperative, as the Government did on 16 September; and if they had been found responsible for errors and misjudgments on the scale that the Government have made them, would there not have been a boardroom coup? Would not those people intimately associated with the company have demanded big changes and resignations? Would not those executives have resigned as the error of their ways had been exposed?

The Government's philosophy seems to be to make excuses and stay. The Government have been forced by events to admit that they have been habitually wrong on a massive scale for a long time. Yet even now they cannot get it right. The Chancellor says that he is going for growth. He should be going now, so that growth can succeed.

Mr. John Biffen (Shropshire, North): I always enjoy the speeches of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). He has all the fervour and moral zeal of the manse, and that was evident this afternoon. I confess that I bring different qualities to the debate—philosophic doubt and general agnosticism.

I am anxious for those who believe that one can handle the components of spending, income, and borrowing as though they were mechanical levers which can produce a predetermined end to the recession. If we look across the western world—in particular, this week, at Germany—we find other economies, with different economic philosophies, thrust into the miserable experiences that we enjoy. In that context, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on the reception that his autumn statement received within the Conservative party—because it was an important component in the restoration of confidence—and in the business community. I hope that the confidence shown can be vindicated.

My enthusiasm centred around the decision which preceded the autumn statement to allow our exchange rate to find a more realistic level. It is now 15 per cent. below its ERM rate. For all those people who talked about a managed devaluation, especially the Opposition Front Bench, were any of them thinking of managing it to the level that has proved to be the economic reality? No. They would have chosen a lesser figure. It could have been managed initially at that level but speculation would have recommenced after a short time. I am delighted that we now have that particular freedom and the consequent lower interest rates. I wish my right hon. Friend well in the pursuit of those policies, because I believe that the more we expose ourselves to underlying and prudent reality in the economy, the more likely we are able to trace our steps back to a happier economic situation.

I must tell my right hon. Friend that that marks the end of those of my words which will come gladly to him. What I say hereafter he may well support in his bosom, but I suspect that he might feel that there are other occasions when they could be said more appropriately. I happen to think, however, that one's job in the House of Commons is to offer good-natured advice and that I will now do.

I shall concentrate my remarks on three matters: borrowing, incomes policy—I prefer to identify it by what can be familiarly understood—and taxation. My right hon. Friend has, understandably, pursued a high level of public spending. I welcome the figures contained in the statement, particularly in terms of the protective areas of state activity such as health, education and social services. Of course, as a consequence, public borrowing is now at substantial levels—£37 billion for the year 1992-93, or 6¼ per cent. of the gross domestic product. I do not dismiss the Financial Times or The Daily Telegraph as the more radical elements of the press and they have calculated that, in the following year, public borrowing could rise to between £44 billion and £45 billion, or between 7 and 7¼ per cent. of GDP.

For those who just have a sense of history, I remind them that the last time that we had a PSBR higher than that was in 1975-76, back in the territory of the International Monetary Fund and Mr. Witteveen. Those hallowed memories inevitably diminish over time and it is just as well that we remind ourselves of them.

The figures for public borrowing are quite formidable and the point must be made—not least in the context that we are all concentrating our minds upon Maastricht—that in article 104C—I put in a detailed reference for the benefit of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary—the borrowing threshold for excessive deficit is triggered at 3 per cent.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor needs no reminding that we provide the shock troops who seek to serve him. The public borrowing figures represent a potential future inflationary timebomb. The recovery may come unexpectedly fast; the truth is that none of us knows about the timing of that recovery. The confident assertions that seem to be the stock-in-trade of economic debate not merely in the House of Commons but outside is extremely depressing. We cannot prudently contemplate borrowing of that magnitude without realising that, even with a modest recovery, there may be great difficulties in funding that borrowing other than in an inflationary fashion. We would then be back on another treadmill, having just escaped from one.

In that context, I should like to consider incomes policy. Given the current level of public borrowing, the Government, quite naturally, wish to minimise their spending and in as painless a way as possible. So a formula has been developed, a crude 1½ per cent. across the board limit on pay increases in the public sector, just for one year.

I am not going to be so hypersensitive as to cavil about the circumstances that persuaded the Chancellor to make that judgment, but other considerations should be put on the scales.

For a long time we have been trying to disaggregate the public sector through the operation of performance pay and a host of other techniques to try to bring about a much more open system of payment. We persuaded ourselves that that was a prime requirement. Let there be no misunderstanding: to go for the flat rate approach will make that objective a good deal more difficult. I suspect, however, that that approach will still persist, which will make the actual implementation of the 1½ per cent. limit more and more partial and will therefore give rise to more and more resentment. I say that not looking into the crystal, but merely reading the book of the 1960s, when we went through all this.

One may start with the hope that the decision is a rather clever wheeze to keep public spending under better control than would otherwise be the case, but it begins to get out of hand. We have already seen how the private sector is being invited to take part in this great exercise. The Prime Minister wheeled out his wayside pulpit and took it down to Mansion house where he gave a little lecture about the 1½ per cent. limit to the private sector. If wealth creation means anything, it means striving. It means rewards for the successful. Those efforts should not merely be disparaged by ministerial rhetoric—for it is no more than that. As for the weekend lectures, the language of senior Government politicians is far too valuable to be squandered on that kind of exercise because it merely devalues their general currency.

Given that I have an anxiety about the level of borrowing and that I do not believe that one can have restraints on the public sector in the form of a 1½ per cent. pay settlement—certainly not beyond one year—which is now being promulgated, it is important to consider the debate in the global sense. I started my speech by referring to what has happened to other countries in the western world. I do not think that President Bush did himself or the United States that much good when he said, "Watch these lips, no more taxes". I do not think that Kohl did himself much good by foreswearing the use of taxation to deal with the unification of Germany and rather to depend heavily on monetary weapons. We have to be prepared to see increases in taxes in the coming Budget as complementary to what is now being elaborated in the Government's spending and borrowing programmes.

I am not for one moment going to suggest what kind of taxes are appropriate, but I believe that it would be better to devise a tax system that bore upon people as they spent rather than as they earned. In that way we will gradually downgrade the impact of so many of the items that are set against tax liability, which has bedevilled a good deal of tax planning and tax management.

I do not believe that the policy to get a measured and I hope successful emergence of Britain from the miseries of the recession can possibly succeed unless all the major elements of policy have some realistic relationship with each other. In that context I believe that taxation has a part to play, and that comes not happily from my lips when I say that it must mean an increase in taxes.

5.18 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) has given the Chancellor much food for thought. I want to draw attention to something that he said at the beginning of his speech, when he referred to the reception that the autumn statement got from those on the Government Back Benches.

That reception was indeed a warm and enthusiastic one, but it seems to have faded a little. However, the point is that the Chancellor should not look to his Back Benchers to assess the value of his policies. The fact that he has a great need to do just that because of recent events, and the fact that those who delivered that reception have, primarily, short-term considerations because of recent events, are bad pointers for economic policy. The pursuit of an economic policy based on judgment will not be assisted if the test of that judgment on the day is how pleased the people sitting behind the Chancellor are. I hope that he will bear that in mind in the future.

First, I wish to enter a complaint that we are having this debate so soon after the autumn statement. Our normal practice has been to give the Treasury Select Committee time to prepare a report and take evidence. The Chancellor and the Chief Secretary have made it their business to come along to the Committee during the short interval, but there has not been enough time for hon. Members to study the contents of the autumn statement, which makes me suspicious that the Government did not want us to have time to consider the details before this debate.

Usually, the statement, together with an avalanche of press releases from Departments, can bear a different interpretation when studied more closely. Even Conservative Governments juggle and emphasise the figures in order to give the impression that they are spending more new money than they really are. It is sometimes surprising that Conservative Governments should want to give that impression. Time to study the detail is necessary.

Time is also needed for the Secretary of State for the Environment's statement on what will happen to local government finance and what the standard spending assessments will be. The Government clearly promised that this year the same mistake would not be made. We were told that the Secretary of State for the Environment would probably make his statement by the end of October, and that we would be able to consider in this debate not only central Government but local government finance. We are being denied that opportunity, because that statement has not yet been made.

When the figures are studied in more detail, they become interesting. For example, the Government seek to argue that they have done well in protecting the overseas aid budget, but the figures are constant for the two years after next year, at £1·9 billion, which implies a real cut of 6 per cent. over those years using the autumn statement's assumptions on inflation—the GDP deflator.

The increase in overseas aid to take place in the coming year is effectively dedicated to aid to eastern Europe. I strongly support helping eastern European democracies and economies to develop, but the Government have always asserted that that would not be done at the expense of aid to developing countries. Therefore, the figures for aid to developing countries turn out to be less rosy than the Government suggest.

[Mr. A. J. Beith]

Transport expenditure had a significant boost in the spending plans that were already in place, but it becomes apparent that there is not really a further increase. The extra money for British Rail next year—£130 million—buys only the new Networker trains promised before the election. The extra £100 million for 1994-95 is only for channel tunnel expenditure.

London Underground is complaining vociferously about the effect of the Government's plans for it, because, although the Jubilee line is in—despite not yet having been finally agreed—modernisation of the Northern line goes out as a consequence. None of the key projects that British Rail has planned, from modernisation of the north-west line to smaller routine maintenance projects or further electrification, finds a place.

The Government have said that they are protecting existing capital expenditure. To that extent, they have been clear about what they have done for most of the time. We argue that additional capital expenditure is needed if this is to be the route to economic recovery. I think that the Government feel that, by protecting capital expenditure, they have assisted the dash for growth, to which the Prime Minister referred in his recent remarks. If it is to be a dash for growth, it will require additional capital spending.

One of the most confusing areas is local authority capital spending.

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): Will the right hon. Gentleman repair the omission by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown)—he would not answer the question put by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor—as it appears that the Liberal Democrats, too, would like to see much more spending in those areas? If the right hon. Gentleman favours more spending on capital projects, would he pay for it by cutting current spending on, say, pensions or would he raise taxes?

Mr. Beith: I shall come to financing before the end of my speech, if the hon. Gentleman will wait that long. I shall not make the same mistake as Labour Members in not saying how they propose to finance their suggestions—or, to be fairer to them, by having a smaller programme of additional expenditure than some of their rhetoric suggests. That would be a fairer criticism, and that is what the Chancellor said.

The Government have chosen to allow local authorities to increase their capital spending on the basis of the sales of capital which they undertake from now on. They have closed off the route of using previous sales of assets for that purpose. Their argument for doing that is that they do not want to reward local authorities that hung on to money and failed to repay debt.

When pressed, as Ministers were before the Treasury Select Committee, to explain how local authorities would achieve those sales in a depressed market, Ministers said that it was all right, because some local authorities had dragged their feet over council house sales. So the authorities that will be able to spend—those that will be rewarded—are those that have dragged their feet over council house sales. I do not see the logic of that. What sense does it make as an incentive?

An even more perverse incentive—to use the Chief Secretary's phrase—is to tell local authorities to go out now and achieve sales of assets, when the market is in its worst possible condition, when the price achievable will be the worst possible, when the effect on the market for everybody else will be as bad as it can be and when they will be unable to start their capital projects until they have achieved those sales. There can be no rapid or early action, because local authorities cannot undertake that capital expenditure until they have carried out the sales.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): Rewarding local authorities is one of the arguments that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary used, but there was a more fundamental one, which the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge. The total of Government borrowing as a proportion of GDP is an important economic factor.

Being committed to Maastricht, the right hon. Gentleman would not wish to see the British economy diverge too far from those criteria. Does he not accept that there is a fundamental difference between releasing past receipts that are currently treated as reducing growth borrowing to get to the net figure of general Government indebtedness, which adds to total borrowing, and allowing the full use of future receipts, which are self-financing? When a local authority sells an asset and receives funds from the private sector, there is no net additional Government borrowing.

Mr. Beith: If the hon. Gentleman is right, capital expenditure by local authorities on a self-financing basis would have been acceptable had the Government allowed it before now, so I do not understand how the hon. Gentleman can advance that argument. The question is simply how much of it we think that the economy can stand. The Government think that the economy can stand £1·8 billion of it over three and a half years, and prefer to see it financed from new asset sales. I doubt whether that figure will be achieved, because local authorities will be unable to achieve those sales, particularly in the earlier part of the period, when it is most necessary for the capital expenditure to take place.

I do not need to dwell on the needs that that capital expenditure could meet in terms of housing, school repairs and other improvements to the stock of things that help the community and industry. There is considerable doubt whether the Government's objective of increasing capital spending by local authorities will be met.

The Chancellor has taken a significant change in direction on fiscal measures. He used to be opposed to fiscal fine tuning and any measures that smacked of that. He has now accepted that changes in car tax and capital allowances, housing market intervention and the spending of capital receipts are desirable, although he found them undesirable earlier in the year.

A number of those measures are welcome, but they do not add up to much. If the Chancellor has accepted the case for fiscal stimulus, why does he not do the job properly, instead of stinting on capital receipts and making no additional funds available? The reflationary impact of his small fiscal package may be more than offset by the deflationary impact of public sector pay curbs.

The right hon. Member for Shropshire, North mentioned incomes policy. It is a confused area. In the public sector, there is to be a 1·5 per cent. ceiling, although that does not mean that no individual will get more than 1·5 per cent.—it would not be possible under the increasingly decentralised mechanism. It is supposed to mean that no Department or major area of activity could achieve more than 1·5 per cent.

What is to happen in the private sector? According to the Prime Minister, the private sector must take note and respond, but the Treasury forecasts for the economy assume higher real personal disposable incomes of about 1·5 per cent., while the public sector is expected to suffer a cut in real incomes. What is the Prime Minister saying to the private sector? Is he saying, "Don't achieve an increase in real disposable incomes or our recovery plans will not work"? That seems to be the Government's dilemma.

If the private sector does not receive a substantial increase in real incomes, the money will not be available in the form of spending power to bring about recovery. It is possible that some of that money, if not paid in wages, might be paid in industrial investment and enter the economy by another route. However, a significant part of that money might well stay in industrial saving—it would not be spent in the short term, the period about which we are most concerned.

Should the private sector listen to the Prime Minister and obey the instruction to model itself on the 1·5 per cent. limit, or ignore it and follow the message contained in the Treasury's forecasts? There is great confusion about the Government's overall objectives.

All those factors seem to add up to the fact that the Chancellor has become an honorary member of the Cambridge Economic Group. We have devaluation, a fiscal boost and an incomes policy—the tripartite policy of the Cambridge group. The Chancellor has bought the lot. He has given a limited fiscal boost; he has introduced an incomes policy in a traditional Conservative way, starting with the public sector and asking the private sector to follow.

Do Conservative Members believe that there will be only one year of incomes policy? What will happen in a year's time, when the Chancellor—whoever he may be by then—has to say to the public sector that it cannot have wage increases of much beyond 1·5 per cent. and to the private sector that it must continue to exercise restraint? We seem to be re-entering a familiar period, which some of us who have been in the House for some time can remember.

The policy marks a significant change of direction, but I do not believe that it is the right one. Some people, including Conservative Members, suggested that the Chancellor had to make a choice—to adopt a cautious policy or to take considerable risks by undertaking additional borrowing to stimulate the economy. They suggested that the Chancellor had a choice between caution and risk, but there is no such choice. There is a choice of two risks. The first is to borrow in order to invest in measures that create employment and help to bring about recovery. The second risk is that there is no recovery and the borrowing requirement goes up and up because of the costs of recession.

The Government did not acquire their present high public sector borrowing requirement through a conscious desire to bring it about, and their objective was not to invest through borrowing. They acquired the high PSBR because of the recession. The borrowing requirement exists to pay for unemployment benefit and social benefits, and replace forgone tax revenue. That pattern will continue if we do not have a recovery.

We believe that the package proposed will be insufficient to bring about recovery. Our alternative would be to give a substantial boost to capital spending, funded by additional borrowing. That would be combined with a sound basis for monetary policy by means of an independent central bank and direct help to business.

We also argue that it might have been more sensible in the current circumstances to help those businesses which would otherwise go to the wall, by providing a cut or holiday in the uniform business rate, rather than introducing a capital allowance scheme that helps only those businesses that expect to pay significant amounts of tax, against which they can use an allowance. Many businesses are not in that position; what they fear is not paying tax, but going bankrupt. That is particularly true of many small businesses.

We would also like to have seen a significant expansion in training, which is quite out of the question under the projections given in the autumn statement figures. Instead of those measures to bring about recovery——

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Beith: No, I shall not give way; I am coming to a conclusion.

The Prime Minister thinks that he has changed his policy in favour of a dash for growth, but the Chancellor thinks that the policy is unchanged, except for the consequences of black Wednesday, which meant a change in interest rate policy. The current method of economic management, which is based entirely on judgment, is in the hands of a Government who have made all the wrong judgments. They have introduced a package which is supposedly dedicated to recovery, but which is insufficient to bring it about.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): I mean to be brief, but I hope that I shall be forgiven if I join my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) in congratulating my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on his autumn statement. I particularly welcome one part of the statement that has not yet been mentioned today: the undertaking given in column 994 of Hansard for 12 November that the Government would bring before the House a resolution to apply to Members' pay the same limits as they intend to apply to the public sector. That will be widely welcomed outside the House and, I hope, supported inside the House.

The problem has a long history, which I do not intend to rehearse today. I believe, and always have believed, that hon. Members should never shuffle off responsibility for fixing their own salaries. It would be an abdication of responsibility to do so. The temptation to do so has not always been resisted in the past, and the way that salaries have been decided has not always been satisfactory.

Therefore, I am pleased to see a return to previous practice, and I hope that it will herald a change in the basic approach to the matter, for which I have always argued and which I hope to see introduced now. Whatever is judged to be the appropriate salary for a Member of Parliament should be fixed by an outgoing Parliament before a general election, so that the incoming Members of Parliament know what their salary is, never have to pass judgment on it, and need not expect it to be increased during the life of that Parliament.

[Mr. Cranley Onslow]

Mr. Salmond: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Onslow: No; I intend to be brief.

I hope that we can move towards such a policy, which is the only sensible and honourable way to tackle that difficult matter.

I can identify two sectors of our society where a change of attitude will be needed if the Chancellor's proposed measures are to work as well as he intends. The first is the banks. I do not think that any banker could deny the charge that banks have made a number of serious mistakes in policy judgment in recent years. They have made lending mistakes on an international and domestic level.

If I am rightly informed, between 1987 and 1989, the remuneration of an average bank manager was fixed on the basis of the amount of money he lent. It was based not on the quality but on the quantity of money that he managed to lend. It is not surprising that many of our fellow citizens in business found themselves encouraged to take on risks that, with better advice, they might have been encouraged to avoid. That was done in the name of market share among the major clearing banks. The consequences of that policy have been extremely unfortunate and regrettable.

I should like to think that we shall now see a change in attitude on the part of the banks—a much more positive, supportive and understanding approach, particularly to small businesses. I am afraid that, to judge from present evidence, that seems unlikely to happen. The press has recently had many stories about small business men being harshly treated by bankers. The House will have great sympathy with small business men, and much less sympathy with the banks.

I have recently been visited by a constituent in connection with this subject—as no doubt have many other hon. Members. My constituent brought to my surgery a letter that he had received from his bank undertaking to grant him a £75,000 overdraft. But the small print of the letter stated that the interest on the overdraft would be 4 per cent. above the bank's base rate, and subject to a minimum rate of 11 per cent. per annum no matter what happened. Not unnaturally, my constituent wrote back and said that the conditions seemed unfair, as they meant that he was unlikely to share in the full advantage of any prospective interest rate cuts. He asked how the bank could justify its policy.

The letter that he received in reply stated:

> "The Bank has taken the view that, in all but the largest lendings, as base rates fall there comes a stage where it is not cost-effective for us to continue to pass on these reductions. The minimum interest rate is the Bank's way of overcoming this."

I am sure that the bank manager who wrote that thought that his head office would approve and may even have thought that he had put himself in line for promotion. However, as a contribution to the revival of the economy it counts for nothing. It does nothing for the confidence of the small business man, and seems to embody much of what is wrong with the banking sector.

I hope that, when the Chancellor next has an opportunity to speak to, whisper in the ear of or shout at the chairmen of our leading banks, he will tell them that a change in attitude on their part is an essential ingredient of economic revival.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the fact that banks can get away with imposing such conditions on their customers at a time of recession, when there is falling demand for loans, poses questions about the degree to which there is a genuinely competitive market in banking? Some 90 per cent. of the corporate lending business in England is in the hands of four lenders. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is prima facie evidence of oligopoly, which should be examined by the competent authorities sooner rather than later?

Mr. Onslow: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. I forecast that, when economic conditions change and borrowers are in a stronger position vis-a-vis their current enslavement, there will be a fundamental change in the structure and composition of the banking system. Some of the principal banks may be displaced by incomers who will adopt a different approach and to whom would-be lenders will be almost irresistibly drawn. That will not be good for the banks.

The second change of attitude that the country and the Chancellor needs if his policies are fully to work must be made by the media. It is a long time since I suggested in the House that the "Today" programme was totally dedicated to getting the nation out of bed on the wrong side, and since then I have not noticed much change. However, it would be unfair to single out that programme, because the tendency is widespread. Shortly after the autumn statement, a "PM" programme thought it worth carrying a report from someone sent to the nearest high street to ask whether the autumn statement had led to any sign of a spending spree, as if that was an informed judgment and a fair test of the Chancellor's measures.

The concept that the effect of economic policy can be judged only by its impact on retail sales is fairly over-simplistic. However, it would be unfair to single out the BBC for criticism. To correct the balance, I need to look back only to last Sunday and quote the extraordinary episode on Brian Walden's programme.

The Secretary of State for Transport had been invited to be interviewed by Mr. Walden about the autumn statement, with particular reference to its impact on the Department's spending plans, which, of course, is a relevant matter. My right hon. Friend had been warned that in passing he might be asked one or two questions about other topical subjects such as Maastricht. But once in front of the camera, my right hon. Friend found himself subjected to an increasingly hysterical tirade by Mr. Walden because he refused to answer questions about Matrix Churchill, a matter totally outside my right hon. Friend's area of responsibility and totally outside the area upon which he had been led to expect he would be invited to answer questions. That is a thoroughly irresponsible way to conduct a current affairs programme.

It would still be unfair to imply that only radio or television are exclusively preoccupied with dishing out daily doses of doom and gloom. Any newspaper on any day will show that, generally, reporting is as negative as possible. The cumulative effect on the nation's morale cannot be ignored—and I am speaking about the effect not on the Government's standing but on national morale. Perhaps too many current affairs programmes and too many newspapers and journalists are competing for sensational news in the progress of a circulation war. The media leaders should ask themselves how they expect confidence in Britain, at home or abroad, to revive when they ceaselessly accentuate the negative.

The positive elements in the autumn statement have been well listed in the CBI's reaction, part of which has been quoted. I shall rehearse them briefly. There is to be a significant increase in the transport network, not just in the construction of the Jubilee line but nationally in road building. That is right.

The change in the treatment of capital receipts is especially welcome. Unlike the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), I do not think that it should be impossible for local authorities to meet the Chancellor's target, especially if they look not only at house property but at industrial estates. Many councils should long ago have left the business of investing in such estates, and should have realised those assets and applied the money to more constructive uses.

The reduction in interest rates is welcomed by everyone, and the treatment of capital allowances and the stimulus to housing have been sought by many people, who will be glad to see those measures.

I must make one qualification. Although it is important to stimulate the housing market and to rescue many of my constituents from the negative equity trap, it cannot be sensible to try to drive house prices back to the peak of the late 1980s. That would make no sense and do no good. It would benefit estate agents, but eventually it would force up the price of development land, which is an artificially restricted commodity. Such an increase has no lasting value for any economy.

I hope that the Chancellor will bear that in mind, and that he will constantly seek to shift the emphasis on saving and wealth accumulation towards investment in productive industry and commerce and the creation of real national wealth.

I welcome the autumn statement. The country has welcomed it, and I hope that the House will also do so.

5.47 pm

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): I agree with the right hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) that Members of Parliament should be responsible about their salaries. However, I am worried that some hon. Members are more equal than others and by the failure to consider remuneration from outside sources that is so prevalent among Conservative Members.

The autumn statement has been coloured by black Wednesday and our withdrawal from the exchange rate mechanism. Our problems have been exacerbated by the increasing depth of the recession. As unemployment approaches 3 million, the need to put people back to work is being increasingly recognised. The cost of state benefit for 3 million people must be enormous. It is like a tap left running—a complete waste.

To meet this situation, all that we had at first was a smokescreen, with all manner of horrors being suggested—increases in national insurance contributions, savage cuts in social security benefits and tax increases, all this amidst the worst recession in the past 60 years. None of these horrors materialised. What we got was a crackdown on the pay of public sector workers, many of them poor and needy. The policy will mean that a hospital domestic will get only £1·80 a week extra and a staff nurse only £2·38. There is not much justice there when we think of the many thousands awarded to the chairmen of public companies, particularly those of the former public utilities—water, gas, electricity and British Telecom—and the cool half a million or so that is going to the chairman of British Airways. As for the chairmen of supermarket chains, they seem to have a licence to print their own money.

We have been told that the economy is suffering from a lack of effective demand. People are just not buying houses, cars, washing machines and so on. That is a classic Keynesian situation. The wages of the lowly paid public sector workers are to be restrained, yet they tend to spend what they earn, for their income is stretched to the limit. To restrict their wages could have the effect of further depressing the economy. Therefore, not only is it morally wrong to knock poor people in this way but it does not make economic sense.

The Chancellor has succeeded in keeping Government spending within the £244·5 billion ceiling fixed in advance, but only just. However, the PSBR has risen for the current year to £37 billion and is likely to be £44 billion next year. Conservative spokesmen had said that such figures spelt the horror that was likely to ensue if Britain elected a Labour Government in the spring of this year. Some of us are accustomed to such hypocrisy on the part of the Conservative Government.

The 1 per cent. cut in interest rates—a policy that has long been advocated by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), the Leader of the Opposition, and my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), the shadow Chancellor—is welcome. It will benefit home owners and generally help to restore confidence. However, there is only limited help for the construction industry. Capital receipts accruing to local authorities from now until the end of 1993 can be spent over the next three years. If the Government really wanted to assist the construction industry, improve the quality of housing and increase the amount of affordable housing, they would have unlocked the £5·1 billion in accumulated receipts and directed it to a housing investment programme. Such a decision would have been a major factor in providing urgently needed housing as well as in creating jobs, since the benefit of a boost to the construction industry would be that it would put back to work not only unskilled workers and tradesmen but highly trained architects.

The Chancellor also ended car tax—a move that I warmly welcome. The construction industry and the motor industry could be the engine of our economic recovery. I have long been an unashamed supporter of the motor industry. Personal transport has been a great boon to ordinary families. Apart from the immediate facility, for them the car has opened up new horizons. It is used to travel to work, and more and more housewives take the car to the supermarket when they purchase the week's necessities. I appreciate that there are the problems of congestion and pollution, but these are issues that must be, and are being, tackled.

Another aspect of the industry is that, unfortunately, slightly over half of new cars coming on to British roads are assembled overseas. For at least a quarter of a century, the Volkswagens, the Mercedes and the BMWs from Germany, together with the Renaults from France and the

[Mr. Roy Hughes]

Fiats from Italy, have had a field day in the British market. Despite all the EC regulations, I want the Government to use their ingenuity to boost our car industry.

British cars are now first class. If we increase their share of the market, we shall ease our balance of trade problems and put our people back to work. The growth of the motor components industry has been heartening news. Wales relies heavily upon it, with companies such as Ford engines at Bridgend, Lucas Girling at Cwmbran and many other major firms. From a Welsh point of view, stimulus of the car industry will assist our steel industry, which is suffering badly from the effects of the recession.

Having said that, I should also say to my many friends in the motor industry that they should beware of a Shetlander bearing gifts. The Chancellor has already said that the £750 million lost through the decision to end car tax is to be recouped in the Budget through an increase in other forms of motor taxation. Yet the fact is that, of the £19 billion collected annually in motor tax, just over 20 per cent. is spent on roads. The Government are said to be seriously considering putting tolls on motorways. Wales already has tolls, on the short stretch of the M4 that runs over the Severn bridge. From 1 January, any heavy vehicle bringing vital goods and supplies into south Wales on the M4 will pay a toll of £9·30.

Any outside observer would imagine that Wales had an overheated economy. In fact, we have heavy unemployment. There is terrible deprivation in some areas, particularly in those badly affected by pit closures and steel redundancies. These tolls are a disgrace. What is more, the Government had no business to hand over the Severn bridge, together with construction of the second Severn crossing, to a French-American backed consortium, which is determined to extract the last penny. Tolls are an anachronism and for the Government even to be considering them on other motorways is the height of folly.

The matter does not end there. Some weeks ago, on 12 October, I challenged the Secretaries of State for Transport and for Wales to deny reports that the contract for the steel structure of the second Severn crossing was to be handed over to a foreign company. In reply, both said that the contract had not yet been awarded.

That answer was evasive, to say the least. A report on page 11 of yesterday's Financial Times clearly revealed that the £7 million contract is to be awarded to Cimolai—an Italian company that allegedly entered the lowest tender. I bet my bottom dollar that there is a hidden subsidy involved in that Italian tender. Britain has an efficient steel industry, and right by the Severn crossing is a company named Fairfield Mabey, which specialises in the construction of the steel works required for new bridges. A host of expertise in that type of work is available among the people of Severnside, but many there are out of work.

The President of the Board of Trade should keep his promise to the Conservative party conference to intervene before breakfast, before lunch, before tea, and before dinner on behalf of British industry. There is an urgent need for that, and I call on the right hon. Gentleman to act without further delay.

The Chancellor has taken a few short steps in the right direction, but there is a sleight of hand in it. One commentator remarked that the autumn statement is stimulus by magic mirrors. It anticipates and embodies a growth rate of 1 per cent., yet to make any impact on unemployment Britain needs growth of at least 2·5 per cent. The autumn statement deserves to be judged in the way I suggest.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that Madam Speaker has imposed a limit of 10 minutes on speeches made between now and 8 o'clock.

6.1 pm

Sir Rhodes Boyson (Brent, North): I welcome the autumn statement, as other of my right hon. and hon. Friends have done, and was intrigued by the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen)—particularly in respect of incomes policy. As to the salaries of Members of Parliament, I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow).

I am only sorry that the autumn statement was not made two months ago, on the day that Britain left the exchange rate mechanism. We seem to have wasted two months finding a distinctive alternative policy. I have no belief in the ERM, which is something like GCSE economics grade seven. Schoolchildren run three-legged races, but the ERM was a 12-legged race, and all the runners fell down. It has been said that it is easier to foretell the winner of the Derby in the year 2000 than to know the value of a country's currency next year, because it is a judgment by the rest of the world as to the economy behind it.

I am glad that Britain has left the ERM, and that we now have a policy of moving towards lower interest rates. Again, it would have been better to take that action earlier and in larger dollops. That would have helped the housing market and those who pay mortgages—many of whose businesses are dependent on their properties. It would also have helped business men and encouraged people to borrow more.

Interest rates will have to fall still lower before we move out of the recession. When we left the gold standard in 1931, interest rates fell to almost a negative level before growth occurred again. No growth came between 1925 and 1931, because the pound was over-valued on the 1914 gold standard parity. With low interest rates between 1931 and 1937, Britain enjoyed the fastest economic growth of any power in the world—far ahead of America and even of Germany. In 1939, we had the economy to be able to stand up to Germany, and low interest rates are the only way of achieving growth again.

I welcome the emphasis on the construction industry and particularly on the Jubilee line investment, which will create employment for 12,000 people. Without it, the whole of docklands would have become a ghost town and a depressed area. The sooner that the Jubilee line is built, the better. However, I share the concern expressed by London Transport's chairman about lack of investment in the capital's other tube lines. My right hon. Friend the Minister should travel on the Northern line early in the morning and late at night to appreciate the agony that commuters suffer.

A number of lines run through my constituency, and they are used by those who commute to the City. Regular delays and breakdowns mean that travellers must leave home 15 or 30 minutes earlier in the morning—and can never tell when they will arrive home. That has created the sandwich society, because the wife has no chance of knowing when to have a hot meal ready for her husband's return.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Sir Rhodes Boyson: No, because I am under the ten-minute speech rule.

I have lived in London since 1962 and have represented a London constituency since 1974, and I believe that if it is to remain a major capital city, three important factors must be considered. One is transport. We are living still on the capital investment of the Victorians and Edwardians. Present investment is nothing compared with that which must be made to give the capital a proper transport system.

The second is London's theatres, and the third is its museums. I am sorry that cuts have been made there, because our capital has some of the best museums in the world. We must keep them up to standard, because many tourists come to London not just for its theatres but for its museums. They certainly do not come here for the tube travel.

I am suspicious and alarmed at the prospect of spending three quarters of a billion pounds on acquiring 20,000 repossessed houses. It would be better to help people to remain in the homes that they have. Why wait until home owners have lost their houses, local schooling, churches, and neighbours and then hand them over to a housing association? If that is not something out of "Alice in Wonderland" I do not know what is. Money available should be used to help people pay their mortgages, particularly at a time when the interest rates are being reduced so that they can remain in their homes.

I await the result of the council tax in London and the south east. If it costs no more per household than the community charge, I and my constituents will be happy. If it costs more, I shall not be happy—any more than my constituents. We are threatened again with a rates system from Labour, but householders will compare the council tax with the community charge that they have paid for the last three years. Anything new must be comparable.

Mr. David Evans (Welwyn Hatfield): The council tax will not, on average, be more than the community charge.

Sir Rhodes Boyson: My hon. Friend puts his head on the block, but obviously he has specialist knowledge that will make headlines in tomorrow's newspapers. I know that he is a very wealthy man, so if my council tax is more, he can make it up. I welcome his gesture. It is one of the finest gestures that I have known for some time.

As to defence, I am increasingly concerned about this country's safety and that of the world. We will look back at the balance of power between the NATO countries and the communist bloc as the most peaceful of our lifetimes. All the wars that are being fought around the world today will escalate and threaten us. I do not want any more cuts in this country's defence, for two reasons. First, I want the safety of this island of ours to be preserved; secondly, I think that the organisation of the armed services is one of the things that we still do well.

We are good at training. I would like to see a lot of short-service commissions, along with training for other ranks before they move into civilian life. I mentioned the underground earlier. I think that a general should be put in charge of tube trains: he could be told that he will be made a lord if he makes them run in a year, and that if he does not his head will be chopped off. That, I think, would be a very effective sanction. [Interruption.] Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) would prefer to offer alternative financial incentives—if, that is, any money is left after my constituency receives the subsidies due to it.

I welcome the autumn statement, because it seems that we have a policy at last. I am sorry that it came rather late, but I am glad that we have it. I hope that interest rates will be reduced further, and quickly, so that we can get the country going; I do not think that any other course will help. I also think that the construction industry is the key to recovery. It is not a question just of the extension of the Jubilee line; something must be done about the rest of London's tube network. We should provide incentives where we can.

Having said that, let me add that I am much happier than I was before I heard the autumn statement—although I hope that I shall be even happier on the day when the council tax is announced.

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington): The autumn statement will probably go down in history as a missed opportunity. To Opposition Members, it seemed a very eclectic statement: it managed to steal a little from the CBI, a little from the House-Builders Federation and even a little from the Labour party. We were presented with a veritable pot-pourri of initiatives and ideas. Given the Government from whom the statement emanated, however, it still managed to come out reeking of free market failure; after all, a pot-pourri of initiatives does not add up to a strategy for growth.

It has been said that there is no strategy behind the autumn statement. There is a strategy; the problem is that it is concerned more with digging the Chancellor and the Government out of a hole than with rebuilding the British economy. It is precisely because the autumn statement was so geared to the short term, rather than to the long-term, deep-rooted crisis into which the economy has been plunged, that it will ultimately fail to return either long-term prosperity or growth to the country.

In many respects, the autumn statement constitutes an admission—an admission that many of the economic icons that Conservative Members have worshipped so long and with such affection have been destroyed. Whatever happened, for example, to the hostile attitude to borrowing? The public sector borrowing requirement is now set to spiral not to £40 billion but to £60 billion by 1994-95, and it may be even higher if we fail to achieve growth of 2·5 per cent. per annum.

The autumn statement is hardly confidence-inspiring in itself. It promises growth of just 1 per cent. next year; that hardly suggests that the Treasury believes its own claims about the statement's potential. It also fails to answer the question that the whole country is asking: when will unemployment stop rising? That is not an incidental issue. Without a reduction in unemployment, there will be no return of consumer confidence. The Henley Centre for Forecasting recently announced that some 6 million households were failing to spend because they feared that an increase in joblessness would affect them directly.

[Mr. Alan Milburn]

I am afraid that the increase in unemployment will not abate, because the Government have not done enough to make a real difference. Over the past two weeks, two major engineering firms in my constituency—Torringtons, and Darlington and Stockton Rolling Mills—have announced that 80 skilled workers are to be made redundant. Perhaps equally worrying is the fact that the redundancy announcements were accompanied by dire warnings that there would be no recovery in the market for the foreseeable future. The measures in the autumn statement will not hasten the recovery of first-class companies like those, because they fail to acknowledge the depth of the problem and do not tackle the three performance gaps that currently hinder the British economy: the gaps in manufacturing investment, training and support for the regions.

The temporary capital allowance incentive scheme for industry is all very well, but a sum of between £200 million and £300 million is hardly likely to close the investment gap between the United Kingdom and its competitors. Our industries are having to struggle for international markets with competitors that possess much better and more up-to-date plant and equipment. Between 1980 and 1989, this country spent less than £2,000 a year per employee on manufacturing investment; Germany spent nearly £3,000 a year, and Japan more than £5,000. That is not a temporary problem, and temporary solutions simply are not good enough.

The CBI's report "Making it in Britain" calls for a doubling of investment in plant and machinery by the end of the decade to enable United Kingdom companies to compete more effectively in the international market. The Government have ducked their responsibility to encourage industry to invest and to provide the necessary incentives.

The same applies to the Government's attitude to the United Kingdom's training deficit. It is universally acknowledged that the United Kingdom has the worst-trained work force in Europe: we have fewer workers with occupational skills than any other European country. Yet—as hon. Members will see when they read the fine detail in the autumn statement—our training budget is to be cut in real terms. Already this year, 500,000 fewer employment training places are being made available; the ET budget has been cut by £30 million, and almost half our training and enterprise councils are worse off in this financial year than they were in the last.

In regional terms, my region is the biggest loser. The north has lost £21 million. My TEC, Durham, has been cut by nearly £6 million. It would be an understatement to suggest that it is economically illiterate to cut training programmes in the region that has the highest unemployment in mainland Britain: in my view, that is plain daft.

Not only do we have a Chancellor and a Prime Minister who have destroyed more than 1 million jobs since getting theirs; they have cut the funds for those who are desperately trying to return to work. By cutting training budgets still further, the Chancellor is not only writing off the unemployed in the north, but weakening the whole country's competitive position.

The autumn statement as a whole spells further decline for the regions. The industry budget is to be cut by almost half between now and the middle of the decade—and, if the experience of the last 13 years is anything to go by, we are in for severe problems. Since 1979, the budget for assistance to industry in the regions has fallen by 70 per cent., and in my region it has fallen by 85 per cent. That amounts to a massive withdrawal of funds. Many hon. Members whose seats are currently part of the assisted areas map fear that the cuts in the industry budget will bring about a loss of assisted areas status, a loss of new investment and a loss of new job potential in our towns and cities.

It is not as though areas such as Darlington—or, indeed, the north-east as a whole—do not have a potential for growth, but I fear that, without assisted area status, companies intending to invest in the north-east will begin to look elsewhere for the establishment of their new factories. This is not just special pleading for the north; it makes good economic sense for the Government to invest in all the manufacturing regions. As we saw in the middle of the last decade, free market regional policies inevitably mean overheating in one part of the country, usually the south, followed by an icy recession across the whole country.

Returning to the spending on the regions that we saw in the early 1980s would be relatively negligible in European terms. Indeed, it would cost the equivalent of one and a half extra lanes on the M25. Many Members from northern constituencies welcome the commitment to the Jubilee line, but we are concerned about the potential impact on our regions of cuts in the transport budget. There is great concern that those cuts will be felt most deeply in regions whose position on the periphery of the single European market should cry out for more, not less, investment in infrastructure.

The autumn statement is a missed opportunity to put Britain in Europe's fast lane. Instead, free market dogma has been set aside temporarily on a few high-profile projects, presumably until the Government think that their current troubles are over. Then it will be back to business as usual. There will be no partnership with industry, no attempt to tackle our training and regional deficits, and, worst of all, no ambition to help British industry succeed. It is a cost which the Government are happy to bear.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) drew comfort from the statement from the Henley Centre for Forecasting. His comments might have been more valuable if he had not picked that body, whose forecasts in the past have been even less reliable than those of the Treasury.

In the 10 minutes available to me, I wish to concentrate on a small section of the autumn statement—its effects on the property market. In the autumn statement, which I sincerely welcome, my right hon. Friend underlined the point that the housing market remains depressed. It is not just the housing market that is depressed, but the commercial and industrial property market as well. The measures which my right hon. Friend has taken, which will affect the whole property market, are therefore doubly welcome.

The extent to which property values underpin so much of our economic and social activity is a peculiarity of the British economic system. A strong housing market is the only key to mobility of industry and labour. A strong property market generally underpins the whole banking system, and by and large British banking cannot lead without reliable property values. The property market as a whole is the basis for the confidence which will be needed to enable the autumn statement to provide the take-off for growth which we all hope and believe will result from it.

In the context of the housing market, many of us who represent stressed inner or outer-city estates will know of the problems caused by what are now seen as the over-expectations of property values in the late 1980s, and the reaction from them.

I have only to go to Southmead in my constituency to see the boarded-up houses that are the result of people buying not from the council but from those who had bought from the council at what seemed proper values at the time, and who had found that, with declining income, perhaps because of unemployment or cyclical adjustments, they could no longer afford their mortgages. However, their properties were unsaleable. Even if they had sold, they would never have been able to buy another property because of the negative equity that they would thereby have realised.

In that context, I underline my gratitude to the Government for having recently altered the rules on negative equity so that that trap no longer applies. Therefore, people who still desperately want to own their own homes, since that is their preferred form of housing, will no longer be locked out of the market because of one mistake.

I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to one other aspect of the housing market. We hope that the reduction in interest rates will help to revive the housing market, but he could do something else. Over the years, there has been much discussion in the House of the value of MIRAS, the system of tax relief on mortgages. Opinion on both sides of the House is divided on MIRAS, but I believe in it. It is not reasonable to expect a revival in the housing market over the next few years, even to the extent of price stability, if the MIRAS system remains under threat.

While I would not ask my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General to recommend to the Chancellor any statement about the long-term future of MIRAS, I should like to hear that, at least in the short term, there will be no downward adjustment in its value. If such an adjustment were still feared, it would act as a negative factor in the housing market. In replying to the debate, I hope that my right hon. Friend will underline the need to retain MIRAS for the foreseeable future.

The commercial property market is equally a key to future prosperity, and will also benefit substantially from the reduction in interest rates that the autumn statement brought. As I said, commercial and industrial property is a key to banking, to the ability of new business to start and to the ability of existing business to expand. Therefore, we must be as careful to underpin property values in the commercial and industrial sector as we are in the housing sector.

One great barrier to a revival in business confidence is the fact that it is almost impossible to put a value on much commercial property. What my right hon. Friend has done will go some way to overcome that, but other supply side measures could have an equal effect on the commercial property market.

Many of us have seen the effects in our constituencies when someone in business who assigned a lease of, say, 25 years many years later finds the original landlord knocking on his door because all subsequent tenants have defaulted. That cannot encourage people to sign leases to start in business or to expand their businesses. My right hon. Friend should encourage his noble Friend the Lord Chancellor to re-examine that aspect of the law to see what can be done at least to limit the liability of an assignor.

A further aspect of commercial leases which acts as a barrier to the person who is starting or expanding a business is the ratchet effect on rent renewals when the renewal can only be upwards. There has grown up within the banking sector a belief that the only suitable security for a leasehold property is a lease with a guaranteed increase in rent. The result is that, where rents have got too high—for example, in a shopping centre—the only way in which that shopping centre can be revived is through the bankruptcy of every tenant, so that leases can be torn up and they can start again.

That may be a slight exaggeration; occasionally, despite the terms of the lease, downward rent reviews are agreed, because that is the only available alternative. The fact is that the barriers to downward rent reviews, where the circumstances in a particular property market have changed, are too great, and must be relieved. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer can help in this relief by making sure, through discussions with the Bank of England, that the banks and insurance markets —which will lend, as security, only on commercial leases with an upward-only rent review—are encouraged to reconsider their attitude to leasehold property so that they themselves do not act as a barrier to a truly mobile market in commercial property.

I have focused on one aspect in what I believe was a major autumn statement. When he summed it up, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that its purpose was to make the markets work better. I believe that he will succeed, but a number of supply side measures can still be taken that will aid my right hon. Friend in making the markets work better and creating the recovery and growth that this country needs.

6.30 pm

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): The hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) will forgive me if I do not follow the line of argument that he pursued in his thoughtful speech. Instead, I shall concentrate on other matters that concern me and the people of Northern Ireland.

In a most vigorous speech, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) attacked, among other things, the speech that the Chancellor of the Exchequer made in June or July of 1990 about the situation that prevailed in our country at that time—especially the economic life of the nation. I noticed that the Chancellor smiled. I wonder whether he, like me, recalled that, at that time in 1990, this nation had not entered the exchange rate mechanism, and that we did not do so until considerably later in the year.

In his autumn statement, the Chancellor of the Exchequer told the nation that our membership of the exchange rate mechanism was wrong. Admittedly, he did not say so in so many words, but that was what he implied. He suggested that, when we were in the ERM, monetary policy was tighter than it needed to be, and that now, with a floating pound, he has been able to cut interest rates by 3 per cent.—interest rates now being set according to British monetary conditions. The implication was that, when we were in the ERM, interest rates were set according to monetary conditions that prevailed elsewhere.

Another speaker in the debate inaccurately described the day we left the exchange rate mechanism as black Wednesday. I do not consider it to have been at all black: I think of it as the day when the chains that bound our nation were cut. I welcome the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is now free to act in the interests of the United Kingdom, and I sincerely hope that we stay in that happy position.

When he made his autumn statement, the Chancellor confirmed that the public sector borrowing requirement had increased by a third from his forecast in March of this year. Given that the sum is £37 billion for this year and that it is to rise next year to a figure that the Chancellor dared not forecast, the question that I asked last year—whether the Government had abandoned the concept of the balanced budget—was one with which I did not care to embarrass the Treasury Bench last Thursday.

However, that question will keep coming back, because the level of the PSBR does matter, as the Chancellor admitted when expressing his concern about the sums that he now has to find for interest payments. I understand that that sum is about £18 billion or £19 billion a year. I feel fairly sure that, if the Chancellor had that sum to play around with now, he would be a very happy individual.

The real concern is that the £37 billion that has been borrowed is being used not for capital expenditure but for current expenditure. The Chancellor said in his statement that social security benefits—which is another term for unemployment—were the cause of much of the increase in the PSBR. However, in answer to a question from me, the Chancellor said that the PSBR had increased because of falling tax revenues—another way of saying that it was because of unemployment.

The Chancellor then told us that he expected the PSBR to decline over time. I noticed that he was careful to say that it would decline as a percentage of gross domestic product, not of the total sum. He is therefore clearly not thinking of the situation in which we found ourselves a year or two ago, when we were able to repay debt. The PSBR sum can decline only if employment prospects improve quickly, or if the Chancellor increases taxes.

On this occasion, the Chancellor was kind enough to forgo the revenue he could have gained by raising national insurance contributions, or taxes and other fees, but the reality is that he has only postponed that action. I believe that he will be unable to avoid tax increases over a fairly wide base next March if he hopes to get the PSBR back under firm control. He will have to keep firmly in mind the fact that, with a £37 billion deficit, the debt total for the nation will soon be over 50 per cent. of gross domestic product. Neither the Chancellor nor any other hon. Member would welcome that.

In the present economic climate, the Chancellor has tried to ring-fence capital projects in order to provide employment. Many projects in every part of the United Kingdom are waiting for the go-ahead. I shall mention but two, one of which I consider to be absolutely vital to the long-term infrastructure and welfare of Northern Ireland—the upgrading of the Belfast-Larne road. The other is in my constituency—the Limavady bypass. Those are small matters for the House as a whole, but I hope that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will bear them in mind whenever he is considering what he can do under the Government's changed expenditure plans.

The help that has been offered for housing, in one form or another, is of more value than road building. Most road building is done with machinery and very few people. The construction of all sorts of buildings leads to the employment of large numbers of people. Anything that increases the number of folk employed in the construction industry is to be welcomed. The problem, however, is that many of the fixtures and fittings for houses now have to be imported; they are no longer produced here.

Another aspect of the construction industry in Northern Ireland concerns the rebuilding that has to take place after terrorist violence. Coleraine, the principal town in my constituency, has a heck of a lot of that to do after last Friday night. I am pleased that London was spared that day the attention of the bombers. We are grateful to the security forces for having managed to intercept those people before they were able to commit their evil deeds. My town was not quite so fortunate.

The Government clearly accept that there is a need to build confidence in the nation and in the community at large in order to move us forward out of the recession. The Paymaster General will appreciate that the same inspiration and confidence is needed by an individual who has suffered as a result of terrorist action.

If the Government bear that in mind, greater help will be provided for businesses in Northern Ireland that suffer as a result of terrorist violence. The cost of security and the cost of restoration after bomb damage is high in terms of the public purse, but the alternative, if we think about it logically, leads to anarchy. No one wants that.

The Government motion asks us to approve the autumn statement. We are asked to welcome the control of public expenditure, which is a doubtful claim, but hopefully there will be better news next March. The motion also asks us to congratulate the Government on the reduction in underlying inflation, congratulations that we sincerely offer. We are being asked to thank the Government for their attempts to get us back on to the path of duty, which has been somewhat neglected in the past few years.

The Opposition amendment, on the other hand, regrets that the harsh truth was told by the Government in the autumn statement, but they do not spell out their alternative in any detail. Therefore, I regret having to tell the Opposition that, since they have not been more positive, we cannot support their amendment.

Mr. David Martin (Portsmouth, South): Having listened to speeches by Opposition Members—the speech by the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) was an exception—it is clear why more than 14 million people did not put their trust in the Opposition in the general election. The Opposition have plans to go on and on spending without having any proper way in which to pay for it.

Serious as our position is, we are not in the kind of crisis that previous Labour Governments, with or without Liberal support, failed to tackle. In present circumstances, with their present leadership and with their present policies, Labour would fail again.

I have no doubt that the first priority in my right hon. Friend's mind in fashioning the autumn statement was the correctly identified need to build up confidence in our economic future as rapidly as possible. Some have criticised my right hon. Friend for not starting that task earlier. I have some sympathy for my right hon. Friend. He is like a man who inherited a house that was fully furnished by two predecessors in title whom he had understudied for some years. The last piece added was membership of the exchange rate mechanism. From then on, the contents were treated like heirlooms, to be preserved in their inherited condition. That was the position until the vandals rudely and abruptly broke in on so-called "black Wednesday" and the defences against them were raised in vain. When the vandals left, much was in disarray.

Many around the Chancellor were at first like Rachel weeping for her children and would not be comforted. It was rumoured that my right hon. Friend was not joining in the weeping. He was, no doubt, recollecting the wise words of the great Lord Salisbury that one of the commonest errors in politics is sticking to the carcases of dead policies.

A month later, the Prime Minister raised before our eyes the high road to recovery and growth—the British way. The energy and imagination with which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, ably helped by the Treasury team, have set about furthering that policy are clear from his proposals and from the politically skilful way in which he presented them to the House last Thursday. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor will need all that skill—I wish him luck in his task—in fashioning part two, which is the Budget next March in which he will set out more detailed measures by means of which the large existing and even larger projected Budget deficit for future years is credibly to be financed.

If we are to get out of the recession with sustainable real growth, low inflation, low interest rates and the creation of the jobs required, I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend will need the spirit of 1981 and of the noble Lord Howe rather than the ghost of the late Lord Keynes. Public borrowing as a proportion of national income must be reduced. If we choose to support high levels of public spending and growth—we hope for growth which may or may not pay for such public spending in the future—we must support the taxation and other measures necessary to fund them. That was the essence of the spirit of 1981. There was then no belief——

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Look where that got us.

Mr. Martin: I shall explain in a moment where it got us. There was then no belief in greatly increased public sector spending being the vehicle of growth, in pay norms and in pay freezes. We were too close to the memory of the Opposition's failures in the 1960s and 1970s, including the damaging industrial unrest, the bottling up of inflationary pressures, and the feeling that every pay claim was decided in Downing street and that every breach of the norm was a victory against Downing street. We have spent many successful years putting a distance between ourselves and those notions.

In 1981—here I come to where it got us—in the teeth, famously, of 364 economists and others who said that it was all impossible, the noble Lord Howe courageously laid the foundations for six years of sustained growth, low inflation, falling unemployment, record numbers of jobs and ever increasing prosperity. My right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) reminded us about the 1930s. Those six years were the longest such period for 50 years—since the 1930s. That was Conservative government at its best. There was a genuine break from the failures and the retreats of the past in the teeth of misguided calls to change gear. It was also electorally rather popular.

By 1988, we had public sector debt repayments, not a public sector borrowing requirement. What happened from 1988 onwards was not the result of economic policy faults related to those earlier years. I confess that I rather hanker after those times. I have not yet been sufficiently educated or politically corrected. These days, in my rather melancholy moments, I feel like the poet Thomas Moore who said:

> "I feel like one
> Who treads alone
> Some banquet-hall deserted,
> Whose lights are fled,
> Whose garlands dead,
> And all but he departed!"

I felt that today until I heard the speeches by my right hon. Friends the Members for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) and for Brent, North. They are lurking somewhere in the corners of that banqueting hall.

We must all look ahead. Under my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, we have the lowest interest rates since 1978. We have an obviously competitive pound, we have low tax rates and we have special incentives for investment. Those are firm foundations, one hopes. With the necessary Budget measures next March, we have a chance to enjoy in the 1990s the economic confidence, the rising prosperity, and the hope that we enjoyed in the mid-1980s. In bringing about that happy series of events, my right hon. Friend will have my support, 242 majority and all.

6.45 pm

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): In the speeches so far, apart, perhaps, from that of the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Martin)—who seemed to find little wrong in the economy, although his perceptions and his departure from actualité may be influenced by the fact that he was previously a Parliamentary Private Secretary to Mr. Alan Clark—a clear recognition is emerging that the biggest barrier to economic recovery is the lack of confidence in the economy, and that the biggest barrier to confidence is the length, extent and nature of unemployment in our country.

That is why I say that jobs, jobs and jobs should have been at the heart of the autumn statement. That should have been the overwhelming impact and effect of the Chancellor's measures. It is in the Chancellor's failure to tackle the need to create jobs directly, swiftly and where they are needed that the statement's failure lies.

In his speech today, the Chancellor seemed to recognise the logic of what I am saying. He said that confidence was the key to unlocking recovery, and that confidence was the essential condition for increased spending in the economy. The problem is that, while wishing the ends and desiring to see confidence grow, the Chancellor is, tragically, apparently not prepared to take the necessary action to lift that confidence and to ensure that recovery comes quickly.

A serious absence from the statement and the one thing that would immediately give a tremendous boost to economic recovery by reducing the fear of unemployment, lifting confidence quickly in our economy and making such a difference to millions of people and families blighted by unemployment throughout the country would be the introduction of a new Government programme of work to tackle mass unemployment—a programme to allow people who are unemployed once again to work in their communities.

As everyone recognises, the recession is now so deep that the private sector, it must be manifestly clear to all hon. Members, cannot by itself, whatever action it wants to take and however much it wants to resume growth and to bring forward investment, overcome the fear of unemployment. Nor will the capital projects the Chancellor has announced, which will not start early enough or be extensive enough to help to overcome that fear of unemployment.

Those measures cannot by themselves stimulate the employment necessary to build confidence in the economy quickly enough to promote growth in the way we all want. That is why I argue that it is so crucial for the Government to step in to aid recovery by introducing measures to take people off the dole queues and put them to work. I believe that that need has never been greater at any time in recent memory.

We now have the highest male unemployment since the 1930s. Many people believe that the real level of unemployment is closer to 4 million than to 3 million. In my region—the northern region—31,000 more people have joined the ranks of the unemployed since the Chancellor took office. The number of people out of work for more than a year—the long-term unemployed—rose by 50,000 in the three months to October.

There is now a four-and-a-half year high in the number of long-term unemployed, at 956,000. The Secretary of State for Employment recently described that figure as the smallest for a year. I cannot understand how she can describe it in that way. Long-term unemployment has risen 46 per cent. over the figure a year ago. More than half the people out of work in my constituency have been jobless for six months. Very many of them have been unemployed for more than a year.

It is not surprising—although it is certainly very revealing—that the autumn statement made no forecast of unemployment next year. We know from every authoritative estimate that growth of more than 2·5 per cent. next year will be required to have any impact on the level of unemployment. However, even the Government's own forecasts hope for a growth rate next year of 1 per cent. On the Government's own admission, therefore, growth will be too weak next year to bring down unemployment, which Goldman Sachs predicts will swell by hundreds of thousands of people, thus raising fear of unemployment even more. That is why I believe that Britain needs an immediate employment programme.

The paltry crumbs offered by the Department of Employment over the past week were tragically inadequate. The initiative was pitiful. According to a press statement from the Secretary of State for Employment, her contribution to fighting unemployment consists of the formation of something called jobplan workshops and the merging of employment action and employment training.

The best the Government can do as bankruptcies rise, firms collapse and more and more people are made redundant is to merge two already inadequate small programmes and set up jobplan workshops, which are the old restart scheme rechristened and made compulsory. People will be hauled into jobcentres and asked what they are doing to search for non-existent jobs.

The only difference between jobplan workshops and restart is that, instead of one and a half hours of frustration explaining why one cannot find a job, the new scheme requires people to spend four and a half days explaining, and if they do not last the four-and-a-half-day course, their benefit is docked.

The Government's approach is shamefully simple and inadequate: less training, more coercion and no separate jobs programme for the unemployed. There are merely exercises in public relations, when we really need a programme of public action. I do not decry the efforts of local jobcentre staff, who are doing the best they can. However, they are being asked by the Government to put more effort into the management of publicity than into the organisation of work for the unemployed. That is a tragedy.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Has the hon. Gentleman visited his jobcentre?

Mr. Mandelson: Yes; I have visited it twice.

The tragedy is not that we are short of experience of setting up the kind of jobs programme we require. The recent community programme had its critics, and I was certainly among them. However, at its best, it combined a chance to work, train and search for a job. I believe that the community programme could have been developed and improved, and turned into a proper programme for the unemployed.

Work that would be rewarding for individuals on such a programme would also be immensely useful to the community. It is work that needs to be done. For example, in the environment it could involve clearing and making up derelict sites so that they can be put to practical use. In relation to energy, so much loft insulation and conversion work is required——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. The rule is inflexible. I call the hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell).

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): I very much welcome the change of economic and financial policy since 16 September in respect of which the autumn statement is a very useful further step forward. I welcomed it on the day.

I do not share the view of the shadow Chancellor and other Opposition Members who have spoken today that it is sad that we have moved away from the dogma of an obsession with sterling M3, medium-term financial strategy, shadowing the deutschmark, being obsessed with a public sector borrowing requirement figure which had been set years before in different circumstances and which cannot be changed and changing over to the traditional policy of the Chancellor's judgment. If the Chancellor does not have good judgment, then the Chancellor should be changed—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am not suggesting that he should be; I am simply making a general observation.

We are sent to this House to bring our judgments to bear. That is what we are here to do. We are not a tribe of American red indians who set up a totem pole and believe that it will solve our economic problems for us. Factors such as the PSBR and monetary aggregates are all tremendously important, as are the parities with other major currencies, and they must all be taken into account at all times by the Chancellor. However, it is a great mistake—and one that we have made repeatedly in the past—to set up one of those as a particular yardstick.

When Mr. Charles Goodhart was at the Bank of England, he quite rightly pointed out in what has now become known as Goodhart's law that as soon as one sets up a particular yardstick, it ceases to do the job for which it was invented. Our new approach of using all the yardsticks but allowing the Chancellor, the Cabinet and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to use their judgment is much more likely to produce good results. I argued that point of view throughout the early 1980s when an entirely different view was held.

One of the prime objectives, quite rightly, in the autumn statement is to increase investment. There has been under-investment in Britain for a century. Joseph Chamberlain complained bitterly about it in the first decade of the century and he pointed out the much higher rate of investment in industry in Japan, Germany and the United States. One could read out passages of his speeches made in 1903 and 1904 and they would be absolutely apt today. Nothing has really been done about it for a century and it is about time that we put it right.

In that context, I want to refer to inward investment from Japan about which a great deal of absolute nonsense has been talked. I have had more than 30 years' experience of business with the Japanese in one way or another and I am an international adviser to three huge Japanese companies which trade world wide and have a lot of investment in Britain. I should like to explain what I think is the truth about inward investment from Japan.

Some people have suggested that the debate about Maastricht and the uncertainty about the attitude of the House of Commons to the Maastricht treaty will damage inward investment from Japan which has been immensely valuable to Britain in recent years and has accounted for 40 per cent. of all Japanese investment in the European Community. It is true that, this year, there has been a decline in Japanese investment in Britain, but that has nothing to do with Maastricht—or only marginally, anyhow—and there are two reasons for that decline. One is that Japan is going through the same recession that the rest of the industrial world is experiencing and its banking system is pulling in its loans, and the Japanese are more reluctant to invest anywhere overseas in the present conditions.

The other reason is that the Japanese anticipated that Britain would have to leave the ERM and devalue. One did not need to be clever to know that. On 16 July, the day before we adjourned for the summer recess, I told a member of the Whips Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman), that we would almost certainly have to leave the ERM and either devalue or float in the week before the French referendum. Everyone who takes any interest in such matters, except members of the Treasury, was aware that that was almost bound to happen. Of course great Japanese companies are not going to invest huge sums in a currency that is about to be devalued. Incidentally, as a result of devaluation, they have made a substantial short-term book loss on the investments that they have already made. Those are the reasons for the slow-down in their investment.

The Japanese want access to the single European market. They understand that Maastricht has nothing to do with that. Maastricht adds all sorts of things about a federal Europe, about a single currency, which they do not want, because it would reduce their room for manoeuvre and bring about European monetary union and a federal Europe, all of which they regard as a threat to Japanese interests. No shrewd Japanese industrialist wants to see anything like a close-knit, centralised, federal Europe. Japanese industrialists want access to the huge market, and that is guaranteed to them through Britain's existing treaty arrangements. The fact that we have signed the Rome treaty and the fact that we have signed the Single European Act gives us access to the free market. For a variety of other reasons, not least that we are the European country which is closest in sympathy to the United States, which is the Japanese prime market, they prefer to invest in Britain and they will continue to do so. It is ludicrous for some people to pretend that, if we do not endorse the Maastricht treaty, the Japanese will change their policy because of fear of a fortress Europe being set up.

One hears scare stories that Germany, France, Holland and one or two other countries might tear up the Rome treaty and the Single European Act and start a new fortress Europe of their own with high exterior tariffs from which Britain would be excluded and that, therefore, the Japanese might transfer their investment to France and Germany. That is not going to happen. For one thing, if a group of European countries attempted to do that, they would immediately provoke a total and permanent breakdown of the GATT arrangements and violent tariff reprisals by the United States and Japan against them. That is not going to happen. Our access to the single European market, whatever happens to Maastricht, is guaranteed, and the Japanese know that.

Many Ministers and people such as the chairman of the stock exchange, who wrote an absurd letter to The Times last week on this subject, should know better than to use arguments which are absolute nonsense and which no top Japanese industrialist believes for a moment. I promise the House that that is the case. I hope that we will hear no more of that line of argument.

The Japanese are most scared that Europe will become involved in a tariff war with the United States as a result of the breakdown of GATT. They have a much bigger trading interest in the United States and wider diplomatic and defence interests there than they have in Europe. They are extremely concerned about the present negotiations between the European Commission and the United States over GATT and fear that they may be caught in them. The worse the relations between the Commission and the United States become on GATT the more strongly the Japanese will feel that Britain is the best clearing house for their European investments.

The European economy is extremely important to us because of our large exports to Europe. I have always favoured the closest possible economic and trading relations with Europe. I voted for the Macmillan 1961 application. I have voted all the way through for the pro-European ticket, including the Single European Act, because I believe in the best possible trading relations with an enlarged Europe. I voted against Maastricht recently because it is adding quite——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

7.5 pm

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): The autumn statement has failed abjectly to measure up to the scale of the crisis for which the Government have been responsible over the past 13 years or so. They have created a candy-floss economy from which we are suffering.

In supporting that statement, I need rely on no more than the Chancellor's own words. In an answer to me on 6 November, he pointed out that consumer expenditure between 1979 and 1991 rose by 37·5 per cent. and that, by comparison, output rose by 23·6 per cent.; that output excluding North sea oil production rose by 21·8 per cent.; and that manufacturing output rose by 5·8 per cent. All those figures are at constant prices. In other words, consumer expenditure rose by almost double manufacturing output excluding North sea oil production, and consumer expenditure rose almost seven times as much as manufacturing output.

The Chancellor is grappling with massive forces which are beyond his control, or which he has decided not to control because he does not want to adopt policies that can help him to do so. His behaviour is not like that of a maiden aunt who has had a few too many glasses of Pimm's and has become rather merry but is like that of a roaring drunk, staggering from binge to binge via ever longer hangovers.

One needs to look no further than the statement of a leading industrialist, Mr. Neil Johnson, the director general of the Engineering Employers Federation, to The Guardian of 28 October:

> "All the Government does is throw up its hands and say 'it's nothing to do with us Guv'. The Government does not understand the crisis and ministers quote statistics that are demonstrably not correct."

That statement was not by a left-wing Labour Back-Bench Member but by a leading engineering industrialist.

Another past leading industrialist is John Harvey-Jones, the former chairman of ICI. On 1 November, he wrote in the Observer that the Government are > "destroying our industrial base, to the level where it cannot sustain our standard of living."

That is another reason why the Chancellor's autumn statement does not measure up to the scale of the crisis into which the British economy has been plunged.

We should look, for example, at the catastrophic balance of payments. To use the autumn statement's own figures, there is a £12 billion deficit in the current financial year, rising to £15·5 billion next financial year. In all probability, if there is an upturn, the balance of payments gap will worsen.

Kevin Gardner of S.G. Warburg, the merchant bankers, said recently that, for the first time ever in Britain's industrial history, we are dogged by a combination of rising import penetration at a time of falling domestic output. That has never happened before. For example, in the second quarter of 1992, manufacturing output fell by 1·4 per cent. but manufacturing imports rose by 8·3 per cent. The Chancellor seems impervious to the depth of the crisis for which he is responsible and with which we are now all grappling.

The Chancellor's answer to my intervention earlier today did not measure up to the figures in the autumn statement. It is interesting that The Sunday Times reported at the weekend that senior Treasury and Downing street sources were saying that the Government would have to increase taxes in order to keep the PSBR below the 7 per cent. limit which they say they will not allow it to exceed in the coming financial year. The tax increases may be in the form of VAT, national insurance contributions or excise duties increases. Without such increases, the figures contained in the autumn statement and the projections for the next financial year simply do not add up.

The figures do not add up in another respect. The Government predict that unemployment will remain at about 2·8 million. Most independent forecasters suggest that 3·5 million is much more likely. The Chancellor must come clean on that. If unemployment rises to 3·5 million, that will play havoc with the Government's finances.

Although the autumn statement showed that Government borrowing was set to hit £37 billion—much greater than forecast this year—and rise to £45 billion in 1993-94, many City economists expect the PSBR to go much higher—to £50 billion or even higher. For example, according to Goldman Sachs, the state of the public finances will depend on the economy's growth rate, and an output growth rate next year of 2·5 per cent.

> "would be just sufficient to stabilise the level of unemployment at just under 3·5 million".

Yet the Government predict unemployment of 2·8 million. Goldman Sachs says that the PSBR, excluding privatisation proceeds, will be left stuck at about £60 billion to £65 billion. That is a deficit of about 9 per cent.

Michael Saunders of Salomon Brothers says that the slow economic recovery in prospect means that borrowing could rise well above the Treasury's figures. He predicts a PSBR of more than £50 billion, or 8 per cent. of GDP, for next year, rising to £65 billion, or 9·5 per cent. of GDP, by 1995-96. He concludes correctly that > "Higher taxes or spending cuts appear inevitable".

So the future is gloomy, and the Government are not coming clean about their own figures, let alone the position in the real economy. If the economy grew at only 1·5 per cent. a year in the three years covered by the autumn statement, unemployment would almost certainly rise, even on the figures in the autumn statement. Public borrowing would probably balloon to more than £80 billion by the end of this Parliament. Those are disturbing figures.

A PSBR of more than 9 per cent., or even as high as 13 per cent., compares poorly with the 3 per cent. PSBR specified in the convergence conditions specified for monetary union under Maastricht. The British economy is way out of line with the projections for monetary integration under Maastricht.

What are the prospects of recovery under the Government's policies? As it is being set in train by the autumn statement, and as it has been developed in the past three years, the British economy is unsustainable, given both the inherent industrial weakness of our economic base and other constraints on the current account deficit. The deficit will explode if there is even the modest upturn projected by the Chancellor.

Then the economy will be locked into the same old rising balance of payments deficit and higher interest rates to claw back our deteriorating trade condition. That is another reason why it is almost inevitable that taxes will be increased next year in one way or another, if the Government's policies are followed.

Another constraint which makes the Government's policies unsustainable is the limit on public sector pay increases to 1·5 per cent. next year. The Government's figures in the autumn statement assume that public sector pay increases will be pegged to about 3 per cent. in the following two years. The Government also predict that average earnings will increase by 5 per cent. a year. That will create a massive gap of almost 10 per cent. between private and public sector earnings. That will be impossible to sustain, and will cause extra pressures and problems.

The alternative, which the Chancellor has not addressed and the Government are either unable or unwilling to address, is an entirely different strategy, which would kick-start the economy and demand by means of investment led by the public sector. At least £10 billion is required even to begin to meet the scale of the problem. We need investment in jobs, infrastructure and training and a much stronger regional policy. In Wales, regional preferential assistance has been cut by 60 per cent. since 1979.

We also need an economic policy which begins to grapple with the fundamental financial problems.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but I have to turn off the tap of the hon. Gentleman's eloquence.

7.15 pm

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), because I, too, wish to make some remarks about borrowing. I understood from his speech that he was critical of the Government for their level of borrowing. Yet the shadow Chancellor gave the impression this afternoon that he would borrow much more. He would certainly have to borrow more if he spent the sums that he suggested.

The autumn statement is a brave statement. It is a Budget more than a statement. I am delighted that the Budget will be incorporated with the autumn statement next year so that we can deal with it at a better time of the year. The autumn statement is an extensive package to stimulate the economy and help to bring us out of recession. However, we have always had to rely on the economies of other countries to help us with that process. The United States has normally led the rest of the world out of recessions.

On this occasion we need to examine the international scene carefully. The summary of the world economy in the autumn statement begins:

"Recovery in the world economy has stalled again."

It is salutary to consider the state of economies other than that of the United States. The United States economy is improving. I do not denigrate that improvement. However, it is not improving with surety. We must also consider economies in Europe and other parts of the world. They are in a recession almost as bad or even worse than our recession.

The crucial factor is our ability to sell goods and services abroad, attract an inward flow of foreign currency to both the City and elsewhere and bring tourists to Britain with their foreign currency and spending power. I prefer to call the tourist industry the visitor services industry. The word tourism gives the impression of people milling around on holiday, but it covers a range of other activities in which I am particularly interested.

In order to attract tourists we must market the product. We have an extraordinarily good product. I welcome the spend on the heritage. Our heritage is one of our great attributes in attracting people to Britain. We must do a full marketing exercise. My hint of regret about the autumn statement is that the tourism budget will be held fractionally below this year's budget and is scheduled to fall in the following two years. Some £46 million will be spent next year.

We must have the methods necessary to market our largest industry. We need the money to ensure that our advertising overseas receives full treatment. It is a case of selling our goods and services.

The statement is a budget for industry because it helps industry in a variety of ways, some of which I particularly welcome. Lower interest rates help industry and everyone else. Lower inflation also helps industry. The 40 per cent. first year capital allowance for investment in plant and machinery is an excellent idea. I want the Government to expand the stimulus for industry to modernise.

The science budget is to be increased slightly. Nothing is more important than developing our science and technology—improving our basic and strategic research in science, engineering and the social sciences. In the coming year that budget will be about £1·170 billion, which is a modest rise.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lindsey, East (Sir P. Tapsell) referred to his connections with Japan. We can lift many examples from the Japanese economy. I should like us to follow the example set by their Government, which works with industry to pioneer research into the next generation of technology, for instance, of robotics and of certain types of machinery. Their industry has had Government assistance in the form of low-interest loans spread over many years. There could be such a partnership here to define which industries should be developed and expanded.

In this country there are many examples of phenomenal expertise, which is dissipated because industries do not have the means to develop innovations, or the experience and research which are endemic in many of our institutions. That is where the Government can have an interplay with that sector and could develop our industry so that we improve our performance in world markets. We must do so, and we must concentrate on manufacturing.

I said that tourism, which is our largest industry, is important, but we can only spend money if we sell goods and services abroad. It is important to put the greatest emphasis on manufacturing.

The statement tells us that the borrowing requirement for the present year has risen by £11 billion to £37 billion —the original estimate was £26 billion. In 1993-94, it will rise to about £44 billion. If we estimate a borrowing requirement of £31 billion for the year 1994-95, we will have spent about £110 billion to try to buy ourselves out of recession. The autumn statement is brave because that is a heck of a lot of money to borrow. To sustain such borrowing, we must achieve performance levels commensurate with the incentives given.

Industry has a lot going for it and we must engender its confidence. Our industry can tackle markets abroad, especially in Europe. I believe passionately in, and want us to be in the forefront of, Europe. With the lower value of the pound, lower interest rates and the proximity of Europe, a vast market exists there for so many of our products. I have this advice for our industrialists, "For goodness' sake, get moving, get over there, travel, go to exhibitions and exhibit your products. For heaven's sake, do not sit on your backsides and moan about the recession." They will pull their companies out of recession by going abroad, and that could give them the lead in some sectors of world markets.

I have always had a simple approach to economics. I am not an economist and have never pretended to be one. I have a simple formula—the "what if" formula. We must consider what would happen if the German economy went into crisis and the exchange rate mechanism had to be put in abeyance because of the devaluation of the mark and the franc. I do not wish that on anyone. I believe in the ERM, I want it to work and I want Britain to get back into it. It is the way forward. However, it is always important to ask the question: what if?

What would happen if the improvement in the United States economy failed? What if our manufacturers do not match up to our expectations that they will achieve the growth to get us out of recession? What if we have to raise interest rates to protect the recovery? Heaven knows that that is the one thing that we do not want to do. What if our privatisation proceeds do not match up to the anticipated targets?

That all sounds pessimistic, but we must take into account the scenarios that I have described, because the world is unstable and full of uncertainties. The collapse of the Soviet Union and the colossal changes in eastern Europe, where economies are struggling to get on to their feet, coupled with America's huge debts, have created an international problem which we cannot escape.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) said, we could be sitting on an inflation bomb and I echo what was said by the previous speaker——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Austin Mitchell.

7.26 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Like the Chancellor, the autumn statement is clever, but pretty limited. It does not restore the damage done by the Government to the economy during the past three years of massive deflation, but merely stops the damage from getting worse. That is all that the Government have done —they are trying to alleviate their self-administered damage.

The Prime Minister told us at the Mansion house that the Government meant what they said about manufacturing—presumably, just as they meant what they said about the exchange rate mechanism and no devaluation. With this Prime Minister, one must not look at what he does, but at how he says it. Unfortunately, although he says that the Government mean what they say about manufacturing, that cannot be true, judging from the figures in the autumn statement.

Manufacturing output was down by 4·5 per cent. last year, is down by 1 per cent. this year, and is forecast to increase by only 1 per cent. next year. However, at the same time the volume of imports—most of which will be manufactures—is forecast to rise by 7 per cent. As the volume of exports is also forecast to rise by 7 per cent. —just over 30 per cent. of which will be manufactures—it follows that all of the 1 per cent. increase in production will go into exports. There will be a fall in the proportion of demand on the domestic market supplied by British manufacturing.

On those figures, we shall sell less on the domestic market and import penetration will increase, and that is the essence of our problem. Unlike every other economy, we have not increased manufacturing production from 1973 levels. There has been a huge expansion in demand since then, but it has been supplied not by British manufacturing industry but by imports, which have quintupled during that time. That quintupling of imports —based largely on the fact that our export prices and terms of trade are 36 per cent. worse than they were in the early 1970s—was essentially due to the price mechanism, because imports were cheaper, and it has been the cause of the destruction of jobs in our economy. Since the early 1970s, we have lost 3·5 million manufacturing jobs—a greater decimation than that in any other competing economy. Since we joined the ERM, 600,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost, and so the decimation has continued. We cannot get that ground back, or widen and deepen the manufacturing base, unless we win back those markets and redress the competitive terms against imports. Those terms have gone badly wrong since the early 1970s. It is because of them that the import share of our domestic market, according to the most recent published figures of 1989, stands at 37 per cent.—double the proportion in Germany and France. Obviously, that import penetration is so bad that the Government stopped publishing the figures, because we have had none since 1989.

Imports also constitute a third of our exports; that proportion has trebled over the past 20 years. Two cars exported today make a smaller contribution to our balance of payments than did one car exported in 1970. That is the heart of our problem, but the autumn statement has done nothing to tackle it.

We must change expectations and that means that we must opt for a far greater devaluation than the current one. In fact, we have not really had a devaluation. Everyone talks about it, but we have had only a 14 per cent. change in the nominal rate, which does not take us back to the real exchange rate of 1986. We have still not returned to the level of competitiveness achieved then. We have simply cut off the peaks in the overvaluation caused by the Government's interest rate policy of the late 1980s and hardened by the terms of our ERM entry. We have not returned to a competitive exchange rate, but unless we do, we cannot regain our lost jobs and markets. It is much more difficult to win markets back once they are lost. The exchange rate needs to fall by a further 10 to 20 per cent. before we can win back the lost ground.

Since we need expansion and the autumn statement does not offer us very much, we must ask from where that expansion can come. Demand is deficient, so there is nothing else to do but expand that demand. One man's spending is another man's income. If we follow the good old Keynesian principle that dictates that when demand is deficient, one must expand it, we must expand demand and channel it to domestic production.

With so many people in debt traps, house prices still likely to fall and incomes restrained by deliberate Government policy, expansion will not be created by consumer demand. It will not be created by Keynesian stimulus, because that is not provided for in the autumn statement. I would spend much more on public works projects than on housing and when asked where that money would come from, I would answer with the question, "Why fund the debt?" Why are we not monetising the debt? Why not get ways and means advances for the Treasury from the Bank of England, as happened in war time, and expand demand that way?

We should remember that the banks enormously expanded the money supply and credit supply in the 1980s, but that they are now contracting those supplies. Why should the banks be able to damage the economy in that way when we could remedy the deficiency, and expand demand and the money supply by using public credit, the credit power of the state? Why should we not monetise the debt? The use of public credit would be simple compensation for the damage caused by the banks now that they have contracted the money supply.

Any expansion in demand certainly will not come from exports, given that the overseas markets are so depressed and that the rate of devaluation still has some way to go. Expansion can come only from import substitution. We must replace imports, which have taken such a large share of our market, with domestic production. That is the easiest, quickest and most effective way in which to expand the economy. To do that we must use the price mechanism, which means that the terms of trade for domestic production must be redressed in its favour and against exports. We must use the price mechanism, through greater devaluation, to make imports dearer.

It is no use the Government thinking that they can get away with just a marginal increase in import prices. After the 1967 devaluation those prices went up by 16 per cent. and they must rise substantially now. The fact that Volkswagen and Ford have increased their prices by only 2 per cent. shows that we have not yet achieved that substantial, necessary increase in the price of imports to make domestic production competitive enough to change expectations.

We must channel investment into that domestic production and we must keep it there. To attract investment, industry—capitalism—needs the prospect of profit. Therefore, we must have a competitive exchange rate and that competitiveness must be sustained for a long time so that expectations change and generate investment. In that way production will increase, which is necessary if we are to enlarge our industrial base. We cannot consume unless we produce. It is the production failure, which has continued for years but which was heightened by the Government's policies in the 1980s, that has caused all our problems.

We need a far greater devaluation than we have had and interest rates must be brought down to zero in real terms to bring the pound to a competitive level. In that way we can change expectations, stimulate investment and generate that into domestic production. In that way we can displace the imports that account for such a large share of our market. We are faced with huge problems, but the autumn statement does nothing to solve them; it simply repairs some of the damage that the Government themselves have done to the economy in the past three years through excessive, stupid, unnecessary and damaging deflation. The Government have sought to make good their own deficiencies, not to provide for the future of our economy.

We are at a turning point. Unless we begin to expand our industrial base we shall shrink into a declining, peripheral economy, increasingly dependent upon Europe. It is only by going ahead with a more competitive exchange rate and expansion of the economy that we can rebuild that economy and fight back.

Mrs. Judith Chaplin (Newbury): I welcome the Chancellor's autumn statement and I particularly welcome his proposals to introduce private sector funding into the public sector. We all know from our constituencies of construction projects that should be completed. We all know of the unfortunate spare capacity in the building industry and of the many unemployed building workers. It is essential that those two factors are brought together. The Opposition bring them together by suggesting a great increase in public spending on capital projects. Those of us who are worried by the scale of public spending and by the size of the PSBR welcome the attempts to increase private sector investment for public sector projects.

The proposals in the autumn statement represent the third attempt by Treasury Ministers to overthrow the famous Ryrie rules. They were formulated in 1981 following concern that nationalised industries were unable to attract private investment. Those rules effectively always put the private sector at a competitive disadvantage because it could never borrow money more cheaply than the public sector.

In 1988 there was an attempt to revise the Ryrie rules to take into account the fact that there were no longer quite so many nationalised industries and the introduction of various new forms of private sector involvement. Unfortunately, the 1988 revision retained two fundamental principles of those rules. First, that private sector finance could be introduced only where it offered gains in cost effectiveness. Secondly, privately financed projects for public sector programmes had to be taken into account in the total Government spending on public sector programmes. Once again those principles effectively deterred private sector construction companies from investing in public sector projects.

In 1989 the then Chief Secretary of the Treasury, now the Prime Minister, announced in a speech to the Institute of Directors in Glasgow that he was "retiring" the Ryrie rules. He said that he would not seek, on a scheme-by-scheme basis, to offset privately-financed projects. In other words, he allowed additionality. Shortly afterwards that policy was set out in the Green Paper, "New Roads by New Means". The Treasury officials fought back as always because it was almost immediately pointed out that the Government would take account of the total provision even though they would no longer take account of each scheme. The Ryrie rules, which had been revised and then retired, had certainly not lain down and died.

I very much welcome the Chancellor's third attempt and hope that it will succeed this time. I urge Treasury Ministers not to be deflected again from getting private sector money into public sector projects. I welcome my right hon. Friend the Chancellor saying that any privately financed project that can be operated profitably will be allowed to proceed. I also welcome the Government's active encouragement of joint ventures.

In his autumn statement, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor mentioned such schemes as the east-west crossing and the Birmingham orbital road, but I hope that schemes will not be confined to large transport schemes. For example, my constituency of Newbury needs a community hospital. Why cannot that be built by the private sector and then used by both the public and private sectors? Why cannot school facilities, such as sports and catering facilities, or badly needed nursery facilities, be provided privately and then used jointly? Why do we not allow grant-maintained schools to borrow against their assets to fund projects needed to improve the schools? I hope that small as well as large schemes will be allowed to go ahead.

I hope that every Government Department will now be encouraged to consider how the private sector can be involved in improving the whole of the country's infrastructure. I particularly hope that Ministers will ensure that the Treasury does not obstruct that happening. They should see how the whole process can be speeded up and the cost of tendering reduced so that many companies, not just large ones, can deal in that area. Furthermore, I hope that the Government will encourage the banks to look kindly on such schemes and support and assist the process.

The proposals in the autumn statement could be the start of utilising the private sector and using private sector funds to improve the whole nation's infrastructure.

7.42 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Newbury (Mrs. Chaplin) but was just a little surprised not to hear her mention the exchange rate mechanism, which was, after all, the cornerstone of the Government's economic policy throughout the time when she was special adviser to successive Chancellors of the Exchequer and head of the Prime Minister's political office. That is one illustration of a series of U-turns or S-bends about which we have heard so much lately.

There have been fundamental changes in Government policy. One day, policies have been firm and unalterable, only to be abandoned the next in a series of embarrassing climbdowns and reversals.

Mrs. Chaplin: I understood that the Labour party favoured balanced exchange rates. I have certainly not moved away from hoping that we shall return to the exchange rate mechanism when there is appropriate convergence.

Mr. Hoon: I am delighted to hear that and I hope that the hon. Lady uses her influence on Treasury Ministers to encourage them to do the same—and quickly.

Those climbdowns and reversals show that the country has what I would describe as a corkscrew Chancellor, who slides around in circles that spiral ever downwards to a point where, like the fading smile on the face of the Cheshire cat, the Chancellor's credibility disappears for ever.

The autumn statement showed an economic policy that is trying to be all things to all people, facing all ways at once, boosting a bit of the economy here, battening down the hatches there, unable to decide which way it wants to go. Having previously set out on a series of different policies, the Government have abandoned them when they proved to be the wrong routes. They now seem to have returned to where they set out, drifting from one economic rock to another without a coherent guide or strategy.

The direct consequence of this deepest and longest lasting recession since the second world war is clear. Since the third quarter of 1990, we have seen 1·25 million people out of work, 110,000 business failures, 140,000 homes repossessed, a 4 per cent. fall in output, a 7 per cent. fall in manufacturing output and a 30 per cent. fall in manufacturing investment. It gives me no pleasure to say that the United Kingdom is firmly at the bottom of the European league for growth, job creation and investment.

The cause of that is a Government who lack a coherent economic policy. They have no idea of what they are in for. They can give us a long list of what they are against, but no clear statement of what they now believe in. For example, we know that they do not believe that they can spend their way out of the recession, because the Chancellor keeps repeating it like a mantra. I presume that we can conclude that he believes that consumers can spend the country's way out of the recession. If that is the Government's approach to growth, it is based on a fundamentally flawed perception of what is currently wrong with the British economy.

Our economy is in recession because previous Government economic policies have caused widespread redundancies and lay-offs. The fear of unemployment explains why the economy remains in recession. That threat of unemployment hangs over almost every family in the country. People have no confidence in their future—no confidence that they will be in work next week, next month or next year, that the Government's economic policies will guarantee their future, or that lower interest rates will revive their own economic circumstances.

Although everyone welcomes a reduction in interest rates, there is no evidence that it will necessarily restore the confidence that is so crucially lacking in our economy. Interest rates in the United States have been at around 3 per cent. for some time now and there is no consistent indication that it is restoring confidence in the American economy or that it has resulted in real and sustainable growth. What is happening there is a good indication of what is likely to happen here.

Mr. Jonathan Evans (Brecon and Radnor): Does not the hon. Gentleman's point show the fallacy of the argument put forward by the Labour Front Bench for so many months, persistently calling on the Government for just one more reduction in interest rates? Surely the example of America shows that low interest rates are not the answer.

Mr. Hoon: If the hon. Gentleman will have a little patience and if you, Madam Deputy Speaker, will allow me to continue a little longer, I shall deal with that point. It is not simply a question of reducing interest rates. Clearly, we must also have a coherent industrial strategy to accompany it.

When people in the United States were faced with lower interest rates and had a little more money in their pockets, they chose to pay off their debts—to reduce their credit card obligations and mortgage repayments and to pay off their hire purchase commitments. People lack confidence because they are frightened for their jobs so they are reducing their expenditure so that their commitments are fewer in the event of those jobs disappearing.

The extent to which house buyers are discouraged from buying property when they cannot confidently say that they will be able to meet their repayments next week, next month or next year is the primary cause of the difficulties in the present housing market and a clear indication of lack of confidence. Who will buy an asset like a house when they cannot be sure that they can meet the continuing repayments or, more importantly in the present atmosphere, when they can be sure that the value of that asset will go down?

In this country we are paying for the cost of unemployment, not only in increased benefit payments to the unemployed and lost tax revenues but, crucially, in the light of the autumn statement, we shall also pay through a substantially increased public sector borrowing requirement. That PSBR is estimated to rise beyond the £44 billion projection. How do the Government propose to raise the necessary £44 billion or more? All the signs are that there will be insufficient domestic institutional funds to purchase gilts made available by the Bank of England. That means that the Government will be dependent on foreign investors buying pounds.

With the Government's reluctance to return speedily to the exchange rate mechanism, will foreign investors be willing to invest in sterling on such a scale, particularly given the likely continuing devaluation of the pound? Why should foreign investors invest in pounds that are falling in value? The only way of persuading those investors to do so is to adopt the course taken by the Government in the past: to offer a premium on interest rates and offer higher interest rates than can be obtained elsewhere to offset the currency risk of investing in devaluing pounds.

Such a policy will mean higher interest rates not only for foreign investors, but for the whole of the British economy, which will force this country's economy back into the vicious circle of interest rate rises, further unemployment and repossession of homes. Is that what the Government want? Do the Government want to pursue the policies of previous Conservative Governments that depended on a sustained and persistent devaluation of the pound—allowing the pound to fall steadily on international markets—as a substitute—and here I am tackling the issues raised by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans)—for tackling the underlying problems of the British industrial economy? Those problems include the lack of investment, training and competitiveness.

Devaluation will inevitably feed inflation into the economy. There was a 2·5 per cent. rise in factory input costs between September and October. That 2·5 per cent. rise has been directly attributed to the costs of devaluation. It will be a continuing contribution to inflation in the United Kingdom, will add to and exaggerate the already chronic balance of payments deficit, and exert still more devaluation pressure on the pound.

If the Government believe that consumers can buy this country out of recession, they must put in place the sort of policies that the Opposition have been advocating: a coherent industrial and economic policy.

Mr. Barry Legg (Milton Keynes, South-West): Like other hon. Members, I welcome the autumn statement and the excellent speeches that we heard from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer last week and today. They contained many sentiments that all Conservative Members can heartily endorse, including the commitments to firm control of public expenditure and to reducing public expenditure as a proportion of national income.

The autumn statement also set out again some vital strategies. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor said that one of the Government's priorities was to make markets work better, as that will enable us to achieve a higher long-term growth rate. My right hon. Friend also restated the well-known truth that Governments cannot spend their way out of recession. There can be no stronger proof of that than what has happened to the projections of the borrowing requirement for the coming year—1993-94—and the borrowing requirement projections for this year.

The projections for the current year have risen from about £19 billion at the time of the autumn statement last November to an estimated figure in the Budget this year of £28 billion, which took away the breath of many hon. Members. Last week we were given a revised estimate of £37 billion. The borrowing requirement for the current year—the estimate of how much the Government will spend in excess of taxes—has increased by no less than £18 billion.

If Opposition Members are right in their assumption that Governments can spend their way out of recession, we should have expected growth projections to be moving forward rapidly, and should now have an overheated economy. However, the reverse has happened. The projections of growth for the current year have fallen from 2 per cent. positive at the last autumn statement to 1 per cent. negative in the current autumn statement. There can be no better proof that Governments cannot spend their way out of recession.

How are we to get out of recession? I was pleased by what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor told us. He said that the main means of ending recession were through the supply side and through monetary measures—easing monetary policy. His autumn statement contained the fact that we now have a new monetary framework, under which British interest rates will be determined by domestic conditions. That is to be heartily welcomed after our experience in recent years, when we first shadowed the deutschmark and then became a formal member of the exchange rate mechanism.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has rightly stated that monetary policy was too tight during our membership of the ERM. We now have an opportunity to set a sensible framework for the future to produce growth in the British economy and deliver the sort of economic results that all hon. Members wish to see.

Many hon. Members have spoken of the immediate measures contained in the autumn statement. I shall spend a little time looking at the medium-term prospects, and the ways in which we are to regenerate the economy in the medium term. My hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) made many sensible comments about Britain's trading relationships, but I do not agree with his judgment that management of the economy has to be left to the day-to-day judgments of one or two individuals. One of our mistakes in the late 1980s was to run the economy in that way, and we did not put in place an established framework or the institutional changes necessary to ensure that our policies were properly implemented.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor said today that the aim for public expenditure for the coming three years is to ensure that it is less than the long-term growth rates, which are thought to be about 2·5 per cent. He has set out a strategy for growth in public expenditure over the next three years of 1·5 per cent. per annum in the Government's public expenditure control total. That is a tough target and promises an even tougher spending round in coming years than in recent ones.

The spending round that we have just experienced has provided for 4·5 per cent. growth in public expenditure, which is quite a high percentage. If one considers the future and the plans in the autumn statement, one sees that public expenditure growth will be considerably reduced —to about 1·5 per cent. Like many other hon. Members present, I believe that it is essential to fulfil those plans. All too often, previous autumn statements have contained tough spending plans for years two and three that have not been fulfilled. However, we must keep to our spending plans as the consequences for the British economy for not doing so would be very serious.

We are starting with a budget deficit as a proportion of gross domestic product of about 7 per cent. If public expenditure does not remain within the planned total it will create serious difficulties for our future funding requirements, for long-term interest rates—which have an important bearing on the wealth-creating sector of the economy—and it would have serious consequences for our taxation policies and the Government's commitment to low taxation. Sticking to those spending plans presents a great challenge.

The Chancellor has said that British interest rates will be set according to domestic monetary conditions. I welcome that. A letter dated 8 October from the Chancellor to the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service sets out the conditions for returning to the ERM. The most important of those is that British and German monetary conditions must converge. However, it would be a mistake to return to that mechanism only because of that. We should return to the ERM only when the British and German economies are totally synchronised and working in exactly the same cycles, and, given developments in the German economy over the past two or three years, I can see little possibility of that happening in the foreseeable future.

For many years the German economy was the anchor at the centre of Europe, but that is no longer the case. It has considerable difficulties that will take many years to correct. A hasty return to the ERM would damage the British economy, and fulfilling a legal commitment to return to it and making our economy converge with that of Germany could threaten to capsize the British economy.

I welcome the Chancellor's proposals for a more open approach to financial management. He announced plans for a panel of independent forecasters who will meet once a quarter to discuss the outlook for the British economy. That is welcome, but I do not think that it goes far enough. We should consider institutional change to our economic management. Countries with the best records on their economy and on maintaining low inflation have a much more open system. In the United States the minutes of the open market committee of the Federal Reserve are freely available and in Germany there is constant dialogue between the Bundesbank and the markets. That country also has a panel of independent advisers offering open advice.

Institutional change is appropriate in the fight against inflation and the battle to create sound money, which lies at the heart of the Government's economic policy, which I thoroughly endorse. There are two dangers to such a policy. The first is a large fiscal deficit, and some of the projected deficits are large. Such deficits will tempt future politicians to print money to bridge the gap. The second threat to sound money is over-tight monetary policy. Such a policy was followed in the early 1930s and the reaction that followed harmed the post-war British economy. We have had a period of tight monetary policy when we were in the exchange rate mechanism, but we should now pursue the appropriate monetary conditions to redress that.

We must consider not only lower interest rates but the Government's funding policy. Underfunding the deficit is supported by many monetarists and is the policy adopted by monetary institutions as strong as the Bundesbank and the Federal Reserve.

The autumn statement has many sound features, but in the years ahead we shall need to add further building blocks. If we do that, we shall recreate the spirit of enterprise.

8.5 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): My constituency has a greater percentage of people employed in manufacturing than that of any other hon. Member. I shall return to that. The Chancellor said that the autumn statement is all about confidence, but people in my constituency and elsewhere will see it for what it is—a confidence trick. There have been so many promises of recovery and so many false dawns that nothing that the Chancellor says will ever be believed. On 4 September my local paper, the Lancashire Evening Telegraph, carried the headline:

> "Ingenious step to head off a crisis."

The story below that headline read:

> "Of all the options open to Chancellor Norman Lamont to defend the pound, his move yesterday to borrow £7·25 billion in foreign currency to be sold for sterling is the most innovative. Certainly the City hailed it as ingenious . . .Now, with Mr. Lamont's cash-pot, sterling has been provided with a buffer lasting until next March. By that time the long-delayed signs of upturn in the United Kingdom economy may have emerged to strengthen confidence in the pound."

The hundreds of thousands of people who read that major regional daily must wonder when the recovery will come. Having been once bitten, the Lancashire Evening Telegraph will be twice shy.

The Government's economic policy is all about ingenious steps, three-card confidence tricks and misrepresentations. Despite the Conservative manifesto and solemn pledges at the general election, much has been concealed from the electorate. The manifesto did not mention pit closures and the fact that 31,000 miners and 70,000 people in ancillary industries would be thrown out of work. It did not mention devaluation, the billions of pounds thrown at speculators on 16 September and the continuing slump. On the contrary, the manifesto promised recovery. The Prime Minister told people to vote Conservative on Thursday 9 April and said that the recovery would continue on Friday.

The Chancellor said in his speech that the autumn statement is all about controlling public sector pay. That means that people in the public sector are being asked to pay for the Government's mistakes. The low-paid will also suffer. My constituency is a low-wage area in a low-wage region. Today's debate comes hard on the heels of the debate yesterday on the abolition of the wages councils —an obnoxious policy but a fitting one for the Government and just what one would expect. The Government's message is that to help recovery people must accept lower wages. They did not bat an eyelid when Vallance in British Telecom and other captains of industry in the privatised utilities were awarding themselves stratospheric pay rises. Those salaries were supposed to signal the spirit of free enterprise. Then, on Tuesday, at the Lord Mayor's banquet, the Prime Minister had the gall to talk about fairness. When did he learn about fairness? Why did it take it him so long to discover it? That will not wash. My constituents and millions like them will be worse off and calls to sacrifice by the Prime Minister will fall on deaf ears in Lancashire, where 5 per cent. of all adults earn less than £120 per week—talk about a wages council minimum—and almost 10 per cent. of women earn less than £120 a week for a full working week.

Those are sweatshop rates of pay, and those are the people whom the Tories want to accept lower wages so as to bail out the Government. The poorest are being called on to make that sacrifice. We know what brought this about. The Government strategy is to compete on wage rates rather than to develop skills. That is why the autumn statement cuts the training and employment budget even further, with youth training and employment training facing a real cut of 3 per cent. The Government's message is "leave it to the market."

We get all these lectures about competitiveness and measures to make the economy leaner and fitter, but no one buys that. No one believes that stuff any more, not coming from them, after two recessions in a decade and one third of manufacturing industry being wiped out. In the north-west of England, where my constituency is, 37 per cent. of manufacturing industry has been wiped out by the Tories.

Despite all this, the Chancellor wants confidence. He says that that is what will pull us through. If he tells that to the people in my constituency, where bankruptcies are running at record rates, home repossessions have never been higher and high unemployment is now endemic, they will laugh. We have the highest unemployment for five and a half years. For 30 months in a row, unemployment has relentlessly risen. Unemployment in my constituency is 72 per cent. higher than it was when Major became Prime Minister in November 1990.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not the custom of the House to refer to another Member by his name. Furthermore, when the Speaker or Deputy Speaker rises, the hon. Member being called to order must resume his seat.

Mr. Prentice: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. You will gather that I feel strongly about this issue.

Ordinary people will pay for the mistakes of the Conservatives. I see Tories snigger. They will probably find some way to twist the issue of Government borrowing. The PSBR of £44 billion comes from a party that in April told the British people that the implementation of the Labour party's manifesto commitments would cost £35 billion. Government borrowing will be running at a rate of £1 billion a week next year with a need to finance maturing Government debt. All this borrowing is to pay for unemployment and to generate growth of 1 per cent. Where will the growth come from? It will not come from our manufacturing industry because Britain does not make things any more.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): Rubbish.

Mr. Prentice: Is it rubbish? Work on civil airlines has been transferred from Hatfield to Taiwan. They should tell people in Hatfield about the transfer of technology.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: What about our balance of payments surplus in cars for the first time in 15 years? The hon. Gentleman is wrong to say that we do not make things any longer.

Mr. Prentice: I agree that there has been an improvement with cars, but that is generated by Japanese companies, not indigenous United Kingdom companies. What about consumer durables such as washing machines? What about shipbuilding? Can Tory Members find something to laugh about a shipbuilding industry that has plummeted? What about cameras? Can they laugh about the motorcycle industry, the bus industry or the textile industry, which used to be so important in my constituency, which have all been wiped out? The last pit in Lancashire, Parkside, is about to close. Are they going to laugh at that? What about British Aerospace, in which 132,000 jobs nationwide, and 40,000 in my area, are threatened? If that goes, my region faces economic annihilation and the erosion of its skill base. No doubt they will still find something funny about that.

If we lose leading technologies such as aerospace, from where will the new jobs for my constituents come? We have accelerating job losses, falling investment, empty order books and a flattened housing market. We need a programme for growth and long-term investment—something that we are not getting from the Government. The north-west needs a Government who are seriously interested in manufacturing industry, but no one believes that the autumn statement measures up to the task ahead.

8.15 pm

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North-West): The Chancellor's autumn statement has quite rightly been widely welcomed. I endorse what my colleagues have said about it. The welcome is quite simply because it is appropriate for the new circumstances in which we find ourselves, and because the measures it introduces are imaginative. Most of all, it is because the autumn statement is fundamental to building confidence. It describes the Chancellor's economic framework in a way that allows everyone to see clearly his targets and the indicators that he will use to ensure that he attains those targets. The Conservative party has confidence in its Chancellor.

Having heard the shadow Chancellor this afternoon, I feel that Opposition Members might want to reassess their view of his policy. It was revealing that he did not have a good grasp of economics. He drew attention to the fact that one of the measures in the autumn statement was abolishing car tax. He rightly quoted the figure, used by the Chancellor, of a cost of £750 million in the fiscal year 1993-94. That works out at approximately £400 per average family vehicle.

The shadow Chancellor then took the motor manufacturers' forecast of an increase in sales of vehicles of 70,000. Any average GCSE pupil would have told the shadow Chancellor that 70,000 vehicles costing the Exchequer £400 each would result in a cost of £28 million, less VAT. However, the hon. Gentleman did not make that computation. In the topsy-turvy world of Labour's "think of a number" policy, he took the Government's cost forecast for the total spend, divided it by the motor manufacturers' extra cars sold forecast, and came up with the cooked answer that every vehicle would cost the Exchequer £10,500. He forgot to mention that almost 2 million car owners will have an extra £400 each to spend, thereby creating demand and boosting the economy.

I know that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) was once employed as a temporary lecturer at Edinburgh university, and I can understand why it did not offer him a full-time job. His speech proves that Labour cannot be trusted to get its sums right with the taxpayer's money.

I particularly welcome the £6·3 billion settlement for Welsh programmes and the fact that its real value will be maintained for the next three years. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales on retaining the population-based formula for calculating public expenditure provision. Long may that practice continue.

My right hon. and hon. Friends and I recognise that the recession is global and therefore that any Government's actions are limited. However, Government policy has brought considerable success to Wales over the past 13 years, so the effects of the recession there have been less severe than in the rest of the United Kingdom. At present, 10 per cent. of the potential working population of Wales are unemployed—which reflects almost exactly the figure for the rest of the United Kingdom. In 1986, the comparable figures were 14 per cent. and 11 per cent.

Wales has caught up with the rest of the United Kingdom because its economy has been completely transformed over the past 13 years by Government policy. The basis of the Welsh economy is now much broader than in 1979, when a Conservative Government came to power, when coal and steel were virtually the Principality's only industries. That transformation occurred through the effective use of public funding of inward investment.

Since the general election, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has announced the creation of 3,000 new jobs and that 800 others would be safeguarded, reflecting investment of £78 million and a Welsh Office contribution of selective regional assistance valued at £20 million. To save the shadow Chancellor tripping his fingers over his calculator, that produces a cost of £5,260 for every job created. I am pleased, therefore, with the increase in investment capital allowances, which can do nothing but good for investment prospects for Wales.

The self-employed and small businesses account for the bulk of the Welsh economy. The autumn statement is about confidence, and that is precisely what has been lacking among small businesses in Wales and the rest of the United Kingdom. Inflation poses the greatest threat to confidence, and my right hon. Friend's means of achieving his inflation target are boosting confidence. However, expectations of future inflation tend to be self-fulfilling and to generate their own inflation.

The biggest boost to confidence among the self-employed and small businesses was sterling's withdrawal from the exchange rate mechanism on 16 September. Those to whom I spoke displayed unbridled joy at that development, and the subsequent lowering of interest rates meant that many more small businesses will survive the recession. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will lower interest rates again when it is prudent to do so.

Having raised the matter of the exchange rate mechanism, the shadow Chancellor and his right hon. and hon. Friends persist in saying that sterling should have been realigned a week or a fortnight before 16 September. I put the question to the Chancellor this afternoon, and I really would like an answer. If the Opposition really believe that the ERM should have been realigned at that time, will they kindly tell the House what, in their view, the central value of the realignment would have been, and what would have been the appropriate base interest rate for that value?

I accept the discipline that the ERM forced upon this country, but now that we are out of it, let us take full advantage of the opportunity. I congratulate the Chancellor on taking the first major step along the road to recovery.

8.25 pm

Dr. Roger Berry (Kingswood): Earlier, reference was made to a letter signed by several hundred economists in 1981 that was critical of the Government's economic policy. I plead guilty to being one of its signatories. I am not at all embarrassed, given that Conservative Members have spoken this afternoon as if, since 1979, the Government have not had the worst record of economic management of any postwar Government.

The Government have the worst record on growth, unemployment, interest rates, the balance of manufactured goods, and so on. The list is endless. I looked in the autumn statement for remarkable features and for something new. It makes a half-hearted and belated attempt to adopt policies that the Government ridiculed and rejected not only before and during the general election but in the seven months since. They rejected lower interest rates, tax allowances for investment, additional export credit assistance, and the release of local authority capital receipts.

In my maiden speech on 10 June, during the debate on the Finance Bill, and on a Labour amendment calling for enhancement of first-year capital allowances that was rejected out of hand, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury said:

> "The facts do not support the assertion that capital allowances increase the flow of investment".

He said that the amendment was aimed at generating an investment-led recovery.

> "but history has shown time and time again that investment led recoveries are chimeras."—[Official Report, 10 June 1992; Vol. 209, column 357.]

The Financial Secretary followed the lead set by the Chancellor in presenting his Budget, when he also rejected enhanced capital allowances on the basis that they would not be a sensible use of available resources.

Last Thursday, the Chancellor increased allowances for first-year investment in plant and machinery. There has been much ill-informed talk about investment led recovery, and that was one change of policy. The most dramatic change followed the lengthy call for a reduction in interest rates. A Treasury press release issued last week spoke of the lowest interest rates since 1978. What happened after 1978 to give us record interest rates? The truth is that the present Chancellor and his predecessors have been responsible for precisely the record interest rate levels that the Chancellor now seeks to claim credit for reducing.

It must be quite easy to be a Chancellor of the Exchequer in such circumstances. You jack up the interest rate; you wait for a few months; then you bring them down, and everyone says how wonderfully you have done your job. No doubt some Conservative Members are impressed by such tactics.

In the autumn statement, the Chancellor proclaims the benefits of a devalued pound—he refers to it, of course, as a competitive pound—and the lower interest rates that that allows. There is, however, no hint or whiff of recognition of the fact that this is the same Chancellor who resisted such a policy until it was forced on him; the same Chancellor who was prepared to borrow £7 billion to throw away more than £1 billion of taxpayers' money in a vain and foolish attempt to prop up an overvalued pound. There is no recognition of the fact that the right hon. Gentleman not only raised the interest rate to 15 per cent. on 16 September, but subsequently told the House that he would have kept it at 15 per cent. if the policy had worked.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The hon. Gentleman said that he considered the pound to be over-valued at its then rate in the exchange rate mechanism. I seem to recall that, during the general election campaign, the Leader of the Opposition suggested that the Labour party would defend that valuation. Did the hon. Gentleman say then that he considered the valuation too high?

Dr. Berry: I pointed out that it was too high on the very day that we entered the ERM; it seemed reasonably obvious. My right hon. and learned Friend will speak for himself, but I am convinced that, if he had expressed the view that I now hold in the run-up to the election, he would have been held responsible for the devaluation in the currency. Indeed, incredible though it may seem, I have heard hon. Members in the Chamber trying to blame him for precisely that—although, as the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) has said, he did not express the view about the devaluation of sterling that I am now expressing.

The point is that, if the Chancellor's policy of jacking up interest rates to 15 per cent. had succeeded in maintaining the pound at DM2·95 in the ERM, we would be debating a slightly different autumn statement. However, millions of people in the country would be seriously worried, and rightly so. On reflection, I believe that that would have been a preposterous proposition—but, according to the Chancellor, it is what he would have done.

One feature of the autumn statement is its acceptance of some of the arguments advanced by Opposition Members and others. Today, people are talking about the awarding of marks to schools, and about league tables. I would like to award marks for economic literacy to the autumn statement—I would not give it many. First, why start with a planning total of £244·5 billion when the circumstances in which that total was set last year have changed so radically? The dramatic recovery to which the Chancellor referred last year has signally failed to materialise, and there is no economic rationale for sticking to a figure when it is out of date.

Secondly, why assume that improved confidence—a phrase that is used repeatedly throughout the autumn statement—will miraculously follow interest rate reductions, when the private sector is debt-ridden on an unprecedented scale, and unemployment is still rising? Thirdly, why continue to assert that conquering inflation—whether that is interpreted literally as the achievement of zero inflation, or more liberally as achieving any old rate between 1 per cent. and 4 per cent.—is the key to sustainable growth? No economic theory or empirical evidence demonstrates that; indeed, a few years ago, the Financial Times pointed out—correctly—that there was no perceptible link between the inflation rate and the rate of economic growth.

Fourthly—this annoys me most—if, as the Chancellor says in the autumn statement, it would be damaging to seek to prevent the PSBR from rising in a recession owing to the loss of tax revenues and the payment of benefits—a view with which, incidentally, I agree—why is it not better to increase the PSBR to invest in economic recovery? The statement gives no answer to that question.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) has pointed out, at the last general election the Government made much of Labour's spending programmes; indeed, they assumed that all our expenditure on every conceivable programme would be incurred in 12 months. That would have required a significant increase in public sector borrowing—probably of the order of that the Government propose for the PSBR in the current year. The Government's wheeze has been to achieve a similar figure without any improvement in services, with employment accelerating to 3 million—according to their figure; on the bases of calculations made before they fiddled the statistics, the figure is nearer 4 million. It is difficult to imagine a more damning condemnation of economic incompetence.

That brings me to the most remarkable feature of the autumn statement. As many of my right hon. and hon. Friends have said, it fails to address the real issue: how we can secure economic recovery, and reduce unemployment and the record number of bankruptcies. Most significantly, it fails to appreciate that, without sufficient demand in the economy, unemployment will continue to rise and firms will continue to go bust.

As hon. Members on both sides of the House have pointed out, supply side policies are important. Our appalling balance of trade in the midst of recession is evidence of that. They are not enough, however; our economy's output will not be purchased unless there is sufficient demand in the economy. In my constituency, the owners of businesses are working every hour that God gives. They have made every conceivable supply-side improvement. The only thing that keeps newsagents, local garages and other small businesses in operation and secures jobs is the arrival of more customers spending more money. An increase in demand is not merely sufficient, but absolutely necessary, if the country is to emerge from recession.

The Government appear to believe that the private sector will somehow generate that increase in demand. They seem to think that consumers will get hold of their plastic cards—observing that interest rates have fallen by another point—shoot out into the high street and increase their expenditure, thus bringing the country out of recession. I believe that the Government hope and pray that that will happen, but the problem is that it will not happen.

[Dr. Berry]

Interest rates are not particularly low at present; and in the United States, where rates are around 3 per cent., the recession continues. The private sector in this country—whether it is the corporate sector or private consumers—is more debt-ridden than that in the United States. It is inconceivable that an interest-rate reduction will be sufficient to regenerate economic recovery: as a number of hon. Members have said, what we need is an increase in public expenditure.

I have looked carefully at the figures in the autumn statement. If we accept all the Government's assumptions about a 1 per cent. growth rate next year, and their assumptions about the components of demand arising from exports, private investment and private consumption, the fact remains that there is a yawning gap in demand. There is not enough demand even to prevent rising unemployment.

Having taken account of the knock-on effects, I believe, as my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) has said, that we need an increase of £10 billion in public expenditure to make any impact on unemployment. It should be targeted at investment in industry, public works infrastructure and construction, for three obvious reasons. First, it would use unemployed resources to create productive assets; we should be investing in projects with rates of return in excess of the cost of borrowing. Secondly, public expenditure on investment would have less of an impact on imports than the equivalent increase in private consumption, even if that could be engineered. Thirdly, such a package would immediately be self-financing in part as tax revenues rose and social security payments fell.

Conservative Members are fond of chanting the dogma that the Government cannot spend their way out of recession. That is a fatuous excuse for Government inactivity. It is incontrovertible that to get out of recession requires increased expenditure on the nation's output. If the Government will not help bring that about, who will? If there is one reason why I shall be voting against the autumn statement, it is the abject failure of Government to answer that simple question. The autumn statement is not a programme for recovery; it is not the programme that my constituents and millions of others need so desperately.

Mr. Richard Spring (Bury St. Edmunds): May I add my congratulations to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on presenting to the House an autumn statement which has won plaudits not only in the House but amongst many independent commentators. His emphasis on capital spending, his commitment to keeping a lid on inflation and his commitment to reviving growth have been greatly welcomed.

The events of the last four months have produced a number of instructive lessons. A financial whirlwind forced us to leave the ERM but the whole country now welcomes the cuts in interest rates since our departure. However welcome the new minimum lending rate of 7 per cent. is—hopefully with more to come—it marks a stage in a volatile roller coaster ride of interest rates—7·5 per cent. to 15 per cent. and back to 7 per cent. While I greatly welcome the Chancellor's firm commitment to low inflation, the post-war swings and roundabouts of interest rate policy have bedevilled the economy. For example, the credit boom of the late 1980s bore great similarities to credit conditions in the early 1970s. Sadly, history has had a habit of repeating itself.

The Maastricht treaty requires during the second stage that member states should start the process leading to the independence of their own central banks. It is not clear that we would find it desirable to move towards a single currency or indeed that the convergence criteria will ever be successfully met.

I turn to the domestic argument. There is no doubt in my mind that the wave of money moving into the deutschmark this year was due to the belief of the markets that the Bundesbank would pursue policies essentially unfettered by political influence. The markets were proved right. In its policy objectives, the Bundesbank has been by and large successful.

The Bundesbank is more substantially independent than the Bank of England. That is important. The IMF working paper, "Central Bank Independence: Issues and Experience", noted that the results of most studies are that countries with independent central banks tend to deliver better inflation outcomes. Had the Bank of England been considerably more independent, over the past four decades we would have enjoyed lower inflation, a more stable currency and less volatile interest rates. Surely it is time, particularly after the turbulent experiences of the summer, to look seriously at the structure of the bank and thereby the conduct of our monetary policy.

Given the enormous and justified importance which hon. Members place upon debate and parliamentary scrutiny, there might be concern that an independent Bank of England would be unaccountable. There is clearly a difficulty, with a tension between parliamentary sovereignty and central bank independence. That needs to be addressed.

The fears of lack of democratic accountability to Parliament could be addressed if the Governor were made regularly accountable to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service. The ingredients for that exist already. The Select Committee could have an enhanced role in monitoring the bank's performance. Basic to the independent bank's charter would be an absolute commitment to stable prices. The Select Committee could examine the conduct of the bank's monetary policy. A mix of a statutory commitment to price stability and parliamentary accountability would enhance the conduct of future monetary policy.

If ever, heaven forbid, we were beset again by the same financial whirlwind that we saw in the summer, we would be better able to withstand it. I urge my right hon. Friend to give serious consideration to that proposal.

There has been a great upsurge in concern about the future of small business. The huge increase in small businesses and entrepreneurial activity in the 1980s was welcomed and was a great triumph for the Conservative Government. As is happening tragically everywhere in the world, small businesses here are being hit very hard by the recession.

My hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) very ably highlighted small business problems in the House last Friday, and in Adjournment debates my hon. Friends the Members for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates) and for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning) dealt with specific difficulties facing the small business community.

Small businesses face a liquidity crisis despite lower interest rates. My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls), with all his years of distinguished commitment to small businesses, has spelt out eloquently the lack of long-term assured capital which has been so damaging and debilitating.

Has the desire of banks to repair profitability by extending margins something to do with lack of liquidity in the banking system? In the 1980s bank credit to the private sector, which is most sensitive to interest rate changes, grew by 20 per cent. per annum. The growth of money supply in the early 1980s fell to a more sustainable 12 per cent. because of Government overfunding, that is, selling more Government debt to non-banks than the PSBR and using the excess proceeds to repay Government debt held by banks. Surely now we are in exactly the reverse position, as indicated by my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg). We need to liquefy the system by underfunding, that is, by the Government financing at least part of their PSBR from the banks. That system was in force prior to 1985 and was considered to be successful. That approach to monetary policy is practised widely in other parts of the world. The collapse of broad money growth from 18 per cent. in 1990 to 5 per cent. now suggests that greater short-term monetary expansion is called for.

May I be technical and illustrate the extent of this dire problem? In the year to the third quarter of 1988 the rise in bank deposits held by unincorporated businesses, mostly small businesses, was 28·9 per cent. In the year to the second quarter of 1992 it fell by 0·1 per cent. Small business liquidity has been severely cut at a time of recession by lack of growth in broad money. Surely, therefore, the Treasury should consider under-funding to make up for the lack of credit growth. Broad money needs to grow, to boost liquidity in the short term before levelling off in years to come. That is the real world that business—small businesses in particular—has to live in. By liquefying the banking system, the lending practices of banks would surely not be so damaging and obstructive as they clearly are at present. Therefore, I urge the Treasury to address that problem, in the face of rising business illiquidity and bankruptcy.

All that having been said, the business community in west Suffolk, in my constituency of Bury St. Edmunds and in the nation at large greatly and without reserve welcomes all the measures that the Chancellor took so boldly last week. We now have in place a strategy for new growth, which I greatly welcome and fully support.

8.50 pm

Mr. George Stevenson (Stoke-on-Trent, South): The autumn statement can rightly be described as containing very small crumbs of little comfort. It should have been about reversing our industrial and economic decline and establishing a structure for long-term growth. In reality, it continues to destroy credibility and it certainly does not hold out the prospects for an improvement in confidence. The main reason is that the Government have singularly failed to recognise that unemployment is the greatest threat to a return of confidence. Unless the Government recognise that fact, confidence—which is so elusive—will not be generated. Unless the priority objective is employment, not unemployment, we shall continue to suffer.

The Chancellor's autumn statement and his subsequent contributions contained hardly any reference to unemployment. That had to be dragged out of him by means of questions. Finally, he had to admit that unemployment would continue to rise. What a disgraceful statement to have to make after 13 years of Tory government.

The autumn statement provides official recognition of the fact that the Government's philosophy has been completely discredited. We have been asked to believe that what we have to do is to drive down pay and increase poverty, as those elements are vital to recovery.

The other element that we are asked to accept in the deadly economic cocktail with which we have been presented is chronic short-termism. We are told that increased capital allowances will be helpful to business and industry, but they are available for only one year. That is unlikely to provide an incentive to stimulate investment. What is needed is a long-term strategy, but no evidence of such a strategy can be found in the autumn statement. The Treasury's economic model makes it clear that any possible benefits from devaluation, allied to the Government's present policies and any growth, if it happens, will be short lived and quickly reversed.

The Government seem equally unable to realise that lower pay will depress much-needed domestic demand. Short-termism, incompetence and cuts in living standards will create further economic and social divisions. Apart from the damage that that does, it is irrelevant as we search for a solution to the chronic economic problems that the Government have created. As they continue to stagger from crisis to crisis, the suffering of the British people intensifies. One can detect no reasonable prospect of any reversal of the decline, let alone any prospect of the promotion of economic growth.

The Chancellor told us that he anticipates a 1 per cent. increase in growth next year. If we were to depend upon the reliability of past predictions, we should be looking at another example of an economic blind date. Any talk by this Government of growth and of an increase in jobs borders on the obscene. More than 3 million people are on the dole. The pits closure programme will lead to another 4,000 job losses in my constituency of Stoke-on-Trent, South alone. Will the Chancellor come to my constituency and explain to those 4,000 people who are to lose their jobs how the economic miracle will enhance their job prospects?

Another bombshell is lurking in the background. The British people should be given clear notice of what is going to hit them. We can predict with reasonable confidence that the Government will be forced to increase taxes, in one form or another, in the very near future. The public should not be deceived into believing that any other prospect is open to the Government.

The autumn statement was greeted with a certain amount of euphoria by Tory Members. It occurred to me that the shouting and cheering grew in intensity as the Government's credibility fell. I do not know what is going to happen in future. I think we can expect more shouting and more cheering. However, this mini-Budget has been received throughout the country with as much enthusiasm as a sun-ray lamp would be welcomed in the Sahara. It is perceived to be irrelevant and useless.

The Government have no control over the economy. They have no commitment to economic recovery. The plain fact is that they are just not believed. The Tories have cashed in all their credibility. The biggest obstacle to the return of confidence are the Government. They pursued dogmatic policies for so long that they caused enormous damage. The Prime Minister told us that any change in the Government's policies would be a betrayal of our future. The collapse of the Government's economic policies, however, has forced them into changing their policies.

It is impossible to believe that the country is now being asked to accept that the policies contained in the autumn statement are virtuous and that they were planned all along by the Government. That is patent nonsense.

It is clear that the only question that remains to be answered is not whether these measures will restore confidence but when—if not—there will be a further retreat by this incompetent Government. No Cabinet reshuffle, whenever that comes, will hide that fact, or con the British people.

The Government have been described as a busted flush. I do not know whether I accept that. Nevertheless, they display all the characteristics of a spare trick at a whist drive. "Trick" is the operative word. The people of this country were subjected to a tragic confidence trick at the general election.

These measures are marginal indeed. They are designed to attract more Tory cheers. They do not address the deep-seated problems that face the country. They are motivated by desperation, not by conviction, and have little chance of success. They expose the disastrous policies of a discredited Government, who have a knee-jerk philosophy that masquerades as economic policy. It is no substitute for a radical new direction based on partnership between government at central and local level, and business and industry throughout the country. We need real investment in training, real investment in business and industry, an urgent job programme and an immediate attack on mass unemployment. Only then shall we see any real prospect of a return to much-needed confidence.

My contention, which will be supported by many hon. Members in the Lobby tomorrow night, is that confidence will not return as a result of the Chancellor's package and will certainly not return while this Government are in office.

8.58 pm

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): I welcome the autumn statement because it represents a change in policy. If we had not seen that change, I would have taken a different view. The Government's previous economic policy was proving inadequate because it was based on forecasting that was clearly flawed. As evidence developed that the recession was not over, a change was urgently necessary.

It was certainly no part of my own election platform, of our party's election platform or of Ministers' election platforms that we should continue to preside over a continuing recession. This necessary change in our economic policy was clearly overdue.

Before the autumn statement and black Wednesday, the emphasis that was so heavily on the control of inflation was no longer making sense to business, to home owners or to the public in my constituency and elsewhere. It was increasingly obvious to them and to many Conservative Members that growth in the economy had to become the new and central focus. That is why, as a result of the autumn statement, we have a welcome for the policy from the Confederation of British Industry and from the Institute of Directors. More importantly to me, the policy has got a welcome from those active in business at all levels in my constituency.

I do not recognise that there has been a gloomy response to the autumn statement, as Opposition Members have suggested. They may not like it, but my constituents and people in business who have been looking for a more hopeful and positive outlook are pleased with the results.

The measures in the autumn statement are now regarded as realistic and sensible. Those running industry and business may not have got everything that they wanted, but they did not expect to get everything. They realise that the Government cannot get the country out of recession by themselves. The Government can only take certain measures to act as a stimulus.

There is a real change in perception in the country about what the Government are now doing on the economic front. I support the Chancellor in his efforts to hold the level of public spending below the level of growth in the economy as a whole. I share the concern expressed by other speakers today about the level of borrowing. Once I had heard the Chancellor say what his borrowing forecast was for this year and for the years ahead, I no longer expected that we would get two points off interest rates at this moment. However, I hope that the downward pressure on interest rates will continue as a result of a prudent and balanced policy now.

It is entirely proper that the statement should contain a pay ceiling of 1·5 per cent. in the public sector. That leaves room for productivity arrangements and for some recognition to be given to improvements in the operational efficiency of those in the public sector. A nil increase would not have allowed that and would have been a mistake.

Clearly the emphasis on protecting capital investment and increasing capital spending is right. I welcome the emphasis on housing, on roads and on railways, and I especially welcome the commitment to build the Jubilee line extension. Concern has been expressed today about other areas of capital expenditure for London Transport. The tube strike threatened for next week is an appalling example of Luddite mentality. How can it be right to upgrade the capital investment in London's tube lines if those operating the lines are not prepared to make necessary changes to increase efficiency and, under the schemes, increase the earnings of the majority of people employed by London Regional Transport? I hope that the union will see sense and not cause unnecessary difficulties and problems for Londoners next week.

I welcome the new rules for funding public sector projects such as the joint private-public ventures. The advent of leasing arrangements will be particularly helpful for my constituents who commute to London, who are absolutely fed up with low-grade rolling stock. That proposal will provide a way forward to deal with that problem faster than before.

The ideas of charging for motorways and ultimately for electronic charging for other roads are also ways to improve Britain's infrastructure so that it can compete with the rest of the world, and particularly with Europe, without placing an unrealistic burden on public funding.

I question whether the privatisation plans for British Rail, which are very much linked to the level of PSBR and the Government's ability to fund rail infrastructure, are likely to be really effective in their present form. Clearly much further consideration will be given to that issue in the House.

I ask the Government Front Bench, and in particular my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, to continue to focus on the importance of manufacturing industry. There is a good story to tell here. Manufacturing accounts for 50 per cent. of consumer purchases in this country and 70 per cent. of exports. It employs 5 million people directly and another 5 million indirectly.

Manufacturing industry's record in the 1980s was one of considerable progress. Output has risen by 22 per cent. and productivity by 58 per cent. from the low point in the early 1980s. Our share of main manufacturing countries' exports recovered from a low point of 7·6 per cent. in 1985 to 8·7 per cent. in 1991. Most importantly—and this point is often missed—is the fact that business expenditure on research and development rose 6 per cent. a year in real terms in the decade 1981-91. We are all well aware of the fact that industrial relations were transformed over that period.

A gap still exists of between 20 and 40 per cent., on whatever range of measures one uses, between the United Kingdom's ability in manufacturing industry and that of our major competitors. Therefore, much remains to be done. Part of the Government's policy in future should be to ensure that we put manufacturing industry at the top of our agenda, that we recognise and promote the importance of a strong manufacturing base and that that point is taken account of in every area of Government policy.

That is not to suggest that Government can do industry's job, which is to manage, sell, achieve and be profitable. However, I believe that it is important that we learn from the lessons of the past when at one stage it was said from the Conservative Benches that manufacturing industry was not as important to the country as it had been and never would be again. I want to raise the emphasis in that respect. The policies that we are now following are sensible in terms of the future of British industry. I hope that the focus on the importance of manufacturing will remain a fundamental tenet of Government policy in future.

9.9 pm

Mrs. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): The Chancellor began his autumn statement by stating the three principles on which it was based. The third principle was his wish to make markets work better. However, he did not make it clear for whom he wanted markets to work better. Did he want markets to work better for the public good, for people who are working, for people who are out of work, for people who are looking for work, or for some financial institutions?

It is important to look at the fine print in documents such as the autumn statement. I was made aware of the fine print when I received a letter from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire), only yesterday, spelling out the implications of the autumn statement for economic development in inner-city areas. The autumn statement does not reveal that the implications for inner-city areas will mean that urban programme funding is maintained, to use the Minister's word, at £176 million. That is a decrease on this year's figure of £237 million, to £91 million for 1994-95, and virtually nothing for the year after that.

In my constituency of Sheffield, Hillsborough that means that about 200 economic regeneration schemes ranging from very small schemes such as a £300 toy provision for a mother-and-toddler library to essential regeneration projects to equip the city's media centre will finish next March unless the proposals are changed.

Let us consider the benefit of urban programmes. In my experience, 90 per cent. of urban programme funding is directly felt by people, 37 per cent. of schemes are promoted by the voluntary sector, 25 per cent. of schemes have a positive action element, and a large number of schemes have European partnership funding. The autumn statement told us nothing about how to work with European funds to obtain better regeneration.

On 2 June, in an answer to me, a Minister said that he did not expect the establishment of the urban regeneration agency to have any effect on the future financial provision for the urban programme. We continued to plan excellent schemes and projects to regenerate our economy in Sheffield. After such a statement, I did not expect to find that, at a stroke in the autumn statement, the urban programme in major cities had virtually been aborted. The excuse is that it is aborted in favour of £20 million, which is a mere quarter of the money that has been cut and which has to be matched by capital receipts this year. Have Conservative Members tried to sell a house lately? There is not an enormous market. The money will not be forthcoming. The fine print in the autumn statement will be disastrous for poorer city areas.

I urge hon. Members from urban areas to consider the detailed implications of the autumn statement and put pressure on the Government to ensure that their policies work for everybody in city areas, not just for the few.

9.14 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): I, too, welcome the excellent autumn statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. I also pay tribute to him for the two excellent reforms that he has introduced. First, he has planned an expenditure total and then worked out which Departments would have what proportion. Secondly, this will be the last autumn statement in its present form. That is a long overdue reform. In future the autumn statement will be made and tax-raising measures will be announced at the same time at the end of the year.

My right hon. Friend's planned expenditure total of £244·5 billion is a 7 per cent. increase over last year, on top of a 10 per cent. rise the year before. So any talk of cuts from the Opposition is absolute nonsense. That is why Opposition Members' comments were so empty last Thursday. All the wind had been taken out of their sails, because all the budgets had been maintained.

However, there is a danger in the planned expenditure total. It represents some 45 per cent. of gross domestic product and a public sector borrowing requirement of about 6·5 per cent. this year. If some of the forecasters are right, the PSBR could well rise to 9 per cent. in the next two years. The PSBR was zero in 1990-91, so this year's PSBR represents quite an increase. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor will have to pay careful attention to it.

[Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown]

In order to make the public expenditure round work, my right hon. Friend had to save some £1·5 billion by putting a curb on public sector wages. Approximately 5 million people are employed in the public sector. That has fallen from 5·9 million a year ago, and I hope that the trend will continue.

My right hon. Friend has direct control of about 3·5 million of those 5 million employees. The remaining 1·5 million are employed by local authorities. If the local authorities wish to hold their council tax to a reasonable amount and preserve their budgets, it would be very much in their interests to hold wage increases for their employees to about 1·5 per cent. in forthcoming wage rounds.

There is a great deal of talk about holding down wages in the public sector. However, public sector employees mostly have protected and generally well paid jobs. They have plenty of fringe benefits. Many of them have pensions linked to inflation. But, above all, they have a job, and in that they are an awful lot better off than people in the private sector who have lost their jobs. Surely it is right that a sector which has enjoyed real increases in wages in the past 10 years should at this stage of the economic cycle take part in the economic stringency which so many employees in the private sector have had to endure.

The autumn statement has put us well on the way to recovery. We have a reduction in the value of the pound against the deutschmark and the dollar of some 15 per cent. That will be of major benefit to our exporting companies. Much more importantly, we now have lower interest rates. They are down from 9 per cent. a few weeks ago to 7 per cent. I hope that my right hon. Friend will be able to reduce them further, to 6 per cent., before Christmas.

Even at the present rate, interest rates are at their lowest since 1978. We have lower rates than any of our major European partners. If that will not stimulate confidence and recovery in the consumer market, I do not know what will.

I and my constituents in Cirencester and Tewkesbury —especially the business men—congratulate my right hon. Friend on his measures to bring about investment in the economy next year, and on his imaginative statement.

9.18 pm

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): We have had an interesting and wide-ranging debate, as befits an autumn statement which was dressed up as a mini-Budget. As the Chancellor spoke, it became clear that the statement had a great deal more to do with reviving his reputation and that of the Government than reviving the British economy. What is more, it failed on those counts. Had the Chancellor been here to listen to all the contributions in the debate, including those from his side, he would have heard Conservative Members on the Benches behind him voicing a sombre tone, which did not reflect the exuberant self-congratulation with which the Government tried to launch the mini-Budget.

The right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), who is always an interesting, and frequently a sombre, contributor, set great store by devaluation. He and other devaluationists—including any Opposition Members—would do well to pay attention to what the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders has said since black Wednesday:

> "there is great uncertainty at present over the future direction of Britain's economic and European policy. Inflation is still feared, the pound is regarded as unstable at its present level (which is much too low—the industry was competitive at DM2·90-£1) and there is great concern lest the industry again be subjected to taxation to help the Government fund the PSBR. A two-speed Europe would speedily negate the purpose of the foreign investment so that new capacity would replace rather than add to existing capacity".

As my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) rightly said, devaluation cannot be a substitute for tackling the underlying weaknesses of the British economy.

The right hon. Member for Shropshire, North also alerted us to the "inflationary time bomb" which is inherent in the present situation. He should recognise that much of that inflationary time bomb can be traced to precisely the devaluation in which he seemed to have so much faith.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) made at least two judgments with which I agreed. First, he said that the debate on the statement is being held unusually quickly because, the longer that the country has to examine it, the more they will realise how shallow and inadequate it is. I also agree with him that it is a shameful abdication of the country's international responsibilities for overseas aid to the poorest third-world countries not to have increased it in real terms, and it is against the best traditions of the British people's feelings.

I endorse the powerful argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) that everything possible should be done to boost the British car industry. Welcome though the abolition of the special car tax is—like my hon. Friend, I have long argued that it should be ended—let no one be deceived: even if sales were to increase by 70,000, as the SMMT says they might, it will still leave them 29 per cent. lower than they were in 1989. Such is the depth of the recession—and, by comparison, how puny are the measures in the autumn statement.

Can the Paymaster General answer the question that he could not answer last night when we discussed the car tax? How will that £750 million be recouped from British motorists, as the Chancellor said it would be? Also, why is it £750 million, when an extra 70,000 car sales, resulting from the abolition of the tax, would bring in £122 million in additional VAT? Does that not make the net cost of abolition £628 million? If he is going to clobber the motorist by taking the money back, should it not be £628 million and not £750 million? I hope that he will answer that question.

Welcome though the measure is, the car industry needs a restoration of consumer confidence more than anything. That will not come about as long as people fear for their jobs, are fearful of outstanding debts and are uncertain as to the direction that the economy will take under the Government. As the likely effects of the autumn statement, as opposed to its promises, have sunk in, it is increasingly evident from industry, and the high streets, as well as from the House that, whatever else the autumn statement does, it will not lift the fear of unemployment that is so damaging the economy and people's lives.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) has said, even if the promised whole 1 per cent. of growth, as predicted in the autumn statement for next year, materialises, it will leave Britain in the three years to 1993 with an appalling cumulative cut in real GDP of no less than 2·5 per cent., as compared with an increase of 4 per cent. in the United States, 10 per cent. in Japan, 5 per cent. in Germany, 6 per cent. in France, 8 per cent. in Spain and 4·5 per cent. in the European Community as a whole.

That nails the claim made by some Conservative Members that somehow Britain is muddling along all right in a recession that is also hitting everyone else. The difference is that, in the past few years, other European economies have been growing, while ours has contracted. They have built up their industries and rate of production, while our Government have run our capacity down. As my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) has said, they have run it down to the point where even our ability to sustain our future standard of living is threatened.

How much confidence can we have in the Chancellor's forecast of 1 per cent. growth next year and his pathetic 0·25 per cent. forecast growth in total investment? After all, this is the Chancellor who told us in his interview during "On The Record" on Sunday:

> "The Government cannot forecast precisely whether the economy is going to grow by 1 or 1½ per cent. There are margins of error as I have constantly, constantly tried to make clear."

The Government have another chance today. Will they tell the House what are the margins of error for those pathetic forecasts of growth next year? Is the Chancellor saying that the downside of those margins of error is that there might be no growth at all? After all, he forecast growth of 2·25 per cent. this time last year, but, instead, we had a cut of 1 per cent. in GDP. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Stevenson) said, that forecast is like an economic blind date—and it does not look like a very good one.

Although some of the decisions in the autumn statement may bring some limited benefit, they will be affected by the deflationary impact of others. It is all very well for the Government to boast that they now hope that the Jubilee line extension will go ahead—although they have been unable to confirm any deals that will enable that to happen—but what about transport in the rest of London? What possible sense does it make to cut £380,000 from London Transport's budget—equivalent to more than a quarter—when, as the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) spelt out, the underground is crying out for more investment, not less?

What about the rest of Britain? Where is the capital investment that will give our country the communications network it needs and construction workers the jobs they need? Why have the Government not announced any new capital programmes? They have told us nothing new; they have simply cited programmes that have been announced previously.

I was pleased to note that the hon. Member for Newbury (Mrs. Chaplin) welcomed public-private financing partnerships. It is a pity that her opinion was not able to prevail in her previous job as head of the Prime Minister's political office, when Conservative Members heaped ridicule on the proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Dr. Berry) has said, measure after measure that we set out in our programmes before the election, and which was ridiculed by the Conservatives, is now being hesitantly implemented by the Government.

We do not complain that the Government have taken our policies. The more of our policies they adopt the happier we shall be, and the better off Britain will be. Our complaint is that they have not accepted entire programmes—their acceptance is half-hearted. What they propose in the autumn statement totally fails to match the challenge that now confronts our country as a result of the failure of their policies.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) rightly said, the Government's industrial investment incentives are inadequate, and the cuts in training and industry budgets are particularly damaging, especially in regions with high unemployment.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) said, the Government are failing to meet the need for high quality training for the unemployed. Jobplan workshops can only be of limited value as long as six people chase every vacancy.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mrs. Jackson) asked, what good can come from cutting programmes which are desparately needed to regenerate inner city areas?

The hon. Member for Harrogate (Mr. Banks) rightly complained about cuts in the tourism budget, but he is too easily satisfied if he believes that the present budget for science, research and development is anywhere near adequate when many of our competitors are spending so much more and investing an increasing amount in important science, research and development for the success of industry in the future.

Several hon. Members referred to the Government's incomes policy. The obvious economic objection is that, even if it could work, it is bound to store up problems for the future. It takes demand out of the economy but will give rise to pressures in a couple of years time, precisely when inflation is likely to be taking off again. As my hon. Friends the Members for Newport, East and for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) pointed out with great passion, we also need to focus on the unfairness of that incomes policy.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Where would the hon. Gentleman get the money to pay for wage increases in the public sector? Would he get it from cutting back current spending on capital projects, on pensions or on social security?

Mr. Smith: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has asked that question, because it is a variant on a question asked by several Conservative Members, including the Chancellor, who asked what the Labour party would cut to bring down the public sector borrowing requirement. We shall bring down the public sector borrowing requirement by cutting unemployment.

On the unfairness of the Government's incomes policy, may I take the example of a real home help—a Mrs. Weston—whose take-home pay is just £100 a week. She receives that sum for the responsible job of looking after elderly people, many of whom are incontinent and confused. As well as doing their shopping, housework and 101 other things, she washes and dresses them and helps them to go to the toilet. The House will agree that it is not an easy job.

The Government are telling Mrs. Weston that she can expect, at most, an increase of £1·50 per week. That sum will be more than eaten up by the £3·75 which the Government acknowledge is likely to hit her through inflation. Those of her colleagues with council rents to pay will find that 5 per cent. plus the increase in the inflation rate on which the Government insist will take another £2·32 or so. Clearly the Government are piling an indefensible burden on those workers least able to bear it. The British public will know that that is wrong, and will be deeply ashamed of what the Government are doing.

In addition to the injustice and unworkability of the Government's incomes policy, another deep and potentially devastating problem is hidden in what the Government have said so far about that policy. They must say whether it includes increments, performance-related pay, overtime and so forth. Are increments to be included in the 1·5 per cent.? I shall give way to the Chancellor if he will tell us. The Chancellor does not want to answer the question—perhaps he does not know. If they are not included, we have not a 1·5 per cent. pay limit, but a 1·5 per cent. limit plus 1·5 or 2·5 or 3 or 4 per cent.—and that is not what the Government have been claiming.

If increments are to be included, do the Government believe that there will be enough money within the 1·5 per cent. to honour legally binding contracts? The increments on nurses' wages scales are legally binding and automatic. Will the Government legislate to set aside those increments, as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) did when he operated a statutory incomes policy? If not, the increments will have to be paid and, together with performance-related pay and other supplements, will rapidly use up the available funds. If that is the case, the Government are assuming either cuts in cash terms for other public service workers or large-scale cuts in staff. The House deserves to be told which.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle reminded us with great passion, on Monday the Prime Minister appealed to the partnership and fairness of the British people. Where is the partnership and fairness in an incomes policy that gives a home help £1·50 a week and a judge £50 a week? Where is the partnership and fairness in removing wages council protection for 2·5 million low-paid workers? Where is the partnership in abolishing the National Economic Development Council—the very forum through which partnership in tackling Britain's economic problems could have been carried forward?

The reality is that, even as the Prime Minister talks partnership, he and his colleagues practise division. When the Chancellor talks of confidence, he breeds despair. How can anyone have confidence in the Chancellor after all that he has said and done? He is the Chancellor who sees little green shoots that are not there. He then protests, like a true believer in unidentified flying objects, "They were there—I saw them—yes, I did, But they have gone now." He then goes to the Treasury Select Committee and says, "Other people saw them too."

No wonder that the Chancellor's colleague, the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden), wrote in yesterday's edition of The Daily Telegraph:

> "People will never quite believe what the Government tells them again."

We do not believe what the Government say in their gloss on the autumn statement. We have had not a budget for growth, but a statement for stagnation. On the Government's own admission, the statement will condemn thousands more of our fellow citizens to the despair of unemployment, bankruptcies and house repossessions. The statement fails because it leaves people and resources idle, not mobilised as they should be to respond to unmet needs.

The Opposition have clearly stated what is needed for Britain's recovery. The ingredients are: real partnership in place of division; a jobs programme in place of unemployment; quality training in place of cheap labour schemes; public investment in place of spending cuts; homes in place of homelessness; a Europe-wide expansion programme in place of the wasted Tory presidency; a managed exchange rate in place of free market floating; and a positive energy policy in place of pit closures.

We need active government for sustained economic success, instead of the incompetent meandering of a Government who have broken their election promises, failed the economy and deceived the British people. The autumn statement once again confirms the Conservative party as the party of economic failure and mass unemployment. The Government should be rejected in the Lobby tomorrow, as surely as they are rejected by the British people.

9.38 pm

The Paymaster General (Sir John Cope): I can agree with the first few words of the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) in which he said that we have had an interesting and wide-ranging first day's debate. Thereafter, I differ from him. The hon. Gentleman recycled some of the speech that he made yesterday on the Ways and Means motion on car tax. He again asked me about the abolition of car tax. The answer is the one that I gave the hon. Gentleman last night and the one that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor gave to the House today. We certainly do not intend to anticipate the Budget at this stage. Still less do we intend to anticipate its effects based on the forecasts of the hon. Gentleman or anybody else.

Hon. Members have expressed concern about the continuing recession. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor recently emphasised that that concern is shared by the Government. As everybody knows, the economic background is difficult not only for us but for other countries. Our hopes for recovery in the early part of this year have been disappointed. The fact that economic activity in other countries remains weak and the outlook in Europe has worsened further in recent months makes this country's task more difficult, not easier. Our task is to return to sustainable growth without renewed inflationary pressures.

Experience in this country shows only too clearly that growth cannot be sustained unless inflation is controlled, and we all want sustainable recovery. Retail price inflation has fallen rapidly over the past two years from almost 11 per cent. in autumn 1990 to 3·6 per cent. in October this year, while underlying inflation is only marginally higher at 3·8 per cent. Both those percentages are below the European Community average, and producer price inflation and underlying earnings growth are both lower than they have been for a generation. This progress was achieved during a period when our anti-inflationary policies were bolstered by sterling's membership of the exchange rate mechanism. The turbulent events that culminated in the suspension of that membership have not diminished our determination to prevent any resurgence of inflationary pressures, and we have recognised the need for clear yardsticks by which we can judge monetary conditions, and by which others can judge our monetary stance. As a result, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has introduced a measure that Britain has never had before —an explicit target range for underlying inflation of 1 to 4 per cent. As the House knows, we intend to be in the lower part of that range by the end of the current Parliament. We have also established a monitoring range for M4 to go alongside our target range for M0.

As well as clearly laying out our objectives and the indicators on which we intend to concentrate, we have introduced considerably greater openness into the process by which interest rate decisions are taken.

The battle against inflation is never over and we must always be on our guard if we are to ensure that we can compete effectively with the best of our competitors in Europe and beyond. The good progress that we have made and the considerable downward pressures on inflation still in the pipeline have allowed my right hon. Friend to present to the House in his autumn statement a clear, comprehensive strategy for sustainable growth which has been widely welcomed.

We have responded with a considered reduction of interest rates and an imaginative package of measures designed to restore confidence and boost sectors of industry that have been particularly hard hit by the recession. We have done so without throwing away financial discipline because that would unleash a new burst of inflation and kill the recovery that everybody wants to see. We have made the package time limited so as not to impede the reduction in the PSBR that will occur as the economy recovers. We are well aware that persistent, high PSBRs would have the effect of passing a heavy burden of public sector debt to future generations. That is why it is also vital to continue to exercise tight control over public sector spending, as we have done in this round.

Some hon. Members expressed concern about the high level of the public sector borrowing requirement this year and the forecast for next year. No one in the Treasury is in the least complacent about the PSBR, but it will fall back as the economy recovers. As we all know, it compares badly with what we were able to achieve before, but our tough attitudes to public spending over the past decade mean that the United Kingdom now has the lowest Government debt in the European Community, except for Luxembourg, as a proportion of our GDP, and one that is lower than those of the other G7 countries. That will help us to sustain a high public sector borrowing requirement to get us through the recession. In any case, as has been pointed out, the planned growth of public expenditure is well within the potential growth rate of the economy. This ensures that the ratio of general Government expenditure to gross domestic product will fall and that will, in itself, help us to deal with the PSBR.

Mr. Hain: May I draw the Minister's attention to page 53 of the autumn statement, in which it is said that unemployment will be 2·8 million not only in the next financial year, but for the two subsequent financial years? That is an incredible figure and if it were breached, it would drive a coach and horses through the Government's public finances and put extra burdens on the PSBR. Can he name one independent authoritative forecaster who agrees that unemployment will remain at that total?

Sir John Cope: I am following the usual convention in saying that I am speaking about unemployment later, if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me for not replying to his point now.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) rightly congratulated the Chancellor on the fact that this will be the last traditional autumn statement. My right hon. Friend has instituted some profound and important reforms in the way that the Treasury organises its business and that the Government's financial decisions are made. The importance of these reforms has been under-estimated, and it is important that they are not. Merging the tax decisions of the Budget and the expenditure decisions of the autumn round into one joint process is not easy. Apart from anything else, the ancient seasonal organisation of Parliament is being totally reorganised, and we all know the difficulties involved in changing this place.

The second major change that the autumn statement embodies is the new method of settling expenditure from the top down instead of collecting departmental bids first. We can add to the reform list the new, more open methods of handling monetary policy, to which I have referred, the coming changes in the Government's accounts to distinguish between capital and revenue and the new changes in the rules for private finance of investment that is normally in the public sector. All these reforms have been introduced by my right hon. Friend and he deserves full credit for the biggest set of improvements to our financial decision-making process for many decades, if not for a century.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): Did my hon. Friend see the parliamentary question that I tabled the other day? In it, I pointed out that only Ireland and ourselves still have a tax year that does not run with the calendar year. May I invite my hon. Friend to go a little further and bring that into line as well, because that is a much-needed reform?

Sir John Cope: We are open to suggestions, but not at the moment. We have noted my hon. Friend's point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mrs. Chaplin) referred to the changes in the rules for private finance, of which I have just spoken, and to the fact that most of the projects mentioned in this connection have to do with transport. She expressed the hope that they will go much wider. I assure my hon. Friend that they will. In some of the material that we have put out about this proposal, specific mention is made of the package of housing market measures and the lower housing association grant rates, of allowing British Rail to lease some £150 million worth of new rolling stock, provided that suitable leases are offered, and of ending the prohibition on borrowing by higher education institutions. That proposal also includes the national health service, so it goes much further than just transport.

Mr. Andrew Smith: The House deserves to know whether nurses' increments are included within the 1½ per cent. pay policy and how much money the Government are setting aside to pay for them.

Sir John Cope: Settlements are the basis of the pay policy. Existing performance pay will continue within the wages bill, but of course new performance pay arrangements and new arrangements of that kind will count against the 1½ per cent.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way now?

Sir John Cope: No, I have very little time. I gave up some of my time to allow other right hon. and hon. Members to comment, but I want to respond to many of the points raised during the debate. It is quite clear that the 1½ per cent. applies to settlements.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) expressed elegantly, as always, philosophic doubts about public sector borrowing and other matters, to which we shall pay careful attention.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) expressed concern about local authority capital receipts. As he knows, the capital receipts rules were introduced in 1990 as part of the new local authority capital finance scheme, with the objective of bringing capital spending under control. Local authorities were required to set aside a proportion of their capital receipts to repay their debts.

Some local authorities did so, and it would be wrong and unfair on local authorities that took the prudent course of repaying debts from their set-aside receipts to allow others that accumulated receipts to use them. That is why the new arrangements apply to future receipts, so that people know in advance what is going to happen to them.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) advanced his own plan for the pay of Members of Parliament. It was ingenious, but built more on the measures in the autumn statement than was intended. In any case, that matter is for the House.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way now?

Sir John Cope: No. I made it clear that I will not give way because I have little time left.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Woking raised also the question of interest charged by banks, as did other right hon. and hon. Members. The Government take very seriously complaints that banks are not passing on base rate cuts, particularly to small firms. It is not for the Government to intervene in individual negotiations, but my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is taking the matter up again with the clearing banks and plans to meet their chairmen in the near future. He has also asked the Bank of England to review the latest position as quickly as possible. When a review was undertaken last year, it was shown that small firms had benefited from base rate cuts —but clearly it is time to check the position again.

The hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) referred to road building and the Severn bridge. The second Severn crossing, which is being built between the hon. Gentleman's constituency and mine, is an example of private finance being used in a particularly imaginative way to assist the road building programme. The hon. Gentleman welcomed the ending of car tax, on which the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) poured scorn earlier. In this instance, the hon. Member for Newport, East is in the majority, both in the House and elsewhere, in welcoming that development.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) drew attention to some supply-side measures involving the property market, and we shall certainly ponder those. The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) raised a series of issues, some of which I have already touched on; one however, was the cost of security. I have personal reason to remember what terrorism costs, in terms not only of cash but of confidence—as well as the tremendous personal cost paid by people in Northern Ireland. I shall draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to the two road projects in the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

A number of hon. Members—including the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson)—mentioned unemployment. I think that the hon. Member for Hartlepool misread the position slightly, but I have discovered that he is usually fairly accurate, and it may turn out when I read Hansard that I did not hear him correctly. The point is, however, that despite the increase in unemployment over recent quarters—which we all regret—long-term unemployment is still about one third lower than its peak six years ago. The object of sustained growth is to bring down unemployment; as has been pointed out by a number of hon. Members—including the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mrs. Jackson), it will not be quick or easy, but there is no quick or easy way to do it.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) made some important points about Japanese investment, which has been very valuable.

Mr. Hain: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Sir John Cope: I would rather not. I am within about four minutes of the end of my speech.

I was about to say that Japanese investment has been extremely valuable in providing jobs, and in other ways.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) was, as usual, well out of line with his party. That is no surprise, of course. Far from thinking devaluation a bad thing, as some people appear to, the hon. Gentleman appeared to consider 16 per cent. devaluation no more than marginal, and to believe that a much more substantial devaluation was required. Everyone is entitled to his opinion, but if massive devaluation were the sole answer to the United Kingdom's problems, a glance at the exchange rates over the past 30 to 40 years would lead us to suppose that the economy was very strong. I am not prepared to accept the hon. Gentleman's recipe for sustained recovery, or any sort of recovery, and I doubt whether any Opposition Members accept it either.

The hon. Gentleman presented an ingenious method of spending money without having to raise it. I confess that I did not quite follow it, but it seemed to amount to printing money and bringing about inflation. It was all very interesting, but not very relevant to what the rest of us want.

The hon. Member for Hillsborough spoke of urban programmes. She said, correctly, that £176 million would be available in 1993-94. She many not have noticed the extra spending on city challenge, which is being introduced as part of the package. Including that money, a total of £408 million will be available for urban-priority authorities, compared with £319 million this year. That is not counting the additional spending power from capital receipts—more than £500 million—that will result from the relaxations announced last week. Moreover, the resources for the urban programme in 1993-94 allow £20 million for new projects, over and above existing commitments. That money would be allocated through capital partnership to work alongside the capital receipts money that I have mentioned.

All in all, the debate has been interesting but the Labour party, having spent the summer arguing about whether its economic policy or its presentational skills had lost it the election, has not altered its economic policy since, so far as I can see, although the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East shouts about it louder than we are used to, which is a particular punishment for those of us who sit on the Government Front Bench.

Opposition Members seem to have a new dilemma. In facing the autumn statement, they cannot decide whether to attack our policies or to claim the credit for them. The result is that they do both. It has been impossible to tell——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Oil Exploration (Compensation to Fishermen)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

10 pm

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): I thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker and, through you, Madam Speaker for granting me the Adjournment debate. I was asked by the fishermen of the Isle of Wight to inquire discreetly whether Madam Speaker enjoys lobster or crab from time to time, because they wish to make a donation to her for granting me the debate. No doubt I can make discreet inquiries to that end via Hansard.

I apologise to the Minister for Energy for bringing him to the Dispatch Box on the issue, because he has been extremely helpful. There was a stage when I thought that the whole matter was settled.

To recap, on 4 June in the House of Commons I met Mr. Romieu, the chairman and managing director of Elf Enterprise. I told him how concerned I was that there was not a proper compensation scheme in place for the inshore fishermen who were affected by the oil exploration that was taking place off the Isle of Wight. He wrote to me on 10 June and accepted that there was a need for an ex gratia payment. On page 2 of his letter he said:

> "With the list complete, we will also agree with the fishermen concerned, not all of whom belong to associations"—

I underline that point—

> "a fair and equitable system of ex gratia payment from Elf Enterprise to secure their co-operation."

In the final paragraph he said:

> "It is deeply disappointing to me that you have been angered as a result of the representations made to you by fishermen in your constituency concerning our activity. As a responsible company, it is clearly our intention to deal with their concerns, and in so doing achieve the same level of co-operation established during the 98/13 exploration programme."

That exploration was carried out by Occidental Oil which was taken over by Elf Enterprise.

On 22 June I wrote to my hon. Friend in the Department of Trade and Industry and told him that we were becoming increasingly disillusioned with Elf as it had not set out the terms of its compensation scheme. I enclosed with my letter a copy of the latest letter that I had received from the fishermen's association. I told my hon. Friend that we felt that Elf was being deliberately obstructive, particularly as the same individuals were involved in the Elf compensation scheme for fishermen as had been concerned with the Occidental scheme, because they were taken over when Elf took over Occidental. That was of great concern because effectively they had been through the exercise once before with island fishermen.

However, everything looked much brighter after a while—thanks, I am sure, to my hon. Friend's intervention. On 10 July, therefore, I was able to write the following letter to him:

> "Dear Tim, You have won first prize in the 'most helpful' Minister competition for this session and the fishermen and the Member for the Isle of Wight are pleased to acknowledge this by awarding you one week's holiday at the Field hovel during the coming recess . . . Thank you and a thousand crustacea owe their lives to you!"

Unfortunately, my enthusiasm was a little premature. I could not possibly read into the record the Minister's reply. He is already under a great deal of pressure from the energy world, and I feel certain that the population lobby would be immediately on his back, were they to see the contents of his reply.

As for the contents of the correspondence with one of my fishermen, I can assure my hon. Friend that I have prepared for him copies of all the correspondence with just one fisherman who now finds himself without full compensation. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that, having carefully scrutinised all the documents the fishermen brought to me, I found that they were all the same.

This particular fisherman received a letter on 6 July from Elf Enterprise. It was a "Dear Sir" letter and it set out the way in which the compensation scheme would operate. It worked like this. There was to be a £4,000 lump sum payment on an ex gratia basis to bona fide fishermen or chartered skippers who regularly worked in the area and who were certified to do so by the local fishermen's association. There was to be £2,000 up front straight away on signing the agreement and £2,000 at the end of the survey, providing there had been no further disruption —the point being that both I and certain others had encouraged the fishermen in their blockade of the seismic survey because we had been unable to obtain a proper compensation scheme from Elf. Therefore, Elf said that it would make half the payment available as a sign of its good will straight away, as soon as all the fishermen had signed up, and that it would pay the balance at the end, provided that there was no more disruption to the work during the rest of the survey—which proved to be the case.

Elf produced the agreement on the same day, 6 July. There are a number of points in the agreement, but the real point concerns item 5 which says:

> "The Company may be requested by the Inland Revenue to supply details of any such cooperation payment. Such details will only be supplied on request."

Item 6 says:

> "Payment will be made on the basis of information disclosed to the Company by the Skipper or Owner or his representative organisation and set forth below."

The information required relates to details of the skipper-owner, the address, the name of the vessel, the type of fishing, full or part-time, the average days fished in the survey area per month and the association to which he belongs.

The agreement contains a number of other points, including the fact that it is governed by English law. Nowhere in the agreement, however, which is absolutely standard and which was used for all the fishermen, is there any suggestion that the fisherman has to provide certified accounts, and the like, in order to obtain these payments —one of the points in contention.

My hon. Friend will have noted carefully the point that I made at the beginning: that the managing director of Elf was certain that a compensation scheme would be provided that would be available not just to members of the fishermen's association but to other fishermen. However, a number of fishermen have had no compensation. An attempt is being made by the oil company to suggest that those fishermen have not been certified, so to speak, by the fishermen's association.

I have a letter of 30 September from the Isle of Wight Commercial Fisherman's Association which says:

> "I have been requested to contact you to confirm that the people named below are members of the above association. They attended a meeting with representatives from the Elf Enterprise Company when they were told that ALL persons whose name appeared on the list that was prepared that evening would receive co-operation payments.
> The persons named below have been greatly inconvenienced by the survey resulting in a significant decrease in their earnings."

When I first asked for the Adjournment debate this evening, I thought that I might produce a list of all the people who have been affected, or who have either not been paid or not been fully paid. I then realised that that was a treacherous course to follow because the list might not be exhaustive. I do not intend to go down that path this evening. However, I know the principal players in the problem.

We must bear it in mind that a number of fishermen have received no compensation despite the fact that they signed the agreement, the fact that they are members of the association and the fact that they went along to meetings. Their request for compensation has been refused point blank.

Joy of joys, those fishermen then received a letter from Elf Enterprise thanking them for their great co-operation during the survey and for all the assistance they had given. I wrote a rather strong letter to Elf Enterprise and received a letter back from Mr. Jackson, the marine operations manager, who is one of the serious problems in this matter. He replied to me on 14 October as follows:

> "The purpose of our letters dated the 1, 5 and 12 of October, sent out to all 207 individuals on our contact list was to keep people informed of the progress of the survey, which has been repeatedly delayed by inclement weather. Any misunderstanding that might have arisen as a result of receipt of these letters by fishermen who have not been made an offer of payment is regretted."

One does not have to be a genius or to know much about inshore fishermen or fishermen the world over to know that having refused them compensation payments and then to write to thank them for their co-operation is to invite a fairly robust retort. The fishermen were pretty irritated, to say the least, and so was I. By then, I had come to expect a rather lackadaisical attitude from Elf.

There were then letters dated 14 October. I do not know whether they were all sent on the same date, but they were all of the same nature. The company, under the heading pointed out where the meeting was to take place, the venue, the time and all the information that the fishermen had to produce to get paid. The company asked about the local authority licence for the carriage of passengers—charter only—the record of charter bookings, vessel logbooks and diaries. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that none of that information was required in the original agreement.

By then, the Isle of Wight Commercial Fisherman's Association was pretty angry with Elf. It sent me a copy of its letter to Elf which was dated 24 October. The association quite rightly makes the point as follows:

> "The agreement that you made with the fishermen was for non-interruption of the survey and as you already know, our members have given you their fullest support in this. We would expect you to honour your side of the agreement as expediently as possible and not put further matters of contention in the way of this final settlement."

By then, the list had become extensive and there was great concern among the fishermen—I also felt great concern —that the company was asking for more and more information which was not contained in the original agreement.

The piece de resistance was served on 30 October, with the same heading. The simple, one-paragraph letter, said:

> "I refer to our meeting . . . and confirm that we will be unable to pay the second instalment of Cooperation Payment due under the terms of our Agreement dated 6 July until you provide certified accounts and fish sales notes, as requested in my letter . . . to substantiate the information originally provided by you and which forms part of the Agreement between us."

None of that information was mentioned in the original agreement.

On 21 October, I wrote to Mr. Jackson in Aberdeen and I said that I did not think that the correspondence would bear public scrutiny. I thought that it was rather perverse to say the least that letters had been sent to fishermen who had not been offered payment. That showed abominable administration and something that I had come to expect from Elf after my dealings with the company. I felt that if I could not get a more positive answer from him or from the managing director Mr. Romieu I would have no alternative but to raise the matter in Parliament.

I did not want to trouble my hon. Friend the Minister yet again because he had been very helpful. An hon. Member should not have to come to Parliament to try to negotiate on behalf of his constituents if an oil company is a reputable organisation. Clearly the company is involved in serious matters in respect of North sea safety and one hopes that one deals with reputable people when one deals with big public companies.

I eventually received a reply from the managing director dated 12 November and I want to quote two paragraphs from that letter. I apologise to the House for quoting at such length from documents, but they are clearly germane to the problem. The managing director wrote:

> "It should not be forgotten that we had as much right to carry out our survey as they had to fish, and there was no obligation on us to make any payments at all."

I draw the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister to that point because I think that he and I might disagree with the managing director of Elf about that—at least, I hope so. The managing director continued:

> "Nevertheless, we recognised that some disruption would be inevitable and we therefore proposed a scheme to make co-operation payments to bona fide mobile gear fishermen nominated by their associations."

In almost the last paragraph he wrote:

> "Having said all of the above, I accept that, during the course of such a large and complex scheme it is entirely possible that some individual cases have not been dealt with as fairly as we should have wished. If this is so I can only express my regret, and assure you that we have made every effort to deal in good faith with all the claims which we have received."

I enjoy watching free enterprise flourish in our nation and there is no reason why we should have come to this dreadful impasse. I do not believe that Elf has made a serious endeavour to accommodate the fishermen.

The managing director says in his letter, quite rightly, that the company has paid out nearly £1 million in compensation to fishermen. I doubt whether, absolutely top whack tonight, we are talking about more than £30,000. The figure has been very exaggerated.

I understand that the company's parting shot to my constituents was that it intended to come back. It hoped to win licences for further exploration and perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister has some information about that. It is extraordinary that the company did not want to leave the sweet smell of a nice bunch of violets behind instead of the great problems and difficulty which are ongoing and have caused upset and real aggravation to me and to my constituents.

The gnomes of Zurich were rather troublesome to the Government in the past. However, Elf Aquitaine is clearly the mafia cousin of the gnomes of Zurich in respect of the inshore fishing industry off the Isle of Wight. I believe that the company has turned out to be a piker because it has not honoured its agreement in the way that the managing director assured me that it would when representatives met me in the House on 4 June.

As I represent the numerically largest constituency in the House, I must be very careful how I ration my applications for Adjournment debates. There are many pressing issues facing the Isle of Wight. Endeavouring to wring out the last few coppers of a compensation scheme from a large multinational oil company is not in my view a justified use of my time or that of my ministerial colleague tonight. I am very sad that this debate has been necessary.

10.18 pm

The Minister for Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) for not reading out my reply to his kind invitation to join him in what he termed his hovel. I am not sure whether the size of my family would have borne the scrutiny that the House would apply. I must thank my hon. Friend for his very kind personal remarks about my small role in this affair and in turn pay tribute to him for the way in which he has fought on behalf of the fishermen and his constituents.

This is an interesting matter and, before this debate, it had not received much attention or time in the House. It might be useful if I briefly explain exactly how the licensing system works with regard to fishermen's interests.

The standard conditions which are incorporated in seaward petroleum licences are published before the blocks are offered for licensing. Those standard conditions do not include any requirement for the licensees to make payments, either as compensation or otherwise, to commercial fishermen, or indeed to any other marine interests.

As a matter of policy, the Department does not regard it as appropriate to place requirements on petroleum licensees to pay compensation to fishermen for loss of access to fishing grounds. Oil and gas licensees are no less entitled than fishermen to pursue their activities on the open seas. If the licensees and fishing organisations agree in certain circumstances that some form of payment would be helpful, that is essentially a commercial matter for them.

However, fishing interests are taken account of in the planning of licensing rounds and when licences are awarded. The licences include a standard clause to the effect that the licensee shall not carry out operations in such manner as to interfere unjustifiably with fishing or with the conservation of the living resources of the sea. To help to give substance to that provision, my Department consults the fishing departments and the principal fishing organisations to identify fishing sensitivities before deciding which blocks are to be offered for licensing. It also consults other organisations about other sensitivities, for example, environmental matters.

Where the fisheries departments advise that special conditions should be attached to licences, tailor made to the particular sensitivities in certain blocks, that advice is followed. For instance, where blocks lie in herring spawning grounds, for example off the east coast, the licensees are required to carry out seabed surveys within a prescribed distance of any proposed drilling location to ensure that drilling will not disturb the spawning grounds. In the spawning season in such areas, conditions are imposed as to the time of year in which they can undertake seismic work or drill, and the use of certain drilling muds may be required in the case of drilling.

Licence-specific conditions, where applied, touch on compensation in one limited respect. If oil-related debris is located on the routes taken by supply vessels to and from rigs, and it results in damage to fishing gear, the licensees are required to deal promptly with claims in respect of that damage.

A further indication of the recognition in the licensing arrangements of fishing interests is that we require licensees to nominate a fishing liaison officer to maintain contact with those interests.

So care is taken to ensure that fishing interests are properly taken into account in our licensing arrangements. What we seek to achieve by our consultations and by provisions tailor made to particular blocks is a situation where there is mutual accommodation between those two groups of sea users.

Perhaps my hon. Friend would like to reflect whether his fishing constituents would really wish for formal compensation arrangements. I understand that that is not the position or an aim of the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations. The federation has been developing an understanding with the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association on the subject of compensation.

I have received from the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations a fax, which states that the organisation

> "has its reservations with regard to the adjournment debate since it has established a clear working relationship with UKOOA on the subject of compensation which takes account of lost earnings in the given area and the likely effects of restrictions to access. The NFFO is, therefore, prepared to liaise directly with the Isle of Wight Commercial Fisherman's Association in order to attempt to reconcile the various difficulties."

Mr. Field: The NFFO telephoned me this week and said that it had attempted to negotiate on behalf of my fishermen. I pointed out that it had been nowhere near the scene. The matter had been in all the national papers and every television channel in the south, yet we did not hear a dicky bird from the association. Indeed, we did not hear from it in the initial stages when we had exactly the same problem with Occidental. The NFFO's association with UKOOA is laughable. The fishermen with whom it said that it had been in contact were not affected by the most recent licence.

Mr. Eggar: My point was simply that over the years the NFFO has had experience of similar disruption caused by seismic surveys. It has developed a relationship with the oil companies. Not invariably, but in general, that relationship has worked reasonably well and has proved satisfactory to both parties.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Eggar: I will give way, but I have many matters to cover in a short time.

Mr. Morley: The Minister has been fair. The NFFO and, in the first instance, the local association negotiates. The federation offers its services to bring the matter to a conclusion. So the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) was a little unfair.

Mr. Field: I must object. This is my Adjournment debate and the hon. Gentleman did not ask my permission to intervene. The organisation to which he refers and seeks to defend——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. The person who has the Floor decides whether to allow an intervention.

Mr. Eggar: I apologise to my hon. Friend for giving way to the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley). It is a difficult matter and I do not want to upset anyone. None the less, there is a national organisation and it has evolved a system. It could have a role in the final resolution of the matter to which my hon. Friend refers. I do not seek to impose that, or anything else. I hear what my hon. Friend has to say about the role that the national organisation has played.

The petroleum licence given to the company includes not only a right but an obligation to undertake seismic surveys. Surveys are necessary under the terms of the licence. The company must undertake a seismic survey in order properly to appreciate the potential of the block. In this case, the company chose to pursue a 3-D seismic survey, which takes rather a long time but is believed by the industry to give a fairer and more accurate picture of the potential of that block. That perhaps accounts for the fact that the time taken has been rather longer in this instance than might otherwise have been the case.

I emphasise to my hon. Friend that, although I have been in contact with the company about the matter, it is the company's responsibility to decide how to respond to the application and the representations made by my hon. Friend and the fishing organisation. I am told that the company had more than 30 meetings with fishermen's organisations. I am aware that my hon. Friend took the view that the consultation was not sufficiently wide.

My hon. Friend may be aware that Elf Enterprise has undertaken, in addition to reaching agreement in principle with the organisations on compensation, to fund research into the migratory patterns of sea bass in the area. That might be of some help to the local fishermen. I understand that payments made by the company to the fishermen have totalled more than £1 million. That is not an inconsiderable sum. I am told that the company has spent a total of about £3 million on the entire seismic operation. So the payments to fishermen represent 30-odd per cent. of the total cost of the seismic operation.

The company has no obligation under the terms of the licence or in law to pay any compensation. Like my hon. Friend, I take the view that, where there is proven disruption, it is appropriate for the company to compensate. However, it is not unreasonable for the company to seek to satisfy itself that the money that it pays over is justified in terms of the fishermen's activities. I do not say that to defend the company, but because it can offset some 80 per cent. of the cost of compensation against tax payable to Her Majesty's Government. So we all have an interest as taxpayers in ensuring that the company pays a fair sum.

I listened carefully to my hon. Friend and I shall ensure that the Hansard report of the debate is passed on to the company. I hope that some satisfactory conclusions will be reached by all parties.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Visitors (Pakistan)

1. Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons from Pakistan sought to enter the United Kingdom as visitors in the last year; and how many were refused entry.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Wardle): In the year ending August 1992, there were some 67,000 admissions of Pakistani visitors at United Kingdom ports; 371 were refused entry and removed. It is likely that the majority of them were visitors.

Mr. Chisholm: That is a high refusal rate. Why are 8·5 per cent. of visitors to this country from the black Commonwealth, while 54 per cent. of refusals are from those same countries? Does the Minister realise that, once people have been refused they will probably never be able to enter because it is marked in their passports? Does he accept that the situation will get much worse if appeal rights are abolished and immigration officers become completely unconstrained?

Mr. Wardle: It has been made absolutely clear to immigration officers that none of their decisions should be based on questions of race, creed or colour. The hon. Gentleman asked about Pakistan. In the case of that country, 78 per cent. of applicants for visit visas last year were successful, 22 per cent. were unsuccessful initially, and just 2 per cent. of those were granted visas on appeal.

Mr. David Evans: Is my hon. Friend aware that the British people are not interested in those who are refused entry but in those who are allowed in and are now here illegally? We want to know whether they are here permanently and whether they are drawing social security. We all know that the lot opposite will let anybody in. When will the asylum Bill be put in place?

Mr. Wardle: My hon. Friend will know that the immigration and nationality department has a most effective and hard-working enforcement department and that this country welcomes visitors from all over the world. Last year, some 5·5 million visitors were welcomed to this country, including more than 215,000 from the subcontinent.

Mr. Allen: Is the Minister aware that black British, Asian British and other ethnic minority British are seething with anger at the Government's proposal to abolish the right of appeal for visitors seeking to come to this country? Some 1,500 visitors from the subcontinent alone won their appeals last year. Why are the Government now abolishing the right of appeal, rather than correcting the process that brings it about? Is it because there is a hidden agenda from the European Community—the Schengen group, the Trevi group, and the ad hoc committee of Ministers? Will he come clean on why the Government are abolishing the right of appeal, when visitors are refused entry to our country?

Mr. Wardle: As usual, the hon. Gentleman is long on invective and short on substance. Removing appeal rights for visitors will improve the fairness and effectiveness of the immigration appeals system by enabling decisions to be concentrated on matters that are of fundamental importance to people's lives, such as questions of settlement or deportation.

Police Pay

2. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the Police Federation to discuss the pay and conditions of police officers.

7. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to receive the report of the Sheehy inquiry.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I last met representatives of the Police Federation on 28 September. We discussed a number of matters, including the Sheehy inquiry which I have asked to report to me by the end of May 1993.

Mr. Nicholson: My right hon. and learned Friend will be aware that the Police Federation represents the thin blue line which, even in Avon and Somerset, stands between the community and a rising tide of crime, including drug abuse. Is he aware that, at a recent meeting in my constituency with representatives of the Police Federation, I found that they were concerned about his proposal, on which we still await details, to take away from the police the registration and processing of applications for firearms certificates? Will my right hon. and learned Friend think carefully about that? Is he aware that for rural districts I believe that the police are the best people to consider who should and should not be trusted with firearms? In particular will he give an assurance to the House that he will not allow the manufacturers and retailers of firearms to have any influence over the processing of firearms certificates?

Mr. Clarke: Of course, I realise that the Police Federation is a responsible organisation, as was shown by its welcome to the Sheehy inquiry and its recent recognition of the need to accept a 1·5 per cent. pay restraint on behalf of its members in the interests of helping to revive the national economy. We are out to consultation on the issue of whether we should have a civilian firearms board and have not yet reached a conclusion. I am attracted by the idea of a civilian firearms board as it would release police officers for more direct policing responsibilities, but we need to recruit the necessary experts onto the board. I have not yet made a decision and I shall bear in mind submissions from the Police Federation in Somerset before I reach a conclusion.

Mr. Mackinlay: Is the Home Secretary aware of the continuing anxiety among police officers that the setting up of the Sheehy committee of inquiry may prejudice their pay and conditions of service? Will he reiterate to the House the categorical assurance that he gave to the Police Federation at its conference in May that the Sheehy inquiry will in no way alter or jeopardise the pay or other conditions of service of police officers in England and Wales, and elsewhere in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Clarke: I certainly gave no assurance in those terms. I said that the time had come to have such an inquiry into pay, terms and conditions of service, rank structure and other factors within the police force. The Edmund-Davies arrangements served their purpose extremely well, and the Government implemented them. The arrangements had a dramatic effect on the pay and recruitment of police in the 1980s. The Edmund-Davies arrangements have fulfilled their purpose, and the Sheehy inquiry is taking a fresh approach to settling the pay, terms and conditions of policemen in order to produce an effective, efficient and well-motivated force for the 1990s.

Mr. Shersby: Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall that, following his speech to the Police Federation conference in May this year, a warm welcome was given to his remarks about working with police officers and ensuring that they were properly paid for the dangerous job that they do? When responding to my right hon. and learned Friend's speech the chairman of the federation made it clear that the federation welcomed the establishment of the Sheehy inquiry as the federation had been calling for many years for an inquiry by means of a royal commission into the terms and conditions of the police.

Mr. Clarke: That is exactly so. My hon. Friend was at the conference, and he and I remember the occasion well. The Police Federation made an extremely responsible and forthcoming response stating that it welcomed the inquiry and accepted the need to look at issues such as fair share of rewards for responsibilities, rank structures and other factors. The Police Federation has been submitting constructive evidence to that inquiry and we all await its outcome in May next year.

Mr. Blair: Is not the real problem that the police—like everyone else—face soaring levels of crime? Three times as many crimes are committed as are recorded, and there are 15 million crimes a year in Britain. Does not the Home Secretary recognise that, instead of the changes becoming an excuse for the Government to pass the buck to the police, the Government and Ministers have the responsibility to produce a strategy to cut crime and make our community safe?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman has the figures slightly wrong. There is nothing new about more crime being committed. There has been no change under any Government for centuries, when more crimes have been committed than reported. There is a maze of fairly useless criminal statistics and we are trying to make them clearer. If we consider the "British Crime Survey", the only accurate guide to the level of crime, we see that crime has —I accept—risen by about 20 per cent. in the past 10 years. We are suffering the same experience as every other developed society—rising criminality occurs in the richer and more developed countries of the world, particularly in western Europe and northern America. The Government respond by having an efficient and effective police force that they support, and by introducing reforms to the criminal justice law to keep it up to date and reforms to the prison system. We shall have and maintain an extremely effective policy on protecting the country against the problem of rising criminality.

Stolen Firearms

3. Mr. Ashby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the number of firearms stolen in the last three years for which statistics are available.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Recorded offences of burglary and theft in which firearms were reported to have been stolen were 1,774 for 1989, 2,024 for 1990, and 2,410 for 1991. It is possible that more than one firearm may have been stolen in some cases.

Mr. Ashby: Those are very worrying statistics, showing an increase in the theft of firearms. Is my hon. Friend aware that I sent the Department details of a disabling device that can be fitted to shotguns so that any shotgun with such a device could no longer be used for crime—and stolen guns will be used for crime? Instead of fobbing me off, when will the Department instigate a proper evaluation of the device and make it mandatory for all with shotgun certificates?

Mr. Wardle: There was a 19 per cent. increase between 1990 and 1991, but I hope that my hon. Friend will bear it in mind that controls were considerably strengthened after the introduction of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988. The latest figures are still lower than the figures for the early 1980s. My hon. Friend's recommendations will be considered and passed to the Firearms Consultative Committee.

Mr. Lewis: Is the Minister aware that in my area eight handguns were stolen from one source not many months ago, and that two have already turned up having claimed three lives? I suggest stricter controls on how many handguns can be held by one person—eight magnums in one flat seems a ludicrous number. Secondly, a court case is proceeding involving one of those stolen handguns, and the original owner of the gun has demanded it back even though it was used in one of the killings. That, too, is ludicrous; will the Minister put a block on it as far as is humanly possible?

Mr. Wardle: The hon. Gentleman's recommendations will be considered by the Firearms Consultative Committee. He will also bear it in mind that just one fifth of 1 per cent of all recorded offences last year involved the use of firearms, and that the Criminal Justice Act 1988 introduced stiffer penalties for the judiciary to use in cases involving the criminal use of firearms.

Mr. Conway: Will my hon. Friend accept from one who served on the Standing Committee that considered the Firearms (Amendment) Bill that there was considerable concern that, despite our best intentions, we would end up with a campaign against legitimate firearms holders in rural areas, particularly farmers and those who enjoy field sports? Does he agree that there is anxiety that if we move away from police certification the intimate knowledge that local police have about genuine holders of firearms in country areas will be lost if a civilian body is set up? Will my hon. Friend tread carefully in the rural parts of Britain?

Mr. Wardle: I hear what my hon. Friend says. He will know that responsibility is vested in the chief officer. The recent consultation paper that proposed a firearms control board spoke of a body of information being stored centrally, rather than constabulary by constabulary. My hon. Friend will know that when we consider responses to that consultation document the interests of public safety will be paramount.

Mr. William Ross: How many of the weapons that the Minister listed as stolen were handguns or bullet-firing weapons? Does he have any evidence that any of them turned up in the hands of terrorist organisations in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Wardle: I cannot answer the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's question now, but I will seek the information and then tell him. Most of the weapons stolen in each of the past 10 years have been air weapons. Fewer than 150 weapons stolen in each of the past five years have been pistols.

Burglaries (Urban Areas)

4. Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to tackle the level of burglaries in urban areas.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Michael Jack): Individual police forces continue to develop anti-burglary policies which reflect the needs of their areas. In addition, the safer cities programme and estate action allow agencies working with the police to tackle a wide range of urban problems, including burglary.

Mr. Ainsworth: Is the Minister aware that according to police statistics there are 95·75 burglaries for every [illegible],000 homes in one of the wards of my constituency? That means that 10 per cent. of the people there can expect to be burgled every year. Would the Minister be as complacent about what the Government are doing if he faced the same problem in his constituency? The Department has sat on the Morgan report for two years and has refused to extend the urban crime allocation fund—indeed, it has stopped it altogether. When will Ministers do something about this appalling situation?

Mr. Jack: I am saddened by the hon. Gentleman's lack of generosity, since Coventry already has a safer cities programme and he will know that the Woodend and Hillfields estate have benefited from improved security as a result of the estate action programme. He will also know that one of those estates has benefited from the expenditure of £185,000 from the safer cities programme on anti-burglary activities and that Coventry council plays its part on the safer cities steering and action group which mirrors what is said in the Morgan report.

Sir John Wheeler: Does my hon. Friend agree that research shows that 5 per cent. of people who are convicted before the courts are responsible for 70 per cent. of crime, that the number one area of the Metropolitan police also confirms that a small number of people are responsible for street crime and opportunist burglaries, and that when the police take those facts into account and organise with the community they can improve the arrest rate and reduce the burglaries?

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend pays proper tribute to the excellent work achieved by Operation Bumblebee. [Interruption.] There is a certain buzz in the tail of my hon. Friend's point, to which Opposition Members should listen. A targeted police approach such as Operation Bumblebee has a real benefit in terms of reducing burglaries.

Mr. Clelland: It is not often that Opposition Members have the opportunity to thank the Government for much, but is the Minister aware of the success of the urban crime fund in fighting crime and improving the relationship between the community and the police in my constituency on Tyneside? Notwithstanding the Secretary of State for the Environment's disgraceful announcement that the urban programme was to be brought to an end, is the Minister actively considering the extension of the urban crime fund? If not, will the Northumbria police force be given additional resources to carry on its good work?

Mr. Jack: I am aware of the programme that the hon. Gentleman describes, and some of the interesting and innovative initiatives involving the community, particularly in some difficult areas such as the Meadowell estate, have shown that the type of community-based policing, which was occasioned by the use of some of the urban crime fund moneys, worked well. But the hon. Gentleman will also know that that programme was introduced on a limited time basis and we will wish to evaluate the lessons learnt from it.

Mrs. Angela Knight: Is my hon. Friend aware of the valuable contribution of neighbourhood watch schemes such as the one in my area? Does he agree that they have been particularly successful in that they make sure that each and every person is aware of his or her responsibility to lock up property properly?

Mr. Jack: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend's continuing support and interest in neighbourhood watch. She will be aware that there is shortly to be a national conference for neighbourhood watch organisers and I have every confidence that the new neighbourhood watch organisers' manual will give all those people who give so generously of their time further guidance to improve their effectiveness in the fight against crime.

Mr. Michael: Does the Minister accept that a project such as the safer cities programme is inadequate to tackle the problems of a city such as Coventry where crime has risen by 29 per cent. in just two years? As house burglaries are up by 16 per cent. nationally compared with last year, up by 25 per cent. in the west midlands and up by more than 50 per cent. in some parts of the country, does the Minister accept that burglary of homes is one of the few growth industries under the Government?

Mr. Jack: Growth in anxiety about burglaries and forms of crime prevention certainly are a concern of the Government. If the hon. Gentleman looked at some of the research that he has been doing through parliamentary questions, he would find that notifiable offences in safer cities areas rose between 1989 and 1991 by 25 per cent. while the national equivalent is 37 per cent. There is an important message there.

Mr. Marlow: Given that the vast majority of urban crime is carried out by pseudo macho little gits who get a kick out of crime, and given that we have no proper solution to the problem, will my hon. Friend consider instituting a punishment of judicial thrashing so that in future they should have a disincentive and a kick of a different sort?

Mr. Jack: In his own inimitable style and language, my hon. Friend has highlighted a point taken up by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary at the Conservative party conference in Brighton when he committed us to the policy of developing a new approach to persistent juvenile offenders. No doubt, when we consider our own recommendations, my hon. Friend's words will ring in our ears.

Terrorism

5. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the current terrorist campaign in England.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government condemn terrorist crime wherever in the United Kingdom it occurs, and support the police and others in their work to secure the conviction of those responsible.

Mr. Trimble: No doubt the Home Secretary has seen recent press reports suggesting that more than 20 tonnes of explosive was available to the Irish republican army in the London area this year. Most of it, thankfully, has been intercepted.

The explosive appears to have been manufactured and assembled largely in the London area, and it takes more than a dozen people to make up a large bomb. Does the Home Secretary agree that such activity is difficult to conceal, and ought to be readily detected by ordinary people who are vigilant?

Mr. Clarke: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have had some spectacular successes in recent weeks in intercepting bombs and explosives. I congratulate the police, security men and others concerned on their courage and vigilance. Obviously, we give no details of operational activity against the IRA, but I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is important for us to succeed in dealing with the IRA members who are operating in London. That requires sustained vigilance on the part of ordinary members of the public, as well as the police service and the security people.

Mr. Bowden: The House has expressed gratitude to my right hon. and learned Friend for praising the brave police officers who have faced armed men when they themselves have nothing but a truncheon. Is he holding discussions with police representatives to see whether anything can be done to improve the provision of rapid back-up with armed men when such incidents happen in the future? Does he agree that they will happen again, probably before Christmas?

Mr. Clarke: Regrettably, in modern circumstances we must deploy armed policemen in operations, and we can do so rapidly. It is best to deploy specially trained men who are disciplined in the use of firearms, and that is done on such occasions. PC Hall and his colleague in Stoke Newington were unarmed and on ordinary patrol; we all admire their courage in facing men who turned out to be armed. I am glad to say that PC Hall is making extremely good progress, and recovering from his injuries.

Mr. Eastham: Does the Home Secretary recognise that nowadays some very sophisticated policing equipment is available in the form of national fingerprint files, computers and communications? When I wrote to the Home Office recently about the budget for such equipment, I was informed that it was contained in the global figure for policing in the Greater Manchester area. That meant that less than 1 per cent. of the total budget was available for sophisticated equipment. Most of the money is being spent on trying to provide and pay for policing.

Mr. Clarke: In fact, considerable progress has been made. The national criminal intelligence service is now up and running, and is providing a very effective and sophisticated operation of intelligence gathering for the whole country. We are making good progress towards computer-aided fingerprint matching, which operates in a number of police authorities now, and we are on course for the introduction of a national system in due course.

Modern technology is being deployed very effectively in the police service. Over the past 10 years, we have sustained a high level of investment in the service, in terms of men, equipment and modern technology.

Roads (Camera Evidence)

6. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions there have been as a result of camera evidence on roads since their inception; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: The police have been asked to provide statistics on automatic enforcement on a quarterly basis, and the first complete information is expected to be available in the first quarter of 1993.

Mr. Greenway: No one supports excessive speeding; however, will my right hon. and learned Friend explain why people travelling through west London pass through no fewer than six spy camera zones between Paddington and the Target roundabout in Northolt, and another six on the way back? In view of the importance of spy camera zones, why are not speed signs much clearer, and why are they placed level with the camera zones where they are shown? Is it police policy to prosecute drivers who are a few mph above the speed limit, or not? Finally, will the policy be to ensure that there is a proper space for a downward transition on the A40 from high to low speeds —say from 60 to 40 mph—rather than the few yards that are provided in some places at present?

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend has asked a number of questions and I shall do my best to address them. He should bear it in mind that 13 per cent. of accidents are associated with red light running and 33 per cent. with excessive speed. To make the best use of scarce police manpower, automatic systems have been introduced. There are five cameras on the A40—two on traffic light jumping and three on speed. My hon. Friend knows that prosecution is a matter for the police. If he has any queries, I am sure that he will wish to take them up with the chief officer of the Metropolitan police. As for signposting, an inventory was carried out before the introduction of the cameras and improved signing was installed.

Dr. Marek: Does the Minister agree that the speed laws should be obeyed and that rather than campaigning to cut the number of cameras, we ought to increase the number so that people from Ealing who do 90 mph in the fast lane of the A40 are brought to book and do not threaten the life and limb of the rest of us?

Mr. Jack: The hon. Gentleman does a disservice to the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway). People other than those from Ealing use the A40, but the hon. Gentleman is right to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the use of this type of equipment is designed to improve road safety. As I have already said, 33 per cent. of road accidents are the result of excessive speed.

Police Authorities

8. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reorganise county police authorities along regional lines; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are considering a range of issues concerning the future of the police service, including the role and structure of police authorities. We have yet to reach firm conclusions.

Mr. Dunn: The Home Secretary will know that, in the context of the organisation of police forces, I belong firmly to the school which says that reforms are all very well so long as nothing is changed. Can my right hon. and learned Friend give me an absolute guarantee today that the county of Kent constabulary will continue to be controlled from Maidstone and not from a remote regional centre such as Guildford?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend puts forward an approach to reform which would have done credit to Lord Palmerston. We have not yet reached any conclusions on the future structure or shape of police forces. We have not committed ourselves to any change and have not yet addressed the question whether Maidstone or Guildford is the best place for the headquarters of the police service in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Mr. Bermingham: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman bear it in mind that as the Crown prosecution service is divided into 12 areas throughout the United Kingdom, it would be wise to reconsider their distribution, bearing in mind that it is useful if Crown prosecution areas are coterminous with local police areas, as they are at present?

Mr. Clarke: I am full of praise for the Crown prosecution service, but, with respect, the delivery of a police service is somewhat different. The key question in the case of policing is how to retain the necessary local element for community policing, with responsibility being devolved to an officer who has charge of the beat officers in an area that he knows well and with the right headquarters structure above that—a structure which is not too oppressive and distant and can give the necessary headquarters support to a modern police service. The questions that we have to address here are not exactly equivalent to those which have to be addressed in the case of the Crown prosecution service.

Drug Abuse

9. Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department is taking to prevent young people from becoming victims of drug abuse.

Mr. Jack: The prevention of the misuse of drugs by young people is a prime objective of the Home Office drugs prevention initiative, the annual progress report of which was published on Monday. In addition, the 20 local drug prevention teams are currently playing their full part in European Drug Prevention Week.

Mrs. Gillan: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Is it not right that this year £5·3 million has been made available to the drugs prevention initiative to fund such things as local drugs prevention teams? Will my hon. Friend join me in welcoming the contribution made by voluntary organisations such as Action on Addiction, which recently supported financially the setting up of the national addiction centre?

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend properly draws attention to the role of the voluntary sector in drug prevention work. Our drug prevention initiative has shown the value of partnership in fighting the menace of drugs. I was pleased to confirm this week that the drug prevention initiative will be extended until 1995.

Ms. Glenda Jackson: How does the Minister's answer square with the lobby in the House this week of young people who have been victims of drug abuse and are struggling to free themselves from that travail in the face of the Government's broken promise on ring fencing drug and alcohol abuse services?

Mr. Jack: The hon. Lady tempts me into areas beyond the boundaries of the Home Office. She will know that Health Ministers have received representations and have issued enhanced guidelines to local authorities on the subject.

Mrs. Peacock: In all the hype of this week, will my hon. Friend ensure that he does not forget the problem of solvent abuse, which is often forgotten and seems to be the poor relation? Regrettably, West Yorkshire has a high record of young people who have died from this abuse.

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend is entirely right to draw the House's attention to that. If she saw some of the excellent work being done in our drug prevention initiatives, she would realise that many of the drama messages conveyed by young people to young people include a powerful one about the dangers of solvent abuse.

Mr. Battle: In response to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms. Jackson), why has the Minister not made representations to his colleagues at the Department of Health? Is this not a classic example of his making encouraging and supportive noises while another Department undermines his initiatives by cutting resources? What representations has he made?

Mr. Jack: I have emphasised the Home Office's support for drug prevention work. That view is well known throughout government.

Asylum

10. Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for asylum in 1991 were found to be multiple applications submitted by individuals using false names.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Separate figures for refusal of multiple applications are not identifiable, but in the past 12 months more than 12,000 applications have been refused because of failure to provide information or to attend interviews. We believe that there is a correlation with multiple applications.

Mr. Sykes: Does my hon. Friend agree with those of us in Scarborough and Whitby who want the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill to be enacted as soon as possible and regard bogus applications with the same contempt as we regard opponents of the Bill?

Mr. Wardle: My hon. Friend is right, for two reasons: first, fraudulent applications clog the system and delay the genuine applications of refugees who have experienced harrowing problems; secondly, they are an abuse of the social security system.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Was not the Minister's treatment of my constituent's family and their Yugoslavian friend last night a slur on the credibility of the Government and a disgrace to his name as Minister? Having deported that girl from Manchester airport at 6 am today, will the Minister confirm that she had lived in Switzerland for three years, that she had a return ticket to Switzerland dated 21 December, that she had £700 in her pocket, that she had credit cards from Swiss banks, that she had a full-time job in Switzerland with an employer who had given assurances that she would stay in Switzerland—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is somewhat abusing Question Time. Perhaps he will now come to his point.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: She was also due to return to Switzerland to be married next January. Does the Minister regret the disgraceful decision that he took last night, or is this the new form of barbaric Conservatism that we have to experience?

Mr. Wardle: I have written to the hon. Gentleman, who gave the House a long list of circumstances. I do not normally comment on a case, but he omitted to mention that the lady concerned told immigration officers that she was aware that former Yugoslavs needed a visa to come to this country but said that she understood that it was required only of ethnic Serbs. The refusal was mandatory. Had the case not been treated as it was—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The Minister's response must be heard in the House.

Mr. Wardle: Had the case not been treated in that fashion, it would have been an abuse of the change in the rules which imposed a visa regime on the citizens of the former Yugoslavia.

Mr. John Greenway: Will my hon. Friend take the oportunity to confirm that the Government remain totally committed to their obligations to asylum seekers under the 1951 United Nations convention, and that any person throughout the world who has a genuine fear of persecution is welcome here? Does my hon. Friend agree that the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill now before the House of Lords will strengthen the rights of the genuine asylum seeker at the expense only of those who seek to break the rules?

Mr. Wardle: My hon. Friend is right: the Government are absolutely committed to the 1951 convention. The Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill will be an improvement on the existing system, and will provide an oral hearing for every refused asylum applicant.

11. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the training of interpreters used in asylum applications.

Mr. Charles Wardle: At present no formal training is provided for interpreters. The immigration and nationality department is currently undertaking an internal review of the provision of interpreter services, including the question of training.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Minister undertake to review all the complaints that have been received about the quality of translation provided for people arriving in this country and seeking political asylum? Is he aware that mistakes are often made because interpreters speak the wrong dialect or have insufficient training, or because people seeking political asylum have no confidence that the interpreters will maintain the important confidentiality of the interview? Will the Minister ensure that proper training is given and that there will be a proper examination of all the procedures? Otherwise, there is a grave danger that legitimate asylum seekers will be debarred from achieving refugee status in this country due to lack of proper translation services at the ports of entry.

Mr. Wardle: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point about dialects. As he knows, the immigration and nationality department takes the matter seriously. At the end of an interview, an account of it is read to the interviewee, who is asked whether he or she agrees the account.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to page 6 of the annual report of the immigration and nationality department, which says that the total number of complaints received is about 400. Some of those will involve interpreters.

Crime Prevention

12. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what crime prevention programmes are currently funded by his Department.

Mr. Jack: The specific crime prevention programmes that we currently fund, in addition to those operated by the police, are safer cities, crime concern, the Home Office crime prevention centre, publicity programmes, Car Crime Prevention Year, the probation supervision grant scheme, and research and development programmes.

Mr. Taylor: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the first quarter of Car Crime Prevention Year showed a 2·5 per cent. fall in car crime? Will he ensure that such schemes continue? But will he also point out, much as we should like the people who carry out such crimes to be locked away, most people invite car crimes by not taking proper security measures and sometimes by not even locking their cars?

Mr. Jack: I confirm the statistics that my hon. Friend has put before the House. It is a tremendous result that in the first quarter of Car Crime Prevention Year there has been a 2·5 per cent. reduction in car crime. The fact that we have managed to achieve such a splendid result is a great tribute to the partnership approach of motor manufacturers, people in the second-hand car business, car park operators, and owners.

Mr. Maclennan: Will the Minister acknowledge that the Government do not spend one hundredth as much on crime prevention as his Department has to spend on the criminal justice system, and that a better balance would be struck if there were more expenditure on crime prevention?

Mr. Jack: As usual, Opposition Members find it difficult to distinguish between quantity and quality. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would examine the quality of what we are doing and the range of programmes that we fund, and would acknowledge that involving the people in the communities of this country in the fight against crime is the most effective way forward.

Greyhound Racing

13. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received on the subject of the funding of greyhound racing.

The Minister of State, Home Department (Mr. Peter Lloyd): I have received a number of letters recently, and on 28 October I met representatives of the British Greyhound Racing Board. Following that meeting, further discussions between the bookmaking and greyhound racing industries have taken place. I understand that agreement has now been reached on the establishment of a joint body for distributing the money accruing from the reduction in general betting duty announced by the Chancellor in this year's Budget.

Sir Michael Neubert: Does my hon. Friend agree that eight months from the Chancellor's announcement of the year-long ¼ per cent. reduction in betting duty is long enough for the greyhound racing industry to wait for the bookmakers to come up with the 3 million smackers reckoned to be their due? What further part can my hon. Friend play in bringing the matter to a speedy conclusion?

Mr. Lloyd: The Government's role is to give encouragement to both parties to reach sensible arrangements. What they agree is up to them. I congratulate both parties, as both have made concessions in these discussions. They now have an arrangement. I hope that it will work very well and that the money will be used effectively in the dog racing industry, as the Chancellor intended.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 19 November.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Pike: Does the Prime Minister recognise that urban programme authorities, such as Burnley, which have been designated programme authorities because of deprivation, on the Government's own criteria, are devastated by the axing of the urban programme? That has brought despair and despondency to those areas. Will the Prime Minister now guarantee that those deprived areas will get more resources, not less, as a result of the change in Government policy?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is probably overlooking, first, the impact of city challenge, secondly, the impact of the measures announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and, thirdly, the fact that the urban programme has not been cancelled. Some £176 million will be available in 1993-94.

Mr. Riddick: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, following yesterday's publication of school league tables, there can be no turning back on providing extra information to parents about their schools? Did my right hon. Friend notice that while the Labour party and the education establishment mafia were opposing the league tables, parents throughout the country were jamming the switchboard of the Department for Education demanding copies of those very league tables?

The Prime Minister: It is indeed the case that the education service will never again be able to hide this important information. I hope that hon. Members of all parties will agree that this is information which should legitimately be available to parents, is now available to parents, and should continue to be available to parents.

Mr. John Smith: Can the Prime Minister none the less explain why his Government are so incompetent that they cannot even produce an accurate record of the examination results?

The Prime Minister: That is a bit rich coming from the right hon. and learned Gentleman. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman recalls his infamous Jennifer's ear broadcast not long ago, he will recall that the day after that, the Labour party's dossier of people it claimed had to wait for treatment was wholly wrong. Out of 10 people it listed, five were wrong.

Mr. John Smith: To return to the subject, can the Prime Minister explain why in the case of Manchester high school, which had a 100 per cent. pass, the figure was recorded as 16 per cent. and in the case of Holyrood comprehensive school in Chard, a 46 per cent. pass was recorded as 6 per cent? In both cases the schools contacted the Department to correct the misleading information that they thought was likely to be published. Why cannot the Department for Education perform the simple task of recording and transmitting information?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is seeking to hide the fact that he and his party want a cover-up on these statistics—[Interruption.] If there are errors in the statistics, the Department will correct them. The main point is that it is right to give this information to parents and astonishing that the Labour party should wish to hide this information from parents —[Interruption.]——

Madam Speaker: Order. Members must come to order instead of bawling and shouting all the time like this.—[Interruption.]—Order. Ministers must be heard in the House, as must every other Member. I call the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful, Madam Speaker. It would be interesting to know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman agrees with this morning's Guardian, which said:

> "What's new is that parents have more information than they had before. No democrat should regard this as a reverse. This . . .will allow . . . a more informed choice."

Is Labour against more choice and more information?

Mr. John Smith: We favour, above all, the provision of accurate rather than dogma-ridden information. When the Prime Minister is engaged in the task of correcting the errors, will he look at the case of Cambridgeshire, where, according to the county council, there have been 53 errors affecting at least 30 schools? Why does the Prime Minister not admit that the Government have made a botch of this, take it away and start again, this time trying to reach the minimum competence levels which even this Government should be able to attain?

The Prime Minister: I am glad that the right hon. and learned Gentleman acknowledges that we shall continue to provide this information, and next year we shall go further with the information. This is the biggest exercise of its kind ever undertaken by a Government: a quarter of a million statistics in one complete set of tables. Every school had a chance to check its figures. In addition, some complaints may have originated in the information wrongly presented in the media, based on our figures—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] It is hardly surprising that there are some errors. We shall correct them. Next year—[Interruption.] Hon. Members had better listen, because this is what they will get next year: extra information; national curriculum results in English, maths, science and technology, routes taken by pupils at age 16; truancy rates; and examination results. They will also get the first primary school tables giving national curriculum results for pupils aged seven. That is the information which the Opposition would hide and we shall provide.

Mr. Butcher: I commend to the attention of my right hon. Friend an article in the current issue of the Fabian reviews in which it is argued that selective education should be reintroduced and that our secondary schools should be reformed on the German model of vocational and academic education. If this is now a legitimate subject of interest for the more enlightened socialists, why are our own Ministers so coy about reintroducing grammar schools?

The Prime Minister: The main thing that we are concerned with is the highest quality of education across the whole of the public sector. That is what we are seeking to provide, together with the greater spread of information. With regard to what my hon. Friend has to say about the socialist party, he must speak for them in so far as he wishes to do so—I certainly would not wish to do so.

Mr. Ashdown: Leaving aside for the moment the 180 refugees for whom Austria has provided refuge because Britain would not, may I again remind the Prime Minister of the more than 6,500 innocent civilians without adequate refuge, trapped in Serbian prison compounds, their lives threatened imminently by starvation and cold because no third country will have them? Does the Prime Minister realise that they are there, at least in part, because of his failure as President of the European Community to provide a co-ordinated European plan for Yugoslav refugees? Why?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman knows that this country has taken the lead in most of the initiatives dealing with Yugoslavia in recent months. We have welcomed more than 40,000 visitors, of whom 4,000 have applied for asylum. This country has shown great generosity and will continue to do so, but we share the view of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees that help should be provided as close as possible to people's homes, and not by taking them abroad when that is not absolutely necessary. That is the policy which we have been following and the policy which I believe it is right for us to follow.

Mr. Dunn: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the publication of league tables for local schools is entirely responsible? Is he also aware that the reason why certain parties in the House object to the publication of information for parents is that it brings into the open the mediocrity introduced into our schools by the left in the 1960s?

The Prime Minister: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend—and, more to the point, so do parents up and down the country, who know very well where the bad education authorities are. The Labour party has tried to block every one of our education reforms, so it is hardly surprising that it is now trying to block information.

Q2. Mr. Hall: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 19 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hall: Is the Prime Minister aware that the ICI chlora-alkali factory in Runcorn has experienced a 60 per cent. increase in its electricity bills in the past 18 months? Unless it can negotiate a more realistic price for its electricity, or benefit from bulk purchasing, it will go out of business—putting 4,000 people in Runcorn out of work. Will the Prime Minister give a commitment that he will intervene on behalf of jobs in British industry and ensure that ICI is treated fairly in this matter?

The Prime Minister: I cannot intervene in the way in which the hon. Gentleman invites me to, and it would not be right for me to do so.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will the Prime Minister find time in his busy schedule to visit Portland to speak to those running the naval base there and, in particular, to examine sea training? It is not planned to reduce sea training, but simply to move it to Devonport. Is not the best place to undertake such training the place where it has always been undertaken—Portland?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend knows of the decision, which has been taken after careful examination. I am not able to announce any change in that decision this afternoon. I am, of course, perfectly happy to discuss the matter with my hon. Friend.

Q3. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 19 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ross: Following the announcement today that 3,500 jobs are to go at the Royal Bank of Scotland and 550 at Blue Circle cement, does the Prime Minister realise that while unemployment continues to soar out of control no one will have any confidence in him or in the economy? Why does not the right hon. Gentleman admit that he has not a clue what to do about unemployment?

The Prime Minister: Given that the hon. Gentleman supports a party which wanted a tax on jobs, all the burdens of the social charter and a national minimum wage, I find his remarks a bit rich. It is odd that the hon. Gentleman did not notice the reductions in interest rates, the measures taken by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor last week, or the measures taken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment over many months. Where has the hon. Gentleman been during all this time?

Mrs. Gillan: Will the Prime Minister join me in congratulating a company in my constituency—Amersham International—on winning the Queen's award for industry for its brain-imaging agent, ceretec? The company leads the world in the field. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is further evidence of the success of the Government's privatisation policy?

The Prime Minister: I most certainly agree with my hon. Friend. It is a fact that most of the industries that have been privatised have had a substantially better record in the private sector than they had in the public sector. That is why it is entirely right for us, wherever we can, to look to move enterprises from the public to the private sector, where they can be run by business men, run for profit, and provide secure, long-term, permanent employment.

Q4. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 19 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Campbell: On 16 November the Prime Minister wrote a letter to the National Union of Mineworkers saying that the 10 pits in the review would have to close because they were not making a profit. [Interruption.] I am not reading. Is the Prime Minister aware that five of those collieries are currently making a profit and two of them are expected to make a profit at the end of the financial year? Who is telling the truth in the matter—the Coal Board or the Prime Minister? The pits are to close—yet they are making a profit. Does the Prime Minister not want to keep the pits open because he would tarnish his reputation again?

The Prime Minister: The Government are seeking to ensure that we can have a coal industry in the future which is sustainable, profitable and viable. That is in the interests of the coal industry, in the interests of energy users and in the interests of the local communities—and it is what the Government wish to see.

Dounreay Fast Reactor

3.30 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland), (by private notice): To ask the President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of the European fast breeder nuclear research programme.

The Minister for Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government decided in 1988 that the Dounreay prototype fast reactor would close in 1994. In August we confirmed that decision.

In its report of 1990 on the fast reactor, the then Energy Select Committee recommended that the Government review their expenditure on fast reactor research and development once the design validation stage of the European fast reactor was completed in March 1993. In their response, the Government said that they would keep their position on EFR under review in the light of future developments.

The Government also said that once the design validation stage had been completed they would expect the nuclear industry to accept the responsibility for further work, should there be sufficient interest in the project.

The Government have now reviewed their position and concluded that funding of fast reactor R and D beyond March 1993 is not a priority, since there is general agreement that the commercial deployment of the fast reactor will not be justified until well into the next century. The Government asked the nuclear industry what priority it attached to this PFR research. The industry decided that it could not justify continuing this programme alone. The programme will therefore now be wound down.

The Government will discuss with AEA Technology, which carries out the R and D work in the United Kingdom, what contribution we might make to consequential restructuring costs, within existing constraints on public expenditure.

The Government will continue to fund the operation of the prototype fast reactor at Dounreay until its closure in 1994, together with its subsequent decommissioning and the reprocessing of its spent fuel. This work is likely to provide information of value to the development of fast reactors. The Government are also prepared to consider funding a small programme of experiments at the PFR at Dounreay as it closes. The knowledge gained from these experiments and the decommissioning work will be made available to our European fast reactor partners as our contribution to European collaboration.

Mr. Maclennan: Is the Minister aware that the Government's announcement will be treated with dismay by all the scientists in Britain, and especially by my constituents at Dounreay and in Risley, who have worked for almost two generations to put Britain at the head of this technology? The consequence of his decision will be to pass the work to the Japanese working in collaboration with the French and once again the Government's failure to support industry at the pre-competitive stage will lead to our losing a national lead.

Is it not extraordinary and unacceptable that the hon. Gentleman should have made that announcement before the conclusion of the 1994 review on nuclear policy, which the Government commissioned from the industry, and in the face of the advice of the nuclear and energy supply industries that fast breeder reactors should be backed and that they would be prepared to make a proper contribution to the funds, given the Government's commitment?

Mr. Eggar: My announcement does not affect the 1994 nuclear review, which relates to commercial nuclear reactors and not to the PFR, as the hon. Gentleman knows. On his comments about scientific consensus, I remind him that the Select Committee on Energy recommended that we should examine the position as we approach March 1993, when—as the hon. Gentleman will realise—the design validation stage will have been completed. My Department's advisory group on research and development has recommended that we consider seriously whether it makes sense to go ahead with PFR funding.

During the past 40 years, we have spent about £4 billion in today's money on that research, and we have managed to come up with a basic design which will enable us to proceed to a prototype commercial development, should it ever be economic to do so. Given the likely cost of uranium and energy demand, the industry has decided not to give priority to PFR research, and the Government and the nuclear industry have decided that further expenditure is not justified.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): Surely the Minister will recognise that we should exploit our achievements, and that, as we have a lead, we should carry it further forward? Is it not odd that the Europeans, the Japanese and the Americans are going ahead with fast breeder reactors and that in the United Kingdom we are beginning to abdicate that responsibility?

Mr. Eggar: The Germans have taken almost exactly the same decision as we have. The German Government have decided to transfer responsibility for most R and D and design work to the nuclear industry. The French Superphénix project is not operating and is not likely to in the foreseeable future.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Does the Minister not realise that his decision will be a grave disappointment to those of my constituents who will lose their jobs because of it? Is that not more evidence of the Government's short-termism? Surely, if the PFR were developed, it would overcome one of the problems that has always been associated with the nuclear industry—the storage of nuclear waste—because it would recreate its own fuel. Obviously, that is the way in which the industry of the future will go, yet the Government are backing out. That is another sign that they are concerned with market economics instead of looking to the future.

Mr. Eggar: There is no doubt about the Government's commitment to the PFR—we have spent about £1 billion on research since 1979. We have now reached the stage when the Select Committee on Energy recommended, in 1990, that we should examine whether we want to spend more money on the PFR. We are following the advice of the Select Committee. After analysis, we have decided that, from the Government's point of view, further expenditure in not justified.

We have asked the nuclear industry whether it wishes to invest in further R and D in the PFR, and it has given us a clear sign that it does not attach sufficient priority to it to allocate additional funds from its resources. We now have the basic competence to move forward to a prototype commercial PFR, and that would seem to be the right stage at which to cease to provide Government funding, additional to that that I have already announced.

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): Is my hon. Friend aware that many hon. Members in all parts of the House saw the fast breeder programme as a source of abundant energy in the next century, particularly as we could get about 60 times more energy from uranium than through the conventional nuclear programme? Does his announcement mean that we have now abandoned for the foreseeable future the interest we had in the fast breeder programme, or will steps be taken to conserve the technology so that, in perhaps 20 or 30 years, we might be able to look at the project again?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend makes the point. He was Chairman of the Select Committee at the time. It was recognised that, once we had reached the design validation stage, we would have reached the point when, if at some stage in the future it made sense to move forward to a commercial PFR, we would have done the basic research. I said that we shall be putting in hand additional research concerned with the decommissioning of PFR, and we shall make the information available as part of the Europewide collaboration. I am confident that we shall continue to keep a close watch on what is happening, particularly in other countries, should other countries decide to continue with additional research, which is by no means certain, particularly on the part of our European partners.

Mr. Adam Ingram (East Kilbride): Is the Minister aware that the whole of the scientific community in Britain will be stunned by his decision and the way in which it has been announced? Is he further aware that this is another example of Britain withdrawing from a major research and development and demonstration programme and handing it over to our major industrial competitors, the French, Germans and Japanese, and ignoring the interest that the Russians are expressing in the programme?

Mr. Eggar: No, I do not accept that. Britain has spent £4 billion in today's money on research going back over 40 years. That has been a considerable investment. Having done that, we have reached the point at which we have a basic design which we shall be able to develop should it make economic and scientific sense to do so in the future. It is widely accepted that further work would not get us another stage further and would not be justified as against other scientific research priorities.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): While the Minister's announcement is sad, may I ask him to accept that the real leader in nuclear technology in this country is Rolls-Royce and Associates of Derby, which for 40 years has been putting nuclear power packs—units that are small, robust and tremendously safe—into submarines, including conventional submarines? Perhaps that is the direction in which we should be going forward into the next century. Does my hon. Friend think that it might make sense to put some public money into that type of research instead of leaving Rolls-Royce to do it all?

Mr. Eggar: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right about the technological lead that Rolls-Royce has developed in the area in which it is operating. But there is a considerable difference between what Rolls-Royce is engaged in and the fast breeder reactor programme.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Does the Minister realise that in the next century there will be the most bitter recrimination about his announcement today? Nuclear physics cannot be mothballed. The Japanese and others will take advantage of all that we have achieved.

The hon. Gentleman talks about there having been consultation with the nuclear industry. Neither my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) nor I, nor many others who have followed these matters, know to whom he is referring. Many people—apart from Clifford Bloomfield and those who have been doing the work—including the chairmen of the generating boards and members of the British Nuclear Forum, whom hon. Members on both sides of the House have met, are absolutely against any such decision. It is a quite different matter to say that they would not fund it. At issue is a Government responsibility, and the Government are shirking it.

Mr. Eggar: I wrote to the chairmen of the relevant nuclear bodies at the end of July of this year telling them of the Government's position, which was that, having examined the matter, we were not ourselves prepared to make funds available and asking whether they regarded it as of sufficient priority for them to allocate their funds so as to take the R and D forward. The answer that I got from them at the end of October was that they felt, having examined all their priorities across all the R and D, that they could not give enough priority to fast breeder reactor research. That was a clear decision. The priority that the nuclear industry gave to the matter brought it to exactly the same decision as the Government.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Will my hon. Friend take it from me that the decision will not be welcomed in the north-west? How many jobs, directly or indirectly, will be lost as a result of the decision? Why have we decided not to go ahead with the research, whereas the Japanese and the French will continue to do so? Finally, what use will be made of the money saved? Will it be used for research into other sources of energy?

Mr. Eggar: There will be about 270 redundancies as a direct result of the decision, of which about 160 are expected at Risley and about 40 at Dounreay. I apologise for not giving that information to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). Obviously, the funds will be redeployed within my Department's budget.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is it not strangely ironic that, while the Labour party is attacked for being anti-nuclear, the Conservative party and the Government have systematically undermined the nuclear industry in recent years? Have not the Government threatened the privatisation of the nuclear industry; are they not threatening its future through privatisation; and have they not terminated the fast breeder reactor programme, with the loss, over the years, of potentially thousands of jobs? They are now questioning the future of the THORP project in West Cumbria. Is it not time that we had some proper decisions taken on a national economic energy strategy?

Mr. Eggar: I know that the hon. Gentleman is a strong supporter of nuclear power. The Government continue to believe that economic nuclear power can make a useful contribution to the United Kingdom's energy supply. As he knows, the Government will review the prospects for nuclear power in 1994. With regard to the point that is of particular interest to him—the THORP project—he will be aware that a public consultation process commenced at the beginning of this week, to which he and his constituents will wish to contribute.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Will the decision have implications for employment at Winfrith in my constituency? Will Winfrith be in line to pick up a contract for the decommissioning research which my hon. Friend has announced? Will the funds that will now be released allow funding to go into the small integrated reactor that was designed and outlined in my constituency? Furthermore, does my hon. Friend welcome the enormous support that he is getting from the Opposition for nuclear electricity?

Mr. Eggar: I have noted with interest the Opposition Members who have been on their feet and how they have phrased their questions.

I am informed that, unfortunately, some 40 people are likely to be made redundant at Winfrith. I suggest that my hon. Friend takes up the other matters that he raised with AEA Technology.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): How much money is involved in the next phase of investment and research funding? How much was requested from the nuclear industry, and how much did it offer? Will the Minister bear in mind the fact that many of us are watching him and noting the attention that he has given to Select Committees' recommendations, and that we shall look to his attention being directed towards other Select Committees' recommendations in the near future?

How does he propose to deal with the number of people whose jobs and livelihood have been affected? Although only a comparatively small number may be involved, given the welter of unemployment that is emerging at present, does the Minister accept that those people are among the most highly qualified and skilled in the United Kingdom? Such teams will not be reassembled again with ease or with the possibility of success in future. To return to such a programme in 10, 15 or 20 years would need an educational programme on a scale beyond people's conception.

Mr. Eggar: Few people believe that a fast breeder reactor is likely to reach commercial viability until the year 2030 at the earliest. Those people currently working in the industry are unlikely to see a commercial reactor in place during their working lives.

On the issue of funds, the nuclear industry was asked if it wished to carry forward and fund aspects of future research and development. It made it clear that it did not wish to give priority to providing funds on the basis suggested. As for the individuals involved, I have already said that the Government will work together with AEA, particularly AEA Technology, to consider redeployment costs within the constraints of public expenditure.

I should have thought that Opposition Members would have welcomed the fact that the Government have responded to the Select Committee's recommendations in 1990. The Committee recommended, and the Government accepted, that it was now time to make decisions on whether to continue to fund as, by March 1993—when the decision comes into effect—we would have reached the end of the design validation stage and would have a basic design ready to be carried forward if that was considered appropriate.

Business of the House

3.52 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): Yes, Madam. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 23 NOVEMBER—Opposition day (6th Allotted Day). There will be a debate entitled "Conduct of Ministers on Arms Exports to Iraq" on an Opposition motion.

TUESDAY 24 NOVEMBER—There will be a debate on the European Community White Paper, European Community budget and future financing, on a Government motion.

WEDNESDAY 25 NOVEMBER—Until about 7 pm, motion relating to Members' pay, followed by proceedings on the Car Tax (Abolition) Bill.

THURSDAY 26 NOVEMBER—Debate on the management of the public service, on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 27 NOVEMBER—Private Members' motions.

MONDAY 30 NOVEMBER—Second Reading of the Social Security Bill.

The House may also wish to know that European Standing Committee B will meet on Wednesday 25 November at 10.30 am to consider European Community document No. 8586/92 relating to cosmetic products.

Standing Committee B

Relevant Report of the European Legislation Committee

HC 79-vii (1992-93).]

Mrs. Beckett: As the Leader of the House failed to announced the resumption next week of the Committee stage of the Maastricht Bill, will he confirm that the vital issue of principle on which the Government and the Liberal party claimed that Labour's amendment had to be defeated is now down to a difference of precisely one week? Does that not show, first, the incompetence of the Government in courting defeat on such an issue, and secondly, what a mistake it is to trust a word they say?

Is the Leader of the House aware of the urgent demand for a full statement next week on the revenue support grant? That is especially true as, though there is considerable doubt about the extra revenue for local authorities that the Chancellor announced in the autumn statement, there is no such doubt about the impact of the withdrawal of funding for the urban programme. Will the Leader of the House ensure that our Scottish and Welsh colleagues have the fullest opportunity to question their Secretaries of State, and there will not merely be an announcement through a written answer?

Will the Leader of the House find time as soon as possible for us to debate the Government's transport policy—or lack thereof—in the light of the dispute about the planned support for urban transport in the autumn statement, the evidence given to the Select Committee, and the suggestions of road pricing?

Finally, as an aid to planning, will the Leader of the House soon be able to tell us the dates of the Christmas recess?

Mr. Newton: I will take the hon. Lady's questions, for once, in the order in which she asked them. Given the performance of the Opposition on European questions, I find it somewhat strange that words should be uttered about whether the Government can be trusted on the issue. The Government's position was that it was right to undertake some further consideration of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill before the Edinburgh summit. The issue in the debate involved, to some significant extent, whether that should take place, and the Opposition tried to prevent it. The Government still intend that there should be further discussion of the Bill before the Edinburgh summit, and I expect to say more about that in my business statement next week.

I do not expect that the hon. Lady will have to wait beyond next week for further details about the revenue support grant settlement. She will no doubt be aware that these matters are not dealt with in identical ways in England, Scotland and Wales, but I know that my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Wales will seek to ensure that the House has opportunities to be informed.

I cannot promise a debate on transport policy of the sort that the hon. Lady requested, but I draw her attention to the fact that the Secretary of State for Transport will be here is person on Monday to answer questions from her and other hon. Members.

The recess dates must necessarily be subject to the progress of business, but I very much hope that it will not be too much longer before I can give the House some idea of those dates.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that Monday's debate will be widened to include the conduct of Opposition spokesmen, to give Conservative Members an opportunity to quiz the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) about his campaign of insinuation and innuendo? The hon. Gentleman's own record, of course, includes a conspiracy to place a mole in the Department of Health, and his infamous "Jennifer's ear" election broadcast was condemned by Labour's own general secretary as inadequately researched.

Mr. Newton: Were it not for my desire to be emollient in this role, I would congratulate my hon. Friend on making points that I could not have put better myself. I can only hope that he finds the opportunity either to intervene in the speech of the hon. Member for Livingston or to catch the Chair's eye during the debate.

Mr. Stephen Byers (Wallsend): Will the Leader of the House find time next week for the Secretary of State for Education to come to the House to make a statement about the fiasco surrounding the publication of the school examination results league tables? Is he aware that the Government's expert survey control unit had no involvement in compiling the league tables, and that the responsibility was given to two organisations with no previous experience of an exercise on this scale? The House should have an explanation; parents and schools affected should have an apology; and these misleading and inaccurate league tables should be withdrawn.

Mr. Newton: My emollience is in danger of deserting me. I am almost tempted to give the hon. Gentleman the undertaking that he requests, if only to ensure an opportunity for the Opposition spokesman on education to explain why the Opposition want to deny parents the information which they manifestly want.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is a total waste of valuable parliamentary time to have a debate on Monday on a subject, the facts about which are being fully investigated by a lord justice of appeal? Does he agree that the Opposition know nothing about it and will use the debate only as an excuse for muck-racking—their sole activity in this place?

Mr. Newton: I shall retreat into emollience and say that I am sure that many will have sympathy with my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Will the Leader of the House require the Secretary of State for Education to come to the House on Monday to tell us how he intends to put right the grievous wrong done by the Department to Manchester high school for girls in my constituency? The Department announced yesterday that only 16 per cent. of the pupils there had GCSE passes, whereas in fact 100 per cent. of the fifth formers achieved them. It is intolerable that, after the school had pointed out this error to the Department before publication, the Department went ahead and inflicted this great damage to the school. What will the Government do to put it right?

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education has already taken action. As the right hon. Gentleman may know—I hope so—an erratum slip has been issued with the tables for Manchester, the press were notified of the error yesterday, and the Under-Secretary of State has written to apologise to the headmistress in a letter which I have here, and which is dated yesterday.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): Will my right hon. Friend initiate next week a debate on road safety, a matter of grave concern to my constituents and all those who live near motorways? Since 1988, all large lorries in Britain have had to be fitted with mirrors on each side. That requirement does not apply to lorries coming here from our EC partners or from non-EC countries—a matter of grave concern to my constituents and others who use motorways. Will my right hon. Friend initiate such a debate, so that we can obtain an assurance that we are pressing our fellow EC members to introduce legislation similar to ours so that my constituents can travel safely on motorways?

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's concern. As my constituency practically borders his and much of the same traffic passes through both, I too am aware of that concern. I shall alert my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to the fact that my hon. Friend may seek to question him on the matter on Monday.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Did I understand the Leader of the House to say that the revenue support grant statements to be made next week would include not just those for England and Wales but for Scotland as well?

While he is on his feet, will he say what the Government propose to do in order to give the House an opportunity to hear Ministers' reactions and to debate the situation surrounding the GATT negotiations, which have some important implications for agriculture, textiles and other sectors of industry?

Mr. Newton: I well recognise the importance of the GATT negotiations and the associated agricultural issues. As the hon. Gentleman knows, discussions are going on in various ways in the hope of achieving a settlement. I cannot promise a debate at the moment, but we shall keep the matter under review and discuss it through the usual channels.

I am sure that I did not give the commitment that the hon. Gentleman mentioned in the first part of his question. The matter is handled in different ways for the three countries, but I shall ensure that my right hon. Friend is aware of the concern that he has expressed.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): Has my right hon. Friend had time to see early-day motion 878 in my name on Macedonia?

[That this House urges Her Majesty's Government to use its best efforts to secure the earliest recognition of that portion of the former Republic of Yugoslavia known as Macedonia as an independent sovereign state; and bearing in mind the present desperate economic and social situation there, further urges Her Majesty's Government to use its influence to help ensure a regular flow of oil needed to sustain the essential needs of the population and their economy.]

Is he aware that in that part of what was Yugoslavia there is a tremendous tragedy waiting to happen which is not being closely followed by the major powers? Will my right hon. Friend find time to debate the problems of Macedonia, particularly the question of its recognition as an independent republic?

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake to find time to debate that matter, but I can assure my hon. Friend, whose close interest in the matter is well known, that the Government are working to secure the recognition of the former Yugoslav republic of Macedonia on terms which will secure good relations with all its neighbours, but he will be aware how difficult that it.

Mr. Brain Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): Will the Leader of the House invite the Secretary of State for Education to come here next week to explain how it comes about that, at seven secondary schools in Hackney, no pupils are recorded as having sat A-level or AS-level examinations, whereas in fact the seven schools all seconded staff and pupils to the sixth form centre, with impressive results?

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake to bring my right hon. Friend here in that context, but I will ask him to be in touch with the hon. Gentleman on that point.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Does my right hon. Friend acknowledge that there are many shades of legal opinion on all the substantial and important issues of the Maastricht treaty? It is very difficult for the House to understand how the treaty will be interpreted in Europe. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that, when the House comes to consider all the important sections of the treaty, we are told the views of the Commission and, if possible, the European Court, and the way in which they are likely to interpret the proposals involved? We shall then not be entirely dependent on a highly favourable gloss from the Government.

Mr. Newton: I undertake to ensure that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary's attention is drawn to what my hon. Friend has said.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): May I press the Leader of the House to clarify the answer that he gave to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett)? Did he not omit mention of Northern Ireland when he referred to income support? Scotland and Wales were mentioned, and the right hon. Gentleman has mentioned "three countries", but the kingdom has four parts, and supply comes from the House.

Has the right hon. Gentleman seen early-day motion 747?

[That this House calls upon Her Majesty's Attorney-General to examine the report from the RUC to the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Crown Solicitor as a matter of urgency and thereafter to commence proceedings for the extradition of Finbar Ross from the United States of America with a view to prosecution in respect of conspiracy to defraud investors, resident in Northern Ireland and Great Britain, in International Investments Ltd., Gibraltar (in liquidation).]

The motion is in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs) and those of more than 100 other right hon. and hon. Members, and it deals with international investments. May we have a statement from the Attorney-General about why conspiracy charges against an associate of Finbar Ross, a Mr. Murray, were dropped? Why are such matters being let go?

Mr. Newton: I did not refer to Northern Ireland earlier, because I was not asked about it. As the hon. Gentleman will know, matters are not necessarily dealt with in the same way there as they are in the rest of the United Kingdom, but I shall bring his comments to the attention of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

The hon. Gentleman's second question is a matter for the prosecuting authorities in Northern Ireland, and I understand that they are considering it. The decision on whether to seek extradition is one for the relevant Secretary of State.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): In what way will the motion on Members' pay affect those who have left the House and are drawing pensions, and the widows of former Members? Does my right hon. Friend agree that, although we have responsibilities for ourselves that are conditioned by the economic circumstances, we have exceptional responsibilities to widows and pensioners; and that they should not suffer?

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's concern. The motion that the House will debate next week concerns only the forthcoming year, and I do not expect it to contain special provision for pensioners; but the House will need to give further consideration to longer-term issues relating to both pay and pensions, and I think that that will be the appropriate time at which to address the matter.

Mr. John Austin-Walker (Woolwich): No doubt the Leader of the House is aware of the possibility of industrial action on London Underground next week in connection with a possible 5,000 job losses. Will he find time for a debate next week—preferably before Tuesday—on the management of London Underground to give the Secretary of State for Transport an opportunity to account to the House for steps that he has taken to try to avert damage to London's economy?

Mr. Newton: As I have said, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will be answering questions on Monday. It is increasingly clear that he will have a busy day.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Will my right hon. Friend find time next week for a debate on the dilemma faced by a number of small private nursery schools—many of them voluntarily run—which face difficulties relating to the Children Act 1989? I am sure that those difficulties were not foreseen when the Act was passed, but they will lead to closures if something is not done very quickly to exempt such schools from its provisions.

Mr. Newton: I will bring that point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): Is the Leader of the House aware of the continuing danger posed to the lives of Northern Ireland fishermen by the failure of the agreement regarding submarines in the Irish sea and the north channel? A couple of weeks ago, a constituent of mine nearly lost himself, his crew and his boats after being snagged by a United States submarine. No one went to him and asked what had happened, and what damage had been done. May we have a little time to debate that on-going and serious matter? The arrangements that exist are either ineffective or not being operated properly.

Mr. Newton: I shall ensure that that point, together with a number of others, is brought to the attention of the relevant Secretaries of State. However, as the hon. Gentleman's question is one that could be raised during Northern Ireland questions, for example, I ought to point out that on Thursday next my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will be here.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that one of the most worrying problems today is the serious growth in juvenile crime throughout the country, even in comparatively civilised areas such as the west midlands and mid-Warwickshire? In view of the apparent inability of the authorities to do very much about it, is it not time that we had a serious debate on the subject?

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's request and will bear it in mind, but I cannot promise an early debate.

If I may add to my answer to the previous question, I heard, from a sedentary position, the words "Ministry of Defence" being spoken. Defence Ministers will be here next Tuesday to answer questions.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Given the announcement that has just been made about the fast breeder reactor programme, will the Leader of the House arrange for a debate on the Government's attitude towards Select Committee recommendations, which so often in the past they have completely ignored? Does the Leader of the House recall the Energy Committee's recommendation that the research and development of alternative energy technologies should be removed from the ambit of the Atomic Energy Authority? If that were to be done, does it not mean that Dounreay would be the ideal centre of excellence for the pursuit of such research?

Does the right hon. Gentleman have anything to say that is positive—a message of hope for the north of Scotland?

Mr. Newton: I am not sure whether the promise of a debate, which is what I take the question to have been directed towards, would be interpreted as a message of hope, but I am afraid that I cannot undertake to provide time for such a debate.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): Bearing in mind the subject that is to be debated next Monday, will my right hon. Friend give the House an undertaking that before Monday he will place in the Library the exact criteria by which Ministers decide to give public interest immunity certificates? Does he also agree that it would help the House in its deliberations on Monday if he were to give the same statistics for the period between 1974 and 1979, when Labour Ministers were required to sign these certificates?

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's request and will ensure that it is looked at by my right hon. Friends, including the Attorney-General.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): With regard to the debate on Members' salaries next Wednesday can we be assured that the Register of Members' Interests will be published by next Wednesday so that those Conservative Members who are so keen on pay freezes can have exposed to view their outside earnings, which inure some of them to such freezes? Many are earning more than their parliamentary salaries from parliamentary advisory jobs, directorships and similar activities.

Would it not be fair to the House for it to have that information by next Wednesday so that, when people stand up and argue that civil servants in particular who are on low pay should be subjected to a pay freeze, we know how busy they are in pursuing their own pocket-lining activities?

Mr. Newton: Leaving aside the more tendentious bits of the hon. Gentleman's question and coming to the question that is principally for me, I am doing everything that I can to encourage the establishment of a Select Committee on Members' Interests in order that the register can be published. I understand that some progress, but not yet enough, has been made with the usual channels. The hon. Gentleman may therefore like to urge the usual channels to come to a conclusion.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Has my right hon. Friend had his attention drawn to early-day motion 861?

[That this House demands that the President of the Board of Trade make known the information given to him by British Coal that led to his statement that the 10 pits currently in the 90-day statutory consultation period are uneconomic and have no prospect of being so; is concerned that the 7,000 men who work at these 10 collieries, their families and the wider public need to know the evidence which has decided their fate; notes that both the President of the Board of Trade and the Prime Minister have stated that these 10 collieries are not to be considered in the Government's review of energy policy, yet there is considerable evidence that a number of these pits are economically viable; believes that a simple assertion of the collective non-profitability of these collieries is not a sufficient basis for a decision of such magnitude but that it is imperative that British Coal prove its case by making public information on production costs, forecasts, reserves, recent investment, development work and markets on a pit by pit basis; and asserts that, if the case against these pits is so strong that they are to close, this information can no longer be regarded as commercially sensitive.]

It is sponsored by the Coalfields Communities Campaign. No one asks that unproductive and uneconomic pits should remain open, but is my right hon. Friend aware that the economic case for closing those 10 pits and throwing out of work many thousands of people remains unproven? Should not the House have a say? Ought we not to have a debate on the grounds upon which those pits are to be closed?

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's request. He will be aware, however, that I said last week that I would expect the next debate on coal, other things being equal, to take place when we have the outcome of my right hon. Friend's review. In the meanwhile, I understand that, under the statutory consultation process, British Coal has provided the relevant trade unions with an information package about the performance of each pit. Therefore, it seems to me that representations are best made through that process.

Mr. Jack Thompson (Wansbeck): Is the Leader of the House aware that Labour Members from the north are disappointed that there will be no opportunity to discuss the economic future of the northern region next week? May we have a debate on the subject in the future, bearing in mind our problems such as long-term unemployment and deprivation, and the fact that, as recently as yesterday, the other place held a very good debate on the subject? We need a debate on the regions, which would enable hon. Members to discuss the problems in their region.

Mr. Newton: We are in the middle of a two-day debate in which it should be possible to make such points. A number of Conservative Members feel that Monday's Opposition day might have been better used to assist the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Andrew Bowden (Brighton, Kemptown): Is my right hon. Friend aware that 17 December is the launch date for the European Year of the Elderly? This will be a very important year for the European Community. May we have a debate on the subject before Christmas?

Mr. Newton: I am aware of the importance of the year, with which I was concerned in my previous ministerial capacity, but I cannot promise a debate between 17 December and Christmas, unless hon. Members wish to stay here closer to Christmas than I suspect.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): The House is not exactly run off its feet with business, and has met for only 31 of the past 67 weeks. During that period, a miner lucky enough to have a job will have worked 58 weeks. Should we not at least find time to discuss the mining industry in Government time, rather than leaving it to a Select Committee?

Mr. Newton: The House may have sat on the basis that the hon. Gentleman suggests, but Members have been working for many more days than that—many of them in their constituencies.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that the Government are concerned about Scotland and the Scottish people, and that he will arrange an early debate on Scottish local government so that we can consider early-day motion 856?

[That this House is concerned at reports in The Sunday Times on 8th and 15th November which disclose that Monklands District Council is ruled by an elite of 17 Labour councillors, including the Leader of the Opposition's election agent, which has employed 22 wives, sons and daughters of councillors, and that preferential employment practices have resulted in employment for the provost's 'son in the council's work study section, a daughter in the housing department and a son-in-law in the parks department' as well as the Labour Council leader's 'eldest son . . . promoted to assistant safety officer, . . . other son works in the council's economic employment section; daughter . . . a post in the planning department'; notes that a green form system was used to distinguish the job applications from members of the ruling families from the pink ones from the general public; is disturbed that the articles suggest that the Leader of the Opposition has failed to convince his own Labour councillors of the importance of manufacturing industry; fears that the Leader of the Opposition is allowing himself to be dragged into a quagmire of mafioso-like intrigue, nepotism and corruption; and questions the judgment of the Leader of the Opposition in sending a message of support to the council's new free newspaper which has been set up by the Labour councillors in a mafia-like operation to destroy the free enterprise Coatbridge and Airdrie Advertiser and thereby enable the ruling Labour councillors to wipe out the only opposition; and believes that these actions are not in the public interest.]

Such a debate would allow us properly to discuss the attempts of Labour councillors on Monklands district council to cover up very strange matters by using taxpayers' money to fund a wholly unjustified legal action against the local newspaper, which has been exposing strange and undesirable practices in Scottish local government.

Mr. Newton: The Government share my hon. Friend's concern about the allegations and, I need hardly say, firmly oppose any form of discrimination. The allegations can be pursued through the courts, the local authority ombudsman or the Commission for Local Authority Accounts.

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington): May I draw the Leader of the House's attention to early-day motion 858 on drug and alcohol residential homes?

[That this House expresses its concern at the prospect of the closure of over 100 drug and alcohol residential homes following the Department of Health's announcement that the transfer of DSS income support payments to local authorities will not be ring-fenced; and seeks the introduction of an adequate alcohol and drugs specific grant in the United Kingdom.]

It has attracted all-party support. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that between 5,000 and 10,000 people face the prospect of being thrown on to the streets because of the closure of up to 150 of these homes. The Government reneged on a promise given during the passage of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 that a specific ring-fenced grant would be made available to protect the homes. Will he find time next week to ensure that we have a full and proper debate before redundancy notices are issued and people are thrown on the street?

Mr. Newton: I am aware of the points being made, which the hon. Gentleman has repeated, not least because on Tuesday I attended the launch of the European Drug Prevention week. I do not accept the conclusions that he draws from the announcements that my right hon. and hon. Friends have made, and nor do they.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I have been persuaded by Opposition Members that perhaps we should have a debate next week on the publication of examination results and the league tables, and Monday would be ideal for me. It would give me an ideal opportunity to talk about parental choice and education standards and would allow us to consider the results of schools at the bottom of the league, which all appear to be in Labour-controlled local authorities. Perhaps we could consider that and see what action can be taken against those schools.

Mr. Newton: If that was a question, it was a good one, and I wish that I had thought of it myself.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on the important issue of the removal of the urban programme, which is worrying in the city of Hull? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that what is happening adds up to the fact that there will be no rescue package for city challenge and that, contrary to what the Prime Minister said today at Question Time, there is now no effective grant regime to replace the lost money? If Hull loses its present assisted area status, that will have a devastating effect on our great city.

Mr. Newton: As the hon. Gentleman said, he heard what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said at Question Time, and I shall not seek to add to that. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is making representations on assisted area status in connection with the present review.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Has the Leader of the House considered a debate on the grave problems of the steel industry, not least the 20 per cent. cut in production and the huge financial losses announced this week? Does the right hon. Gentleman know that hundreds of jobs have been lost at Shotton steelworks in my constituency, that those manufacturing jobs are important to the whole of Wales, and that we should like the Government to help our steel industry?

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake to provide time for such a debate, but again, what the hon. Gentleman is saying seems relevant to the debate currently taking place in the House, and his concerns are certainly addressed by the proposals in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement, which is being debated.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): In connection with the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) about the urban programme, does the Leader of the House accept that to announce a major change of Government policy which will have a massive effect on the lives of many thousands of people in the inner cities in a letter to the leaders of local authorities, with no opportunity for the House to discuss the matter or ask the Minister questions, is not a proper way for the Government to behave?

Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the Secretary of State for the Environment should make a statement to the House next week and answer questions? He may come reluctantly, but does the Leader of the House not accept that it is his responsibility to bring the Secretary of State to the House so that he can deal with the matter properly?

Mr. Newton: I had better choose my words cautiously, but I believe that I have already hinted to the shadow Leader of the House that there was some possibility that the Secretary of State for the Environment would be here next week in connection with the revenue support grant settlement in England. If so, that would give the hon. Gentleman an opportunity to ask his questions.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): Bearing in mind the fact that we have had nearly 30 minutes of bright and not so bright suggestions from Opposition Members for subjects for future debates, might it not be a good thing if in future, when the Opposition have a Supply day the following week, they made their initial inquiries to the shadow Leader of the House?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful for yet another helpful suggestion from one of my hon. Friends.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): I am sure that the Leader of the House read with shock and dismay early-day motion 788, concerning the proposed closure of Withington hospital, in my constituency.

[That this House expresses grave concern about the North Western Regional Health Authority's proposal to reorganise hospital provision in South Manchester, involving the closure of Withington Hospital as a district general hospital; regards the proposal as one that has less to do with any rational provision of health care in the district than with the rationing of resources needed to provide hospitals as close as possible to the communities they serve; calls for reconsideration of the proposal forthwith in a review that would take account of Manchester's needs as a whole for hospital provision; and asks the Secretary of State for Health to consult urgently with the City's elected representatives and certainly before any definitive decision is taken.]

Barely four years ago, when the Leader of the House was Secretary of State for Health, he accompanied me and the Duchess of York at the opening of the new children's hospital in Withington, which will now be part of the closure programme. Will he agree to an early debate on the matter so as to secure the future of health care in south Manchester, and in particular to save a hospital which he proudly helped to open?

Mr. Newton: I certainly remember the occasion— although I fear that the hon. Gentleman has promoted me, as I was the Minister for Health, rather than the Secretary of State, at the time.

I understand that there are no formal plans to close Withington hospital, and that South Manchester health authority proposes to develop acute district services at Wythenshawe hospital, and to create a community hospital at Withington. All such proposals are subject to a decision by the various health authorities, and to consultation, before a decision can be made.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): Will the Leader of the House allow an early debate on perfume companies holding consumers to ransom, forcing up prices by one third and blackmailing magazines and newspapers into refusing advertisements for cheaper prices? Will he ensure that the President of the Board of Trade bangs heads together to avoid another nine months of high prices so that you, Madam Speaker, and the rest of us may have a much merrier Christmas?

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will be interested in the suggestion of vigorous physical activity on his part. I will undertake rather more calmly to bring the hon. Gentleman's remarks to his attention.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): In the light of the 3,500 redundancies announced today by the Royal Bank of Scotland, and in the light of the fact that there have been a number of job losses in the banking industry in the south-east of England, in Edinburgh and in Manchester, will the Leader of the House consider an early debate on the subject? If we are starting to lose jobs in an area that is this country's particular strength, it is an illustration of the extent to which the country faces tremendous job losses and a rundown in its economy. The Government should pay attention to that.

Mr. Newton: I and the whole Government regret these and any other job losses. However, they should be seen in the context of overall employment of 24,000 in the Royal Bank Group as a whole. I understand that the majority of the losses will be achieved by what is rather unpleasingly called "natural wastage"—that is, as a result of turnover.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): I take it that you have taken it out on me for being naughty earlier by leaving me to the last, Madam Speaker. I apologise.

Will the Leader of the House tell us about the future of the consultants' report into the operation of the House? Will he assure me that the story in this morning's newspaper that part of the report suggests a Members' wine bar in the Cellar is nonsense? It sounds a barmy idea at the moment.

Mr. Newton: These are matters principally for the Accommodation and Works Committee and for the Catering Committee. I will draw the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the attention of both Chairmen.

Early-Day Motions

4.26 pm

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I raise the matter of early-day motions with you as the defender of Back-Bench Members' rights. As you know, early-day motions are one of the principal channels through which Back-Bench Members can communicate. An early-day motion of mine has been turned down for the most extraordinary reason. I can find no senior Member who has ever heard of that reason——

Madam Speaker: Order. May I give a little guidance to the hon. Gentleman, because I want to be helpful in these matters? If the motion has been turned down, there are procedures that he has to follow, so the matter cannot be raised on the Floor of the House. If he goes to the Table Office, he will be informed of the procedures to follow, and I shall do my best to give him guidance in the matter. The matter cannot be raised on the Floor of the House once an early-day motion has been turned down. If the hon. Gentleman will do as I ask, I shall give him as much help as I can.

Mr. Flynn: May I continue a little further, because——

Madam Speaker: Order. I have dealt with the point of order. There is nothing further that we can do at this stage on the Floor of the House. I have given the hon. Gentleman some guidance, and I hope that he will follow it.

BILL PRESENTED

SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. Secretary Lilley, supported by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Heseltine, Mr. Secretary Hunt, Mr. Secretary Lang, Mrs. Secretary Shephard and Miss Ann Widdecombe, presented a Bill to amend sections 3 and 85 of the Social Security Act 1986, to provide for the making of certain payments into the National Insurance Fund, and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 88.]

Orders of the Day

Autumn Statement

[Relevant documents: The Minutes of Evidence taken before the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on 16th and 17th November (House of Commons Papers Nos. 201-iii and-iv.]

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on amendment to Question [18 November]:

That this House approves the Autumn Statement presented by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer on 12th November; welcomes the Government's continuing commitment to the firm control of public expenditure; supports the new expenditure plans, which honour the Government's commitments and provide protection of capital spending; applauds the specific measures the Government has taken to encourage confidence and foster recovery; and congratulates the Government on achieving a substantial reduction in underlying inflation, which has laid the foundations for sustainable growth.—[Mr. Lamont.]

Which amendment was: to leave out from 'House' to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'regrets that the Autumn Statement confirms that the recession is continuing and that unemployment and bankruptcies will continue to rise; regrets also that investment which has fallen substantially during the recession will fall again for 1992 and will at best, according to Government forecasts, rise by only one quarter of one per cent. during 1993; deplores the worsening balance of payments and the failure of the Government to recognise the need for a policy for manufacturing and for the regions; demands an emergency employment programme to reduce unemployment and the fear of unemployment and additional investment measures to boost the construction industry and business as a whole; and calls for a long-term industrial and training policy for Britain'.—[Mr. Gordon Brown.]

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Madam Speaker: I must announce to the House that, between 7 pm and 9 pm, there will be a limit on speeches of 10 minutes.

4.28 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Portillo): May I first welcome to her new position the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman)? She is speaking for the first time today in her role as Chief Secretary—[HON. MEMBERS: "Shadow."]—shadow Chief Secretary. She brings with her the reputation she acquired, as health spokesman, of being a real big spender. Her translation to her present role where she is responsible for keeping tabs on the promises made by the Labour party is a case not so much of a poacher turning gamekeeper as of a fox being put in charge of a chicken coop—or a chicken co-op, as the hon. Lady would call it.

The achievement of last week's autumn statement is to create the conditions for a return of confidence and so to remove a barrier to growth in our economy. The announcements made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer provide the strongest reassurance that the Government will maintain the most rigorous control of public spending and have evolved a robust medium-term strategy for limiting its growth.

Equally, his statement provides well targeted encouragement to sectors of the economy badly hit by the recession. The statement demonstrates a finely judged balance between the toughness required at a time when national finances are under strain and a willingness to respond prudently to the needs of business at a time of prolonged recession.

Despite all the huffing and puffing from the Opposition, the economic fundamentals today are promising. First, inflation has fallen from nearly 11 per cent. to under 4 per cent. Second, we now have the lowest interest rates in the European Community and the lowest seen here for 15 years. Thirdly, our exchange rate makes our products highly competitive, whether we are selling in overseas markets or in home markets against overseas products.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): The right hon. Gentleman could also add that our share in world trade and manufactures has fallen from 6·7 per cent. in 1979 to 5·6 per cent. That might put his previous remarks into context.

Mr. Portillo: During part of the 1980s there was a decline in our share of trade and manufactures, but that stabilised around the late 1980s and has stabilised further since. So I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's point is at all well made.

As long as we continue to keep inflation down, the competitive edge provided today by a floating pound will be of significant advantage to British business.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The right hon. Gentleman talks about keeping inflation down. I can understand that he has some hopes of keeping down the levels of pay in the public sector, although that is very difficult, but can he really now, after what has been said in the past week, still believe that it will be possible to keep pay in the private sector down to 1·5 per cent.? Does he really believe that?

Mr. Portillo: The right hon. Gentleman is confusing two things. I was talking about inflation, not about pay. A part of my speech which I shall come to later is about pay. But, do I believe that my right hon. Friend has set monetary conditions at the right level in order to maintain downward pressure on inflation and to achieve his target of between 1 and 4 per cent. inflation? Yes, indeed I do believe that.

As growth returns, we need to be sure that its fruits are not simply gobbled up by an uncontrolled expansion of the state. The Government's objective over the medium term is to reduce public spending as a proportion of national income, because in that way an increasing share of the proceeds of economic growth will remain with individuals: those who created it. It is the wealth creators who work and invest who should enjoy the lion's share of what is produced by their efforts.

If public spending were allowed to grow too fast, it would absorb all the benefits of growth, and the recovery would serve only to fatten the state. The burden of spending could eventually smother the private sector. We must therefore keep a careful eye on the proportion of national income that is absorbed by public spending. That ratio next year will stand at about 45 per cent. It has climbed so high because of a static, or even falling, gross domestic product and a continuing real rise in public spending, largely driven by the demands of the recession on the public purse.

Although the ratio is no higher than it was in the last recession, the state takes too much of our national income today. The ratio of spending to GDP must be reduced. That is a fundamental objective of this Government, and I reiterate it now unambiguously.

It can be done. We can reduce the ratio of spending to GDP and at the same time reduce Government borrowing, and we shall do both. I speak with confidence, because the Government have done it before. In the 1980s, the share of national output taken from wealth creators and spent by the state fell from a peak of 47 per cent. to under 40 per cent. At the same time, our fiscal position became so healthy that we were able to repay debt. Over the first three terms of this Conservativve Government, we cut the country's debt burden by the equivalent of £10 billion per year—the cost of 160 hospitals or 500 road bypasses or 5p off the standard rate of income tax.

I remind the House that those achievements took time. We had to maintain our resolve year after year. But our perseverance paid off. Restraint and fiscal prudence in the 1980s delivered a formidable hat trick—cuts in income tax, increased spending on priority programmes and reductions in the national debt.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Was not the reduction from 46 per cent. to 40 per cent. during the 1980s partly achieved by the privatisation of telecommunications and water? Did not the privatisation of water lead to charges to the charge payer being equally great, if not greater? Does the Chief Secretary agree that we are talking not about greater personal incomes but about a redesignation that suits his purposes?

Mr. Portillo: My figures exclude the effects of privatisation. We always publish the figures and establish the ratio on the only reasonable and fair basis on which to compare the figures from year to year, and that is excluding privatisation proceeds.

The privatisation of water was an important and helpful achievement. It has enabled the industry to embark upon a major 10-year £30 billion programme of investment in our infrastructure. I am only sorry that the Labour party believes that, when a privatised industry invests in the infrastructure, the correct knee-jerk response is to offer to tax it. That is disappointing.

The effects of recession have hit all countries and, like that of many other countries, the United Kingdom's borrowing is increasing. I want to make it clear that I do not welcome that. It is a direct consequence of the recession, however, and we cannot hide from it or from its consequences. As borrowing increases, so does the cost of servicing debt. If those extra costs in turn feed through to higher borrowing, eventually borrowing will spiral. If we listened to the Opposition, scrapped the ceilings on public expenditure and gave in to every demand and every interest group, we might be popular today but would certainly be bankrupt tomorrow.

We must avoid the prospect of more and more Government money going to debt repayment rather than to refurbishing schools, building new roads and improving the health service. As the economy recovers, borrowing must be brought down towards balance. That makes it essential to control what the Government spend. Accordingly, this year, we introduced a new system for the control of public spending.

Before any Government can decide how much they will spend, it is essential that they should have a clear idea of what the country can afford. The rate of growth in public spending must be kept below the trend rate of growth of the economy. The Government have simply done what any family or business does every day—decided what they can afford and then decided how to spend it. If we had taken the Labour party's advice, we should have done the exact reverse—added up everything on which we would like to spend and then claimed that that was what we could afford. Labour plans its spending bottom up—an unedifying posture. The current round has been conducted on a strictly top-down basis, which is the only sensible approach.

In setting the annual ceilings for public spending, we have made allowances for the effects of the economic cycle, but without loosening our grip on total Government expenditure over time. It would be wrong to rein back on social security spending directly related to the recession and wrong to squeeze other programmes to find the necessary money to pay for it.

That does not mean, however, that the recession is an excuse for public spending to be let rip. We must not allow the temporary and unavoidable increase in spending to be absorbed into a permanent increase. If we do, spending will ratchet ever upwards. The new control total that we have introduced seeks to distinguish clearly between spending related to the recession and other spending. As we emerge from recession we shall ensure that, when the cost of unemployment declines, other programmes do not grow and take up the slack.

That strategy was endorsed by the Cabinet in July. We set ourselves the remit to stick to our cash plans on the old planning total for 1993-94, but to achieve growth in the new control total across the next three years of no more than 1½ per cent. per year in real terms.

That was a challenging target. It meant reducing by half the average rate of growth in the non-cycical part of public spending compared with recent years. We have now set plans that fully meet the remit. The planned growth rate in the new control total for the next three years averages just under 1½ per cent.: 2¼ per cent. in 1993-94, but ¾ to 1 per cent. in the next two years.

A top-down approach implies the need to address priorities very clearly and resolutely. My erstwhile boss, and now noble Friend, Lord Lawson was apt to quote Mendes France's dictum that to govern is to choose. Lord Lawson was apt to quote it in French. However, as foreign languages are rightly frowned on in this Chamber, I shall say it in English. Foreign languages are frowned on except gobbledegook talked on the Benches opposite.

To govern is indeed to choose. One might go further and say that to be in opposition is to avoid choice; to call for everything and have to pay for nothing. Labour has called for lower borrowing, more spending, lower interest rates and, recently, even no tax increases.

The Opposition Front-Bench team do not confine themselves to speaking gobbledegook: they employ it in their accounting methods. The House may remember that yesterday we heard the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) give his analysis of car tax; the clear voice of a new school of economics. After a week in which he could study all our press releases, all the tables, all the figures, red books, blue books, brown books and grey books, planning totals, new control totals and the total of those totals, the hon. Gentleman came up with one calculation. He divided the cost of abolishing car tax by the estimate of extra car sales next year. Wow! The computers laboured at Walworth road and brought forth a mouse—a Brown mouse. What a gift for "Spitting Image": the "Alas, Smith and Brown" school of economics at work.

The essence of good government is to choose, and we have ensured that money is spent on priorities. Under the new system, final decisions rest with the Cabinet. Decision-making has become collective. Together, we took the view that we were honour-bound to stick to our manifesto commitments. We have done so. We chose to direct our spending plans to support industry, to educate the rising generation and to ensure adequate protection for the needy. Again, we have done so.

We have kept our election pledges on child benefit and all the benefits which we promised to uprate in line with inflation. We shall deliver the 153,000 homes that we promised would be provided through the Housing Corporation. We are expanding the city challenge programme, and will set up the Urban Regeneration Agency. We shall keep our promise to spend more in real terms on health.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): In about three or four weeks, it will be a year since the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised that he would introduce a mortgage rescue programme which would rescue 40,000 people. So far, it has rescued about 100. When will the other 39,900 be rescued? Will it be in the next three or four weeks? That is all the Chancellor has before his promise runs out.

Mr. Portillo: The building societies—rather effectively —committed their resources to slowing down the rate of repossessions. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that instead of carping about it.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): I was most interested in my right hon. Friend's comments about the ability of the Opposition to add up. I was one of those who, as reported in column 313 of yesterday's Hansard, was extremely disturbed about it. Does my right hon. Friend have enough information from the Opposition to cost their programme and determine what level of tax and what level of borrowing they would preside over, and even to determine whether the City of London could even finance that level of borrowing? Or is it a massive Labour cover-up?

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend will realise that those are questions for the hon. Member for Peckham, whom I described earlier as the Chief Secretary but who is in fact the shadow Chief Secretary. It is her responsibility to add up the promises that Labour makes and make sure that they can be delivered. Undoubtedly the hon. Lady will use her speech to enlighten the House.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East was pressed on his spending plans at a press conference on 9 November. He said that his proposals would increase public spending. Naturally, he was asked what was the figure involved. The hon. Gentleman said straightforwardly:

"I am not prepared to put a figure on it."

Thank goodness that the hon. Gentleman is now reinforced by the hon. Member for Peckham, who will undoubtedly ensure that a figure is put on it.

In our manifesto, we pledged to spend £6,300 million over three years on roads. We shall do that, but the money will now buy more roads than when it was promised. We shall build the Jubilee line extension, as we promised, provided that the agreement with the private sector can be signed.

Capital spending in the health service will reach record levels. Local authority spending of receipts will boost capital programmes on houses and schools. Our policy priorities will enable 25 per cent. more youngsters to have places in further education in the next three years, and enable more of our school leavers to join youth training. The present record level of students in higher education will be sustained. We shall reach the target set out in our manifesto of one in three entering higher education by the year 2000.

The hon. Member for Peckham issued a press release before the autumn statement listing all the promises that she thought we would break. We broke none of them. I hope that she will use her speech today to offer an apology, and possibly a word of congratulation. The decision that we took to protect capital spending stands in sharp contrast to the approach of some previous Governments. In the late 1970s, the Labour party was in power. It became temporarily converted to the need to control public spending. The House may remember that that was under the skilled tutelage, not to say psychotherapy, of Dr. Witteveen of the International Monetary Fund. After a few sessions on his couch, Labour's knee-jerk reaction was to cut capital spending.

Hospitals were cut by 29 per cent. Roads were cut by a staggering 33 per cent. Water investment was also slashed by a third. Labour's axe was swung with gusto, and its aim was unerring: always the capital project, the easiest target in the short term but the most damaging in the long term. The cuts were undiscriminating, unthinking and unwise.

The Labour party did not care. Well, one person cared. The junior Minister for Education, the hon. Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor), cared, and she resigned. But some had fewer scruples. Into her place stepped the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), to implement the cuts of her Government.

Mr. David Shaw: Where is she now?

Mr. Portillo: She sits opposite me.

An important decision that we took in the autumn statement was to limit for one year pay settlements in the public sector to a maximum of 1½ per cent. This is not an incomes policy. It is a decision by a major employer—the Government—to control its costs. At about £80 billion a year, the public sector wage bill accounts for more than one third of Government current spending.

Since we are preserving capital spending and maintaining support to people out of work, it is essential to seek pay restraint from people in work. However much Opposition Members would like to protect capital spending, they cannot afford to agree, because they cannot afford to disagree with the National Union of Public Employees and the Confederation of Health Service Employees.

Our approach to public sector pay has received widespread support. People know that it is reasonable for the Government to ask their employees to show restraint when many people in the private sector have no choice but to be restrained.

For a good number of people in the private sector, the recession has already brought about low pay, no pay rises, or loss of jobs. By contrast, during the past two years only about 2 per cent. of the jobs lost have been in the public sector. In each of the past three years, average earnings for public sector workers have risen faster than for those in the private sector.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Does the Chief Secretary accept that his proposals, together with the Prime Minister's comments about pay in the private sector, amount to a Government incomes policy? Was that part of the Conservative party's election manifesto?

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Gentleman may not have been listening carefully. I began this passage by saying that it was not an incomes policy, but an employer's attitude to the amount of money to be paid to the people who work for him, and I am now explaining that. I am happy to repeat to the hon. Gentleman that it is not an incomes policy.

My remarks about average public sector earnings during the past three years are true, not merely for doctors and teachers, but also for nurses, national health service ancillary workers, civil service clerical staff and local authority workers. Opposition Members should ask their constituents who work in the private sector what they think about automatic public sector pay rises, whatever the conditions in which we find ourselves. The state simply cannot make awards well above inflation, year in and year out, no matter what the state of the economy.

To return to the remarks of the hon. Member for Attercliffe, the Government should not and will not dictate what settlement levels are right for private sector businesses. It is up to each employer to decide what he or she can afford to pay. Everyone knows that, in general, the lower the growth in wage costs, the better the United Kingdom's competitive position will be.

The director-general of the Confederation of British Industry has said that, and has reminded us that previous experience is instructive. Often, Britain has had a competitive edge and has let the advantage slip because of higher real wage costs. It would be sad if history were to repeat itself and if the gains in competitiveness which flow from a lower exchange rate were to be frittered away in higher costs.

Growth in earnings is lower than for a generation. Even so, our unit labour costs are rising faster than in some of the countries with which we compete. During the past 10 years, we have come a long way, but more progress may be required if the United Kingdom is to succeed in the world of the 1990s.

People in prominent public sector positions should exercise restraint and set an example, especially hon. and right hon. Members. We cannot, as so many hon. Members have done, call for the protection of capital spending and the preservation of benefits unless we are willing to share in the sacrifice. The Government will therefore recommend to the House a resolution prescribing a nil pay increase for Members of Parliament from January, and I hope that there will be support for that proposition from both sides of the House.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): While wishing entirely to support and endorse what my right hon. Friend has said—it will be a sacrifice for many hon. Members to do that, but that is the example we have to set—what approaches has he made to the relatively newly privatised utilities whose chairmen and chief executives have increased their salaries by 100, 200 or even 300 per cent? Are they going to make a sacrifice?

Mr. Portillo: Although the levels of private sector pay should not be dictated by the Government, people in that sector have important responsibilities, and set examples. When I heard the message from the CBI conference that Members of Parliament should reduce their pay, I thought that a similar message might have been sent in the opposite direction, by some hon. Members to some of the people gathered at that conference.

The state of the Labour party worries me. In the run-up to the election, its members showed signs of beginning to understand free market economics. They talked about free markets, incentives and profits, but since then they have had a relapse. Yesterday, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East was again attacking the failure of free markets, sounding a little like a recording which might have been made in Poland in the late 1970s. Apparently, he seriously believes that a Government can spend their way out of recession—but they cannot.

The hon. Member made a famous remark at a press conference about the state being an engine of growth in the economy. Sometimes, I look across the Chamber and think that I see three great engines of growth—the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, the hon. Member for Peckham and the Leader of the Opposition. Three great engines of growth stoking up public spending—Gordon, the big blue engine, Harrietta, the pink railway carriage, and John, their fat controller, all huffing, puffing and shunting about, raising clouds of steam. The time has come to blow the whistle on all three.

Our new system of controlling public spending has forced us to distinguish between long-term and short-term objectives—between what is most important and what is less pressing. The discipline of working within fixed totals has obliged the Government to confront every increasing demand-led pressure. Every pound spent on one priority is a pound which is not available for another. We approach those decisions with determination and clarity.

An increasing proportion of our national wealth is taken by demand-led programmes: pensions, social security benefits and legal aid are just three. Every developed country is facing the need to support an aging population at a time when there is no increase in the size of the working population.

We shall need coolly to assess the impact on other programmes if those costs are allowed to continue to rise faster than economic growth. For the longer term, we need to consider the balance between provision by the state and by the individual. The Government have provided incentives for people to make provision themselves for retirement, beyond what is offered through state schemes, by building up their entitlements in personal and occupational pension schemes.

We face an evolving world in which, while the cold war is over, the country needs to face up to new challenges. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence is implementing, "Options for Change" and we shall continue to ensure that resources available for defence match the changing requirements placed on our armed forces.

Also, we must recognise Government's responsibility to ensure continuing improvements in our transport infrastructure. We have decided that the task is too great and important for the Government alone. The Chancellor has invited the private sector to play a larger role in meeting the transport needs of a competitive economy through his proposals to encourage private finance, and many of my hon. Friends welcomed that yesterday.

Other services which have traditionally been provided by the state need not be state monopolies. We have embarked on a policy of involving the private sector, whenever it is cost-effective to do so, in the supply of services, from social housing to prison management. The autumn statement takes that further. Our proposals on leasing should bring a welcome injection of new provision and new management to essential services.

My right hon. Friend's autumn statement demonstrates the Government's clear-sighted approach, not just to the problems of this recession nor just to the year ahead—nor even just to the three years covered by our plans—but to our determination to address the fundamental challenges facing many Governments, and to bring fresh thinking to that task.

The Government have faced up to hard choices and made tough decisions. For that reason, the autumn statement has been well received in the House and widely welcomed in the country. In the Lobby tonight, my right hon. Friend and the Government will deservedly be supported with enthusiasm.

5 pm

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): It is extraordinary that, on a day when another 10,000 redundancies have been announced, the Chief Secretary opened the debate without a reference to unemployment.

The Royal Bank of Scotland has announced that 1,000 jobs will go in each of the next three years, Blue Circle Cement is to axe 550 jobs, about one fifth of its work force, excavator maker JCB is to cut 80 jobs, and I understand that within the last few minutes it has been announced that about 5,000 workers are to be made redundant by British Rail.

In other words, we have today witnessed jobs disappearing in manufacturing, services, construction and energy in every region of the nation. Although the Chief Secretary found time to make quite a good joke about Thomas the Tank Engine, he did not find time to recognise just what is going on in Britain today.

We have seen in recent weeks some signs that the Government recognise that they have gone wrong. They must know that they have a problem on their hands. The trouble is that they cannot distinguish between the PR exercise that they think is necessary to create the good news story for the newspapers and the real programme for recovery that is necessary for the recession. So they make promises in which they do not believe and continue to say, as the Chief Secretary said today, that the ending of the recession can be left to the market. At the same time, they criticise those who call for Government action.

The autumn statement is a mix of measures in which the Government do not believe and which, even on their predictions, do not add up to achieving recovery. It will not bring an end to the relentless increase in unemployment, and today we have seen not only job losses rise but manufacturing output figures revealing a further fall.

Last month, the Prime Minister appeared live on our television screens, on ITN and on BBC News, and said, more in the way of a cry for help than a Prime Ministerial broadcast:

> "We are looking for a strategy that will deliver recovery, that will deliver growth, that will deliver jobs."

It is clear from the autumn statement that the Government are still looking.

Under pressure, the Chancellor has admitted the error of his ways, but, through lack of conviction, he has failed to apply the remedies that are needed. So instead of a housing policy to build, repair and modernise homes, we have the purchase—perhaps the nationalisation—of 20,000 empty properties. Instead of an industry policy, £400 is taken off the price of a new car. Instead of the release of the accumulated receipts of council house sales, we have the future release of receipts, if only councils can dump their houses and assets on to an already stagnant market. Worst of all, instead of an employment programme and policy, unemployment is left rising.

The Government have begun to admit their failures, but have failed to provide the solutions.

Mrs. Judith Chaplin (Newbury): The Labour party fought the last election on a programme of large tax increases. If, heaven forfend, Labour had won, would that programme have been implemented?

Ms. Harman: We did not fight the last election on a policy of increasing taxes. The Tories fought the election on misrepresenting our tax policies. Since the election, many people have lost their jobs, cannot pay taxes and are having to draw unemployment benefit.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): During that election the Labour party argued strongly and consistently that the upper earnings limit for national insurance was wrong and should be abolished. Does the hon. Lady still hold to that view?

Ms. Harman: Our policies were fair. In the current situation, we have set out how we would bring about recovery. To bring an end to the recession, we have suggested how our programme could be paid for. It is significant that Conservative Members can talk only about the programme of the Labour party prior to the last election, but have nothing to say about their autumn statement and the effects that might have.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) rose——

Ms. Harman: I will give way once more, especially to the hon. Gentleman, who spoke yesterday.

Mr. Ancram: In fact, I am hoping to speak later in the debate. In view of her remarks, will the hon. Lady put a figure on what Labour's programme would cost, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) having refused to answer that question?

Ms. Harman: We have set out what we believe needs to be done to bring an end to rising unemployment. We have said that the public sector must play an important part and that public spending will need to be increased. We have explained how our measures would be achieved. We have said, for example, that we do not believe it right to lift stamp duty on share dealing or that the recently privatised utilities should sit on billions of pounds in the bank when that money could otherwise be available for investment.

We have set out clearly our programme of what needs to be done and how it would be financed—[Interruption.] I am asked to give the figures. The Government throw out figures which, even on the day they are printed, prove to be wrong.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North) rose——

Ms. Harman: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me for not giving way. I must make progress.

The Government have begun to talk about growth, but there is no real expectation of growth. They have begun to talk about investment, but they have no strategy for it. They have also begun to talk about fairness, but they take money out of nurses' pay packets to make cuts in the national health service budget.

Many people believe strongly that the Government have simply stood by while the menaces of unemployment and recession have stalked us and engulfed every region of the country. People appreciate that there are worldwide economic problems, but they also know that our recession started earliest and is lasting longest.

Even against the background of worldwide economic problems, between 1990 and 1993, Japan's manufacturing output will have risen by 1 per cent. Manufacturing output will have risen in Canada by 2 per cent,; in Italy, by 2 per cent.; in France, 5 per cent.; in America , nearly 6 per cent.; and in Germany, 8 per cent. But manufacturing output in Britain will have shrunk by 5 per cent. The same story applies to business investment, total investment and the national income.

People hold the Government responsible for the way in which they have managed the economy, which has left us with soaring unemployment and public borrowing, with imports overtaking exports and with imports still rising, and with a stagnating housing market as we are about to enter our third winter of recession.

There is a strong feeling throughout the nation that the Government must act positively. They must provide a recovery programme that will lift the fear of unemployment, stimulate the housing market, provide stability and confidence for industry and provide incentives for investment. The recession has cost the nation dear. This year, we have spent £1·5 billion more on unemployment benefit because of it. It has also cost the Treasury in lost receipts. This year, Treasury receipts were £5 billion less than last year because of the recession.

Despite the upbeat talk, the autumn statement is not a recovery package. Without investment and growth, we shall not see an end to the relentless increase in unemployment. The fear of unemployment and high personal indebtedness hang over the economy. I was struck by the fact that, when the Chancellor spoke on the economy at the Tory party conference, the only time that he mentioned debt was when he mentioned his personal debt to the Prime Minister for keeping him in his job.

The personal sector's financial liabilities have increased from £204 billion in 1985 to £470 billion in the first quarter of 1992. The ratio of personal sector debt to personal incomes has risen from 86 per cent. in 1985 to 115 per cent. in 1991. Against that background, the Government will not end the recession simply by waiting for people to go out shopping. People are burdened by personal debts.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): I, too, am concerned about investment and recovery. One of the biggest investors in East Anglia is Anglian Water, which has a huge programme for improving the environment and investing. If that utility is taxed, will it continue to invest in improving the environment?

Ms. Harman: We have been talking about profits made in the depth of a recession by utilities that have been privatised and are now running a monopoly. They can certainly find enough money to make donations to the Conservative party. We think that people in East Anglia would rather see that money invested to boost the construction industry and create demand in the economy than sitting in a bank account.

The lack of demand in the economy and the squeezing of profit margins mean that private industry will not move into recovery simply in response to lower interest rates. The Government have been forced to go some way towards acknowledging that public investment is important in ending the recession, although the Chief Secretary moved slightly away from that today. The growth in public sector investment is set to fall from 7 per cent. this year to 1·25 per cent. next year, and the Government forecast an increase of only 0·25 per cent. in total fixed investment.

With 400,000 building workers on the dole and 60,000 homeless families living in temporary accommodation, Tory as well as Labour-controlled councils, the construction industry, employers and unions are increasingly angry that the Government will not let councils use the £5 billion capital receipts from the sale of council houses to build more homes and provide a boost for the construction industry. The Labour party has consistently argued that it is plain common sense to allow the progressive relaxation of the constraints on capital receipts. The Government have refused to unlock that £5 billion of capital receipts. Instead, they have said that councils can spend all the receipts from their sales between now and the end of next year.

Thus, councils have thirteen and a half months in which to sell. In his statement yesterday, the Chancellor told us that that would stimulate extra capital spending by local authorities of more than £1·75 billion. But that figure is bogus. To reach it, councils must not only maintain the level of council house sales but increase it in that thirteen and a half months by 20 per cent. Does the hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) think that his council will increase the sale of council houses in his local authority by 20 per cent. in the next 13 months, against a background of redundancies and a wage freeze in the public sector?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Lady has outlined a number of problems facing us in the economy today, but does she honestly think that defying the 1·5 per cent. guidelines for public sector pay increases and going for bigger increases will reduce unemployment, increase investment or solve any of the problems that she has outlined? Moreover, has she any idea how she would pay for it?

Ms. Harman: I am trying to deal with capital receipts. I shall deal with the public sector pay freeze in a moment.

Does the Chief Secretary really believe that council house sales will even hold steady this year? Does he expect us to believe that council house sales will go up by one fifth next year? Will more people buy their homes against a background of rising unemployment? They will not, and the Chief Secretary must know that.

We have taken the time to check with local councils. On the basis of the latest right-to-buy applications, they expect not to keep council house sales steady but that there will be a dramatic drop in receipts from council house sales. In Trafford, applications for right to buy are down by 68 per cent.; in Sunderland, they are down by 50 per cent.; in Plymouth, they are down by 39 per cent.; in Calderdale, they are down by 55 per cent.; in Coventry, they are down by 52 per cent.; and in Enfield, they are down by 40 per cent.—that means a drop of 40 per cent. in council house sales.

Where will the £1·75 billion which the Chief Secretary promised come from if council house sales collapse, as councils know that they will? Is it that the money can come only from councils selling all their other assets—their pools, libraries and parks? Sunderland council said that it was even contemplating selling the pictures off the walls in the town hall. Is not the real story that either councils will not have that £1·75 billion to spend, or we are set to see an unprecedented asset-strip—a forced privatisation and a selling of public assets at the bottom of the market?

To produce false figures on such a key issue as capital investment is not the way to generate confidence in the construction industry. The absence of new construction projects and the uncertainty that hangs over those already announced will not bring confidence back to the beleaguered construction industry. The Jubilee line extension was first announced in January 1989. It was announced again in November 1989, and in May this year it looked as though it was off. It was re-announced last week, but still, we note from the Chief Secretary, with no start date.

Plans for the Heathrow express rail link project are near to collapse and the £400 million cut in the external financing limit of London Transport threatens a range of services that would not only provide work but improve the long-term economic competitiveness of our capital city.

The picture on overall investment is bleak and on private investment it is bleaker still. Business investment has fallen by more than 10 per cent. in the past two years. The Government have begun to express concern, but the sum total of their proposals will, according to their own figures, leave investment stagnating next year. Yet they plan to cut the Department of Trade and Industry budget in real terms from £1·6 billion this year to £0·9 billion by 1995-96. Hardest hit are regional and general industrial support, set to fall by 15 per cent. in real terms in just two years.

What justification can there be in cutting programmes such as those to create jobs in assisted areas, those to provide grants to development areas, or inner city training projects? Cutting the DTI's budget is not the way to generate industrial confidence and, by 1995-96, the DTI's budget will be the same size as the Department for National Heritage's budget. Perhaps the two Departments can be merged into one Department of Heritage, Trade and Industry, presided over by a Minister for Fun and Former Glory, as industry becomes our past, but not part of our future.

There are fears that the manufacturing sector will be so weakened that it would be unable to respond if there were to be an upturn in demand. For the first time in Greater London there are more people on the dole than there are employed in the manufacturing industry. As the recession hits, that will be the case in other districts as well.

Things are so bad that even the Conservatives' traditional winter ball is in trouble—I am glad to say. This year, many firms will not be going to the ball. Former staunch supporters that will not be attending this year include Taylor Woodrow, Charles Barker, a public relations company, and GKN. The chairman of Bauman Webber, glass manufacturers, when asked—as usual—to pay for an advert in the brochure for the ball, said:

> "It is the ultimate sick joke—asking British industry to lend support. Now I wish the function every possible failure."

Peter Edmundson of Anglia Secure Homes said:

> "The damage done by the inept dogma of the Government cannot easily be forgiven."

They are leaving the ugly sisters of recession and bankruptcy to go to the ball on their own. They will stay at home and so will many others.

The autumn statement predicts that growth is set to rise next year by only 1 per cent. But increases in productivity mean that growth of at least 2 per cent. is needed to stop the relentless increase in the dole queue. The Chancellor admits that unemployment is set to carry on rising. We now have the highest male unemployment since the 1930s.

The real level of unemployment is probably closer to 4 million than 3 million, and there is now a four and a half year high in the number of long-term unemployed. However, as the number of unemployed grows, the budget of the Department of Employment is to be cut. Training and enterprise councils are to have £36 million cut from the budget that they were promised for next year.

The Government preach about the iniquities of the dependency culture, but they create dependency on a massive scale as people who want to work are thrown on the dole. The Government are adding to the dole queue. After the threat to 30,000 miners' jobs, the squeeze on local government spending means that thousands of council workers across the country will be made redundant. The National and Local Government Officers Association estimates that up to 50,000 jobs will go. We are talking not about jobs that are to be moved from the public to the private sector under compulsory competitive tendering, but about jobs that will actually go.

Public sector workers face not only redundancy but a wage freeze. Cutting the real wages of 5 million public servants is not the way to generate consumer confidence. To freeze public sector pay, to have a centrally imposed pay ceiling, is an unfair policy which will not work. It also means that the Government are reneging on everything that they said about pay bargaining. It is unfair to make public sector workers pay the price of the Government's economic failures. The policy will not work. High wages in the public sector did not lead to the recession, and freezing those wages will not end the recession. However, it will mean Ministers going back on their promises.

In May this year the Secretary of State for Health said at the Royal College of Nursing:

> "The review body is safe. I can endorse the resolution demanding that the Government retains the nurses and midwives pay review body. We will."

The Chief Secretary has just said that the Government will impose pay restraints. If the Government keep the review body and accept its recommendation for nurses, other public sector workers who do not have review bodies will face either pay cuts or redundancies.

In order to impose pay restraints in the public sector, the Government have performed a U-turn in their drive to decentralise pay bargaining. National health service hospital trusts were recently told to set their own pay levels. Now they are being told that if they give workers an increase of more than 1·5 per cent., their services will have to be cut even further.

I hope that one of the Ministers will deal with the issue raised yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) as it was not addressed then. As my hon. Friend said, the Government have overlooked the effects on the public sector pay bill of increments, which are automatically paid as part of the contract, to nurses, doctors and many other public sector workers. That means that any workers who were denied their increments could take their employers to court. A decision not to pay the increments would require legislation. But if the Government stick to their 1·5 per cent. overall ceiling, paying the increments will mean that there is little if anything left for other public sector workers. I hope that the Minister will answer that.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): As my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General made absolutely clear yesterday, the 1·5 per cent. ceiling applies to settlements—the total amount of pay in the settlement for any given year that is awarded to a particular group. While the hon. Lady is listing the problems of a pay policy in the national health service perhaps she will explain why, under the last Labour Government, nurses' pay fell 3 per cent. in real terms, and has risen by 43 per cent. under this Government.

Ms. Harman: The Minister has not answered my question whether the increments that are automatically paid under contract are included in the 1·5 per cent. ceiling.

Mr. Dorrell: They are in the base to which the 1·5 per cent. is applied to calculate the amount available to that group.

Ms. Harman: Which means that other people who do not receive increments will either have their pay frozen or will have to accept pay cuts.

The Government say that they plan to use a public sector pay policy to make available an extra £1·5 billion. They say that public servants must make the sacrifice because there is no other way. But the Government who tell some of the lowest paid to take cuts in their standard of living plan to lift the stamp duty on share transactions next April—a move which will mean a loss to the Exchequer of £1·5 billion over the next two years.

On Tuesday the Prime Minister talked of the British people's instinct for fairness. People will not think it fair to take money out of the pay packets of nurses and put it back into the wallets of people dealing in shares.

Mr. Portillo: While we are on the subject of fairness, how will the hon. Lady vote on the issue of the pay of Members of Parliament?

Ms. Harman: I think that it is right that the pay of Members of Parliament should be taken out of the arena, and not be used as a political football. I believe that our pay should be tied to that of civil servants. That decision was right—our salaries should be pegged to civil servants' pay levels.

I should like to ask the Chief Secretary whether he and his hon. Friends who are baying for a pay freeze for Members of Parliament will accept that their directorships, consultancies and other jobs are to be kept within the 1·5 per cent. Do they want to have a spiralling increase —[Interruption.] There seem to be a number of different views among Conservative Members on that subject.

I do not think that people will think that the plans for the health service are fair. When we compare the expenditure planned for the health service with the figures in the autumn statement, we see that there is a fall of nearly £700 million.

The costs of the recession are not measured only in the wreckage of lives and communities. The costs can also be seen in our public accounts. Money pours out to finance the growing number of people who are forced to depend on benefits, and receipts drop as companies go bust. Those who survive see their profits fall. In just four years, the public sector accounts have gone from a surplus of £14 billion to a deficit of nearly £40 billion, and the debt is still rising. That is the real story of the recession as it affects the public sector borrowing requirement.

After the autumn statement Conservative Members cheered. They waved their Order Papers and breathless Tory Back Benchers enthused to waiting journalists that it was absolutely brilliant. One said, "He has given me everything I wanted and more."

There is no reason for anyone to have confidence in anything that the Chancellor or Treasury Ministers say. We can all remember the Chancellor saying that he had seen the green shoots of recovery, but astonishingly he still maintains that he did see them—he just could not explain what happened to them. These are the people who told us that a vote for the Tories on 9 April would bring recovery on 10 April.

The really impressive figures in the autumn statement, towering above all others, are the margins of error. The average errors in predicting growth in investment are now 17 times greater than the growth that they predict. The figures predict a quarter of 1 per cent. increase in growth of investment, yet the average error for such prediction in recent years has been a 4·25 per cent. overestimation. If the Government do no more than repeat their past errors, there will be, not an increase of a quarter of 1 per cent., but a fall in growth of 4 per cent.—I mean, a fall in investment of 4 per cent.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): The figures do not add up.

Ms. Harman: It is the Government's figures which do not add up. The 0·25 per cent. increase in investment figure must be set beside the next column of figures, which shows that there is likely to be an average 4 per cent. drop.

It is clear that the Government's belief that the market will sort everything out has left them and the Chief Secretary as spectators while the recession deepens and jobs are lost. The right hon. Gentleman has no idea of how to end the recession; he does not even mention the job losses. The market has failed to offer answers to the new challenges of the environment, the north-south divide or the changes in the former Soviet Union and eastern Europe. Having been in power for so many years, the Government now talk about opportunities and say that everyone else must take up those opportunities—yet the Government have allowed their opportunities to pass them by.

[Ms. Harman]

Of course there have always been opportunities, but the Government have not been prepared to turn them into realities for Britain. Throughout the country people are fearful of unemployment and of businesses folding. They are desperate for a reason to be confident, but the Government have a blind spot: they will not see that when the economic situation is as serious as it is the Government, and the Government alone, can stem the tide of disaster.

Confidence cannot be restored to the economy unless confidence in the Government is restored, and no one can have confidence in this Government. It is they who are the obstacle to the recovery that we need.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): I call Mr. Terence Higgins——

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, which is highly germane to this debate. While my hon. Friend has been speaking, news has been coming in—she alluded to it briefly—of an announcement of 5,000 redundancies by British Rail——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Wilson rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Redundancies outside have nothing to do with the Chair; neither have I had any requests for a statement.

Mr. Wilson: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it be in order to request a statement on the redundancies announced by British Rail this afternoon?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have made it clear that I have had no requests for any statements. [HON. MEMBERS: "You have now."] Order. I have made it clear that I have had no requests for statements on any subject.

5.33 pm

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): I join my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary in congratulating the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) on her new appointment. No doubt we shall be hearing her speak in that capacity for many years to come. Unlike her, I welcome the autumn statement and I believe that in retrospect it will be seen as a turning point in our economic affairs.

I begin by dealing with an issue that has been too little mentioned. In his Budget speech in March, the Chancellor referred to a decision to change the annual Budget timetable so that tax and spending proposals would in future be presented to Parliament at the same time. He then issued a White Paper on budgetary reform in March. Both the Budget statement and the White Paper were rather overtaken by the general election, so an important change in our parliamentary procedures has been overlooked.

My right hon. Friend asked for comments on the White Paper. I do not know whether he has received many, but right hon. and hon. Members have not fully appreciated what is proposed. It has always been a strange feature of our affairs that what we describe as a Budget is not what people usually regard as one, because ours is concerned only with raising taxation; it does not bring together the two sides of the equation—taxation and public expenditure. Hence my welcome for my right hon. Friend's proposal.

The bibliography at the end of the White Paper, curiously, does not refer to the report 10 years ago of the Select Committee on Procedure (Finance) which dealt at considerable length with this issue. Although the report —I had the honour to chair the Committee which produced it—received a very dusty reply from the then Financial Secretary, I hope that as the Chancellor has now agreed to take the two sides of the equation together, which was our main point, he will also look at some of the other recommendations that we made.

There is a case for putting the technical matters which usually appear in the Finance Bill into a separate Bill, and for introducing a taxes management Bill embodying the aspects relating to changing rates, and so on. New taxes should appear in the form of separate legislation. I hope that Treasury Ministers will consider a number of these points.

I welcome the fact that next year we shall have two Budgets—one at the usual time and, if the proposals go through, another in December. That will have a radical effect on some of the points that we debate in this House.

We should also consider another point from the Select Committee report that I have mentioned. In this House we exercise a degree of control over taxation and public expenditure but, strangely, we have never had any control over borrowing. There is certainly a case—it happens in the United States—for our having some control over it, if only as a trigger to provoke a necessary debate if borrowing reaches excessive levels.

As for the broader aspects of the autumn statement, we have been interested in how policy has been set out after the withdrawal from the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. We had an emergency debate, the Chancellor appeared before the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, he made his Mansion house speech, and now we have had the autumn statement. The pattern of policy has now been comprehensively and clearly stated.

A great deal of criticism has been launched at the fact that we joined the ERM and then withdrew. Even with maximum hindsight at the point when we joined—had we known then that we should be forced to withdraw when we did—it would still have been the best way to reduce inflation from 11 per cent. to 4 per cent. Any other way of achieving that objective, by deflation or other means, would have been much less satisfactory and a far more painful way of attaining the Government's fundamental achievement of reducing inflation to the point at which we can resume non-inflationary economic growth. That is the idea contained in the autumn statement.

Although my right hon. Friend's autumn statement was rightly acclaimed by Conservative Members, we shall be repeatedly told in the next three or four months by the media and by the Opposition that it has failed in its objective. Whatever had been done, unemployment is a lagging indicator and would have continued to rise. That does not mean that what my hon. Friend did in the autumn statement was wrong; nor does it mean that we shall fail ultimately to produce the necessary results if we are to get back to growth.

There is no doubt that the balance of payments is likely to deteriorate in the coming months. The well-known J-curve effect is bound to have an impact. Import prices will rise, with an adverse effect on the balance of payments, and it will be some time before exports pick up and reverse that trend. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will not be put off by anything that the Opposition say, either about the trend in unemployment in the immediate future or about the balance of payments. The measures that he has taken are the right ones and we shall see a resumption of growth.

When there is a devaluation or a fall in the exchange rate of the kind that we have experienced, it is usual to say that the Government should deflate in order to make that exchange rate stick. That was not necessary in the present circumstances. Had we remained in the ERM, we were heading not for zero inflation but probably for minus 1 per cent. or minus 2 per cent. inflation. Therefore, there is no reason to take further action in terms of deflation and the balance struck by my right hon. Friend in the autumn statement is about right.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): I note my right hon. Friend's assessment that we might have had minus 1 per cent. or minus 2 per cent. inflation. At what stage did he think that the monetary squeeze imposed by the ERM was much too strong?

Mr. Higgins: The question that needs to be considered is precisely the one that I posed a moment or two ago. We saw a fall in inflation from 11 per cent. to 4 per cent., and we may see a further slight decline now. None the less, that was the least painful way of achieving that fall. In that sense, the fact that we were in the ERM was beneficial to Britain.

There are difficulties about the cross rate between the deutschmark and the dollar, over which we have relatively little control or influence, but the exchange rate is probably about right. The general level in relation to both those currencies is near enough correct. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said, we have had a substantial cut in interest rates by 3 percentage points in a short period and, in addition, a change in the exchange rate, which I believe will produce the right level of growth.

Having said that, we need to be clear that in those circumstances one should allow the so-called automatic stabilisers to operate fully. I was rather heartened by what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said about distinguishing between cyclical increases and non-cyclical increases in public expenditure. As the hon. Member for Peckham also rightly pointed out, one must not seek to offset by further reductions in public expenditure or increases in taxation the fall in revenue which is also the result of the recession in the same way as there is an increase in public expenditure on social security benefits. I hope that that is a point on which there can be complete agreement on both sides of the House; otherwise, there would be a dangerous situation.

There is clearly a problem with regard to funding. I welcome what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said yesterday about further privatisation proceeds. I have always argued, as has the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, that privatisation proceeds should be regarded as a means of funding the public sector borrowing requirement rather than looking at them in any other way. It is also important to stress the help to funding the PSBR which was the result of borrowing foreign currency before we withdrew from the ERM—selling deutschmarks and buying sterling—which has itself made a considerable contribution to the funding process.

Another point that I hope that my right hon. Friend and his colleagues will consider carefully is that the PSBR, M4 and all the other indicators are in many ways a deficient way of managing our economic affairs. I have always thought it strange that in private business one has an income and expenditure account and a balance sheet, but the Government have only an income and expenditure account and pay no regard at all to the balance sheet.

The reality is that over the years we have seen huge fluctuations in the net worth of the British economy, or the Government sector, which have clouded many important aspects of economic management. Now that we have better data on that, we shall gradually be able to construct a more sophisticated Government balance sheet and national balance sheet. Some attention needs to be given to that important issue.

I have already said that the devaluation, the cut in interest rates, and the autumn statement will return us to non-inflationary economic growth, but it has to be done in the international context. I am glad that the Prime Minister has taken such a tough line on the Uruguay round of the GATT negotiations. It would be absurd if a dispute about whether there should be a subsidy in a particular country for oilseed, or whatever, were to jeopardise the entire GATT negotiations and the Uruguay round on which the immediate and long-term future of the world economy so importantly depends.

Therefore, I hope that the negotiations now taking place will be brought to a successful conclusion. It would be absurd for narrow national interests within the EC to jeopardise our negotiating position, adherence to the GATT rules as they now are and the future improvements in that area.

Having said that, I believe that the Government's overall policy is now right and that the autumn statement will be seen as a turning point in our economic affairs when we review these matters in the future.

5.46 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) was right to draw attention to the importance of GATT, something on which I am sure that the House is united. He mentioned that we shall have two Budgets next year, but he will realise that we have had two Budgets this year. There is no question but that this autumn statement has been rather more of a Budget than the usual autumn statement.

This autumn statement owes its origins entirely to the consequences of black Wednesday, 16 September. It is a great pity that all the voices that we heard from Germany and elsewhere did not penetrate the Treasury to bring about an agreed devaluation which would have saved £1 billion or £2 billion. The voices were strong and the nonsense of going up to 12 per cent., then 15 per cent. and then coming down, was one of the more shameful aspects of the whole affair. We were behaving like a banana republic when we should have had greater sense and a greater feel for the situation. The Treasury always used to have that, the Bank of England certainly had it, and it is a great pity that, at a time of crisis, their tentacles did not spread to an understanding of those matters.

We are seeing a discontinuity. There has been a fundamental change, quite rightly; one would expect it, following the events of black Wednesday. Old policy had to be thought out afresh, and I do not grumble at that. However, those who try to pretend that that is part of the continuing pattern of reacting to the kind of dogmas that we had in the past fail to understand the fundamental change that we are seeing.

In order to illustrate that, we need only consider the autumn statement and what would have happened if we had not had black Wednesday. It is fairly clear that there would have been some big changes in the autumn statement. Let us look at one or two.

A 1½ per cent. growth is expected in domestic demand. I suspect that that would have probably been zero. Non-oil GDP is going up by 0·75 per cent. Again, it would have been zero or perhaps less. The right hon. Gentleman talked about negative inflation and he could well have been right. Manufacturing output certainly would not have grown; it would probably have shrunk further. The retail price index could well have gone down and it might even have met some of the true definitions of deflation—negative inflation.

Those things have changed. We heard that the Chancellor was singing in his bath, but for someone who has lost Britain £1 billion or £2 billion that seems to be an excessive reaction.

Inflation is not the main priority. It has been the main priority for all Chancellors of the Exchequer in the past, and it has now changed. Clearly, levels of inflation will be rather more than had previously been thought.

The Government's main priority is moving towards growth, and I am delighted to see that—in terms of words, if not entirely in terms of actions—they are moving towards growth in manufacturing industry. About time too. At least the Government are making the right sounds, even if they are not doing the right things. In the past, people have looked to the City for the salvation of our economy. When Churchill pointed out that finance should be less proud and industry more content, he may have been acknowledging that finance depends on industry. The lesson that must be learned is that manufacturing industry is not just an add-on, but a fundamental part of the whole.

London owes its development as a financial centre entirely to manufacturing industry, which, in the past, produced the goods that made London a means of putting money into industry. Similarly, New York became the financial centre of the United States, because it provided the means of putting money into the big steel makers and so forth. Today, Frankfurt is a major financial centre because it is responding to the needs of German manufacturing industry. Formerly, no one had heard of Tokyo as a financial centre; now it is one of the two or three major financial centres of the world, for the same reason.

The Bundesbank has become powerful not because it is the cause of German success, but because it is the result of that success. If our industry were equally successful, I might be prepared to adopt the view of the Bank of England that so many Germans take of their Bundesbank; unfortunately, however, our manufacturing industry has declined. Even today, the Financial Times contains pages of great manufacturing names that are going under, and we have not yet reached the end of that unhappy roll.

I am delighted to learn that the Government are now talking of manufacturing industry in more respectful terms than they have ever used before. When he was Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, Nicholas Ridley—now Lord Ridley—said:

> "I do not think it is a disaster if we become an economy primarily based on the service sector. It isn't vital that we have a large manufacturing sector."

I think that it is indeed a disaster that we have allowed manufacturing industry to decline so badly. It is not just a question of jobs, although of course jobs are important; it is a question of output.

When manufacturing industry is becoming more efficient, it is possible to employ declining numbers, and to use the wealth that is created to improve the infrastructure and our social services—to help our fellow citizens, in fact. The more we make, the more we replace imports; the more we make, the more we can export; and the money that produces can pay for the improvements I have cited.

Not so long ago, we used to make virtually everything in this country. That certainly happened in my lifetime: indeed, it was happening when I was a young man working in industry. If a customer wanted to buy something, he turned to the various directories that were the equivalent of today's Yellow Pages, which advertised any number of goods. We made everything—from typewriters to washing machines, from cars to textiles. We may have imported some goods, but in the main they were curiosities.

I appreciate that the world has changed, and that there is now international specialisation. Nevertheless, the most important aspect of our former dominant industrial position was the fact that, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer increased demand, he also increased production at home: the two went together. Now that we import so many of our manufactured goods—more than we export—the use of demand management to control the economy is not the same as it used to be. If demand is increased, the number of imports also increases. That is why, for the first time for 10 or 15 years, manufacturers must be helped directly if they are to be helped at all. They cannot be helped in the same "macro" ways that were used in the past.

Mr. Bellingham: I agree with some of what the right hon. Gentleman is saying, but I think that he should be careful not to sell Britain short. According to the German magazine Director, 27 of the top 50 European companies are British.

Mr. Sheldon: That has always been the case. Fifty or 100 years ago, we had the largest companies in the world; unfortunately, size did not always go together with efficiency or performance.

I welcome the Chancellor's acceptance of the importance of capital allowances, for which I have argued throughout my parliamentary life. Obviously Labour Members must welcome it, as it was part of Labour's programme. However, I would have preferred the allowances to be rather higher. Until now, they amounted to 25 per cent.; that was nonsense, as salesmen often received 25 per cent. commission on orders, and in most cases the true depreciation—the price that could be obtained for the sale of the asset—was well below 75 per cent. of the purchase price. That was not an investment incentive; it was an investment disincentive. Those who invested in plant and machinery lost money.

I am also delighted that the Chancellor has restricted the measure to plant and machinery. I have repeatedly argued for that as well. Much so-called investment is not real investment at all: it may be spent on office furniture and fancy reception areas. Investment in plant and machinery is the closest that we can get to a definition of true investment. I should, of course, have been happier if the Chancellor had increased the allowance to 60 or even 70 per cent. There was a time when free depreciation operated.

I understand that the allowances are to be time-limited, but I do not believe it. I think that they will be built into the new sensible approach to manufacturing industry, and will become a permanent memorial to the Government's change of attitude. At least they are now facing the realities. It is a pity that this is happening during a recession, because we shall not see the desired levels of investment; but at least something is being done.

I was pleased to note that Howard Davies of the CBI was inching back to a better understanding of manufacturing industry. I also welcomed the formation of the National Manufacturing Council. Its members, however, cannot forget their past: they still feel constrained to make a bow to their past political errors. They talk of the record of the 1980s, and state that manufacturing made considerable strides then. That is obvious nonsense. I lost 33 per cent. of my companies between 1979 and 1981. The council also mentions progress since 1985, but its views sound like those of Tory politicians rather than representatives of manufacturing industry.

As I have said, I lost one third of my companies, and I feel badly about it. They were not old-tech companies; they were medium-tech companies of the kind that can be seen in France, Germany, Japan and indeed every country in the world. Those companies went bust and closed their doors, and it is possible that a further 10 per cent. will go.

The country as a whole has experienced a similar decline. These are serious matters: the narrowness of our present industrial base is one of the country's main problems. We have an horrendous balance of payments deficit, in the middle of the deepest recession since the war. Along with that deficit—a deficit of historic proportions —we are experiencing the miserable failure of our export performance. We must ask why that is happening. In the past the two developments would never have coincided, but we have grown accustomed to experiencing a balance of payments deficit in the midst of a slump.

Sir Terence Beckett, the former director general of the CBI, once called for a bare-knuckled fight. He did not like the Government's attitude to the slump between 1979 and 1981. He came from manufacturing industry and realised the damage that was being done to it, but he did not realise that powerful importers and financiers were members of the Confederation of British Industry. Conservative party voices had high places in the CBI. Unfortunately for manufacturing industry, therefore, Sir Terence was soon brought to heel. That was very sad. He understood manufacturing industry. He thought that the CBI represented it, but it did not. At least the CBI is making up a bit for that now. Howard Davies and a few other voices are moving in the right direction. It is up to us to encourage them.

British producers have been helped by the depreciation of the pound. It was fixed at an absurd level. I should have preferred the pound to be somewhat lower than it is now against the deutschmark. Failing a revaluation of the deutschmark, it is a pity that we and the other European Community countries found it impossible to get together and devalue our currencies so as to force a revaluation of the deutschmark. That cannot be done, though; the differences between us are insuperable.

I have always been and I am still in favour of a fixed exchange rate. Wildly fluctuating rates of exchange are a barrier to competitive pricing. We cannot price finely when the rates are going up and down every day and every week. There has to be a readjustment of exchange rates every two or three years, though. Even if the readjustment is 10 per cent. or 15 per cent., it is less expensive than the violent fluctuations that force manufacturers to fix high prices in order to cover their profit margins.

At one time it was possible, depending upon whether one was importing or exporting, to hedge in the forward market. If one sold a batch of goods that went on a certain ship on a certain day, one could hedge perfectly. We cannot do that now. The home and the export markets are much the same. People buy over a long period, then cancel, or hold one up. If one hedges against that, one may lose money on one's currency as well as losing money on one's sales. Therefore, manufacturers cannot operate in that way. We must therefore accept the need for fixed exchange rates that will have to be readjusted every so often. We cannot fix the exchange rates for ever.

Capital programmes take time to come to fruition. The new deal in the United States resulted in the great Tennessee valley authority, but it was several years before they began to feel the effects. We are experiencing the same problems. It takes time before people can be employed. However, we can do something about housing starts. We can free the capital resources held by local authorities, though not enormously. I have enough of the Treasury mentality still in me to know that one cannot throw those resources away, but we can do something in that direction.

We can do something even better in the case of housing repairs. They get people working next week. There are jobs that I could hand out straight away to people who come to my advice bureau. I am sure that every other hon. Member is in the same position. It is a pity that we have not turned our attention to that aspect.

As for the international dimension—GATT and Maastricht—the economic aspects of Maastricht do not bother me that much. I do not believe that monetary union will ever work, so I am more relaxed about it than are some of my colleagues. Does any hon. Member really believe that Italy will fit in with a German-dominated, fixed and unalterable economy? I just cannot see it. It is dreamland. I have seen the results of some of the intervention policies in relation to farm subsidies.

In one instance, Germany had about 500 cases of fraud each year; we had about 600 cases; and Italy had about three. There are differences between countries. Anybody who thinks that we can merge countries together just like that is mistaken. I am not bothered about that, however: it will not happen. It is a pity that all the European Community countries will not consider the Bill in Committee. Committee stages expose such nonsenses. I am sure that they will be exposed during our Committee stage.

Mr. Budgen: Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that he has touched upon one of the many arguments used by those in the Conservative Whips Office—"Vote for the treaty," say they. "We know that it's a complete nonsense, but if you're right in saying that it's nonsense, it will break up and it won't have the effects that you say it will have". Is it not a fact, however, that to vote for nonsense probably imposes upon the British people the risk of a return to the over-tight credit that they have endured for the last two years, and that, before it breaks up, a great deal of damage will have been done to our fellow citizens?

Mr. Sheldon: My feeling, although it is not so strong as it is in relation to my previous comments, is that we shall not get that far. We can see the cracks now. We shall not need to wait very long. The danger about bothering about that is that we are not bothering enough about what is even more important. The Prime Minister was right to draw attention to the difference between Maastricht, which is a nonsensical problem, and the real problem of GATT and the equally great economic problems of Russia and the eastern European countries. It may not be long before they cease to be economic problems. They could become political problems, and even military problems. It is wrong to concentrate on these preoccupations and to ignore the greater problems that could yet face us.

The return to growth promises very little. It also depends upon the Government's incomes policy—compulsion in the public sector and exhortation in the private sector. The first will not work very well. The second will be a complete failure. The Government talk about the failures of the past. They need to think about the failures of the present. The autumn statement suggests that they have quite a bit to learn.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): It has been extremely interesting to hear the old and the new economic voices of the Labour party. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) made a strong case for manufacturing industry. I suppose that he is unaware of what is happening in the far east, in the ASEAN countries, and I suppose that he is unaware that China is building hundreds and hundreds of factories, using local labour. British, Hong Kong and Taiwanese companies are investing in China and are producing exactly what the right hon. Gentleman looks back to—almost to the old Commonwealth preference days when it would all have come right again.

I have visited the Shanghai Tool company. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has visited it. It is an enormous conglomerate. It makes tens of thousands of tool kits, spanner sets and all the other goods that we import. If we went into any hardware shop, we should find that nearly 80 per cent. of the goods on sale there come from the far east. They certainly come from Taiwan. They certainly come from the Shanghai Tool company. Apart from our own peripheral problems, we shall be forced to compete with giants, in manufacturing terms. Sometimes we lose sight of what is happening in the rest of the world.

This debate ought to be called a confidence debate. Our society needs to place more confidence in our banking industry, our investors and our shippers. Anyone listening to Opposition Members today would have gained little confidence from them and would not immediately have rushed out to phone their broker and say, "Buy me into UK Limited."

Years ago, we had the British disease in manufacturing, but now we have despondency. We cry immediately that nothing will work out. I view the autumn statement as a good step towards restoring confidence in the private sector. Shadow Ministers have a great responsibility to advance their party's policy, but they must ensure that they do not denigrate everything that this House or the other place is doing. That is a road to disaster.

I do not think that everyone needs to have run a business to understand business. We are more a university of business than a house of business and sometimes our theories go a little awry.

Some years ago, I tabled written questions on joint ventures between the public and private sectors on road and bridge construction. I am pleased that at long last we are moving strongly in that direction. That is exactly what is happening in China, Taiwan and Singapore, and it is a good example to follow.

One of the best confidence-boosting measures in the autumn statement is that designed to deal with the problems of the housing market. Once again, it has been denigrated as being too little, too late, but £750 million has been allocated to buy unoccupied homes which are falling into disrepair. We have some magnificent housing associations, and I can think of two in my constituency—Hythe and South Bank housing association and Swaythling housing association. They will be eager to obtain some of those millions, with which they could buy quite a number of empty properties that are being vandalised. In the short term, it will do much to house homeless people and to reduce council lists.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): It will not work.

Mr. Hill: The hon. Gentleman obviously did not listen to the first half of my speech: we must have some confidence, and £750 million is not an insignificant sum.

Mr. Howarth: But not false confidence.

Mr. Hill: I eagerly await the hon. Gentleman's speech, which will be very depressing.

The issue of councils being able to spend capital receipts has been running for some years. It became apparent during the election campaign that councils could spend 25 per cent. of their receipts from sales, but now they will be able to spend 100 per cent. That is a good move, but not all local authorities have been assiduous in selling their council house stock. Some of them have made it almost impossible for tenants to buy, and we had to enact legislation to force them to sell. Tremendous incentives are now on offer to councils which have not been politically inspired to sell council houses.

My right hon. and hon. Friends in the Treasury could consider the provisions on the purchase of capital equipment. Increasing allowances from 25 per cent. to 40 per cent. is a bit mean. Manufacturers are looking forward to selling JCBs, tractors or anything made in the United Kingdom and to a higher allowance than 40 per cent. Perhaps that could be considered in the next Budget.

I am pleased to see that an extra 8 per cent. has been allocated to further education colleges, but we now have a problem with primary schools. In Hampshire, 72 primary schools are consulting on whether to close, merge or continue. At little cost, some of them could be turned into joint primary and middle schools and could be used to the benefit of the community. The community is adapting to primary school policies, and volunteers have much to offer. Sometimes the most run-down areas have the most enthusiastic volunteers, but a little more expenditure should be allocated to primary schools.

We have honoured our manifesto commitment to pensioners and families. That was surprising, given the despondency about the Government's proposals.

We must deal with the desperate state of our communications infrastructure, which is as essential to industry as industry itself. If a factory incurs extra cost in getting its products to a port or airport, or has to use a long winding route, that increases costs.

I hope that I have not spoken for too long. We must ensure a successful conclusion to the GATT round. I shall mention that to Delors and Mr. Mitterrand, who are playing a very dangerous game. Until they come round and see the benefits of GATT for the whole world, rather than a few hundred French farmers, we shall be in difficulty. It appears that there will be a push to get a decent settlement to the GATT talks, but I dislike the nationalistic approach to world problems.

6.18 pm

Ms. Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen): The autumn statement represents the vacuum at the heart of the Government's policy—the gap between what Ministers promise at the election and what they do when they are re-elected. It is a question of trust, and the Government can no longer be trusted. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), the shadow Chancellor, said yesterday, it is more a matter of misrepresentation to the people than representation of the people.

The Chancellor, who claims to favour capital investment, has cut the capital programme for London Transport. Much-needed renovation to lines that cause misery to London commuters is to be cancelled, and he refuses to provide urgently needed funds.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Anderson: I will not give way at this stage.

The Chancellor refused to provide urgently needed funds for the electrification of the west coast main line, which is vital to the economic regeneration of the north-west and is of considerable interest to businesses and people in my constituency.

I have to tell the Chancellor and other Conservative Members that the business men and women of Rossendale and Darwen view that omission with considerable concern and regret. It came as no surprise to me recently to receive a letter from a business man in my constituency who told me that, although he was a former Tory voter—he voted Conservative at the general election—he would vote Labour from now on. His letter ended with the words:

> "Never has so much harm been done to so many businesses by so few".

The Chancellor talks about giving the construction industry a kick start, yet he refuses to allow local authorities to spend the £5 billion of existing capital receipts to fund new housing. The builders in my constituency will not forgive him for that, either.

The Chancellor talks about growth, and the need to boost consumer confidence, yet he imposes a 1·5 per cent. ceiling on pay increases for some of the lowest paid workers in the country.

Meanwhile, the Secretary of State for Employment—I am sure that by rights he—[HON. MEMBERS: "She."]—should now be renamed the Secretary of State responsible for unemployment—proposes to turn the screw further by abolishing the wages councils.

Devaluation has cut the living standards of ordinary people, and so will the new incomes policy of a Government who are supposed to believe in the free market. While Lord King awards himself a pay rise of no less than £1,000 a week, those who work in the public sector are being asked to shoulder the burden of the Government's economic incompetence. According to the Government's logic, the cosseted privileged public sector workers must take their fair share of the pain of the recession. I suggest that Ministers tell that to the 3,500 staff who have lost their jobs in the national health service since the general election.

We are told that nurses can afford to take what amounts to a pay cut because they have greater job security than workers in the private sector. If that is true, the Government should guarantee that there will be no more nursing redundancies. Why should nurses take the blame for the Government's failure? Yet that is what has happened. The council tax is bad enough, but the tax on nurses, on whom we rely for our health care, is not only morally reprehensible but unjust and shortsighted. It is indicative of the Government's short-term approach to everything.

Another example of that misguided philosophy, hidden in the small print of the autumn statement, is the postponement of nurse prescribing. The general secretary of the Royal College of Nursing says that nurses have suffered a double blow in the autumn statement. Not only do they face a pay cut, but their long struggle to win prescribing rights has been swept aside in favour of short-term cost cutting.

The Department of Health's research into the cost of nurse prescribing proves it to be cost effective, and recognises that patients would be treated faster and nurses would gain increased job satisfaction if nurse prescribing were introduced. The Government fought a general election on a pledge to introduce nurse prescribing, and the Secretary of State for Health has made several commitments to the scheme, including one to implement it by October 1993.

The Conservative manifesto said:

> "We will introduce powers for nurses to prescribe where appropriate".

The Secretary of State said in the House on 3 May that the Government were fully committed to the idea of nurse prescribing. In a speech to the Royal College of Nursing congress on 22 April she said:

> "Nurse prescribing makes sense. It is a proper recognition of community nurses' skills. We will implement nurse prescribing by October 1993."

In November 1991 the Department of Health published a cost benefit analysis of nurse prescribing which found that the savings that it generated almost exactly offset the cost of implementing and running the scheme, even before a value had been placed on the improved service to patients.

[Ms. Anderson]

The declared aim of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 was to put patients' interests first. Similarly, the citizens charter and patients charter are based on that philosophy. If the Government are serious about putting patients first and delivering an effective health service, they should reconsider their decision to postpone nurse prescribing.

6.25 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): I join other Conservative Members in welcoming the autumn statement as an important step in the right direction, but I shall also sound two possible notes of caution. The first is that there is still a danger that the money supply may be too tight. The second is that, in common with several of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I am concerned that the fiscal side is in danger of becoming too loose. The combined effect of those two factors could be a double squeeze on the private sector—which, after all, generates all wealth.

Two monetary features of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's public spending announcement are welcome. The first is the 1 per cent. cut in interest rates. The second, and the more important, is his commitment to a monitoring range for broad money—M4.

After a third successive cut in interest rates and a substantial devaluation against all other currencies, it may seem churlish to suggest that the money supply may still be too tight. None the less, if we look around us at the economy, all the indicators are still of tight money, with the solitary exception of the narrow money measure MO. This morning's figures confirm that M4, which has fallen from a peak of more than 18 per cent., remains at about 5 per cent. I believe, as does the Bundesbank, that M3 is a better measure of economic output—and that has fallen from 22 per cent. to about 3 per cent. now.

The anecdotal signs in the economy, too, still suggest that money is too tight. I welcome my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's initiative with the banks. I believe that bankers are being thoroughly greedy at the moment, but we must recognise the fact that, as well as being greedy, they are frightened.

The situation in the motor industry is definitely improving; yet Ford has recently announced that it is substantially increasing its payment period to small suppliers in stages from 30 days to 120 days. That, too, is a sign of the tightness of money in the economy. What one company is doing is reflected in many others.

A third factor which suggests that money is too tight is the kind of national balance sheet analysis carried out by people such as Tim Congdon——

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro) rose——

Mr. Brazier: I will give way in a moment.

Such a balance sheet analysis shows, for example, that the ratio of mortgage debt to the value of the nation's housing stock is at an all-time high. The situation is similar in the commercial property sector, and that is especially important to the banks.

I am certainly not a gloom monger. I firmly believe that the measures announced by my right hon. Friend last week are exactly what we need to move us on towards recovery. However, I suggest that in at least one respect—on the residential side—there is a danger that the property market may go further.

There are two reasons for that, the first of which is historic. The ratio of house prices to earnings is now 3:1. It is important to look back to the last sustained period of low inflation for a comparison, because I believe that the Government have cracked inflation, so I shall look back to the decade from the mid-1950s to the mid-1960s. The ratio then was exactly 3:1. Because that ratio is a lagging indicator, in a recession, especially in the latter portion of a recession, one would expect it now to be rather below trend. So there are historical reasons for believing that house prices may fall further.

That reason is reinforced by a geographical fact: for the first time in its history, this country is about to have a land border—via the channel tunnel. The extreme disparity between house prices in south-east England and those in north-west France cannot continue to be as wide as it now is. Several of my constituents are already buying second homes, or even retirement homes, across the channel.

I suggest to my hon. Friend that it is possible that the housing market will have one further stage of readjustment to make and that that may result in further monetary tightening as people become less willing to spend as a result.

I do not suggest for a moment that we should try to persuade water to run uphill on house prices, but I believe that there are two respects in which it is important that we keep our eye on monetary policy. First, my right hon. Friend should think of tightening the monitoring range for broad money from a monitoring range to a firm target. If we find that M4 moves below the 4 per cent. bottom, we should then be willing, whatever is happening to the exchange rate, to loosen the money supply.

Secondly, and in some ways more importantly, we must look again at our funding policy. My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) was right to suggest that borrowing some of our money from abroad had a welcome loosening effect on monetary policy, which shows up in this morning's figures. I suggest that we should be willing to do not only what we did 10 years ago, but also what the Americans are doing now through the Federal bank: we must be willing, up to a certain point, to underfund. That is a way in which to get more liquidity back into the banks.

The fear of a £40 billion policy of gilt-edged sales next year is a significant factor in the tightness that we find in the market now. Long-range interest rates did not fall at all last week when base rate came down. Long-term interest rates actually marginally hardened, and they are now about 8·5 per cent.

That point brings me naturally to fiscal policy, the other side of my speech. As I stressed, we should underfund. However, no serious economist of any school believes that we could monetise the whole of next year's prospective deficit. Like others of my hon. Friends, I feel that we must be willing to consider some very unpalatable and painful choices in the medium term. We should plot a path over the medium term of five or six years back to a balanced budget and we should firmly commit ourselves to that path.

We must be willing to look at some unattractive choices, on both the tax and spending sides. I mention three items on my own shopping list on taxation, none of which would be very painful and each of which should be considered. First, we should end the anomaly whereby married couples can opt to have it both ways. Married couples can opt to be taxed separately and to claim the married person's tax allowance. I am all in favour of choice, but it seems wrong that a couple should be allowed to choose to have it both ways when public borrowing is so stretched.

Secondly, with the welcome measure to abolish car tax—a thoroughly sensible measure to assist a very important industry—it would be reasonable to complete the sensible move towards full fiscal neutrality on cars as a perk. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has already gone a long way towards that. He should complete the move in next April's Budget.

Thirdly, we should abolish the 50 per cent. discount on council tax for second homes, if they are genuinely second homes. There should, of course, be sensible safeguards for those in special circumstances, such as those who have had to move although the sale of their original residence has fallen through.

One area on the spending side in which I would not suggest further cuts is defence spending. That may come as no surprise to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary. I make two points. First, in a single decade—from the mid-1980s to the mid-1990s—on our present plans we shall have cut defence spending as a proportion of GDP from 5·2 per cent. to 3·2 per cent. Even if the international changes were as rosy as we thought they were when "Options for Change" was launched—I am not convinced that the international outlook is especially rosy—that is still a massive reduction in spending. It is far larger than the planned reduction in manpower. I suggest that further cuts in defence spending beyond our present plans would be unwise.

Secondly, it is now the defence procurement budget, almost alone of the various areas of Government spending, which directly and immediately reaches forward into manufacturing industry. When companies have short order books in other areas, it is potentially economically costly to cut defence orders. Such a cut could undermine the design bases of the companies involved.

We must face the fact that there will have to be some cuts on the spending side. I shall mention three areas that we could consider. The first is one aspect of higher education. I am a strong supporter of the increase in opportunity for higher education that we have provided. Participation in higher education has doubled. However, there is waste in one area of higher education. We have an extraordinary system—I do not know of any other country which has such a system—of sending the majority of our students away from home to study on courses, hundreds of miles away in some cases. In most other countries, the majority of people study at their local university, so neither taxpayers nor parents face the cost of accommodating them elsewhere.

The second area that we should consider is the legal aid budget. I welcome the modest step that my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor has taken. When I hear some of the howls of outrage, I am reminded of the old adage that hell hath no fury like a vested interest masquerading as a principle. The legal aid budget has doubled in four years and a 10 per cent. real increase is planned in each of the next two years, so we should look harder still at it. We should consider reducing the scope of legal aid as well as eligibility on which we have started.

The third area is spending on local government. We should ask ourselves whether we can justify each of the extra duties imposed on local government over the past few years. Many of them are welcome, but do we really need all of them? Last week, I came across one small example involving £30 million to £40 million a year. How could we have agreed to a new arrangement for the typing of Crown prosecution service documents which will cost an extra £750,000 in Kent alone next year? We must go through the fine print of such arrangements. We must be willing to take every step that we can, in little bits and in larger bits, to get the fiscal deficit down so that we can see a return to a balanced budget within five or six years.

I end where I came in. In a number of ways, the autumn statement is the package that we need for recovery. We have seen a substantial easing of monetary policy, although I should like to see us go further. We have seen a return to a monitoring range for broad money, and we have seen a number of welcome individual fiscal measures which will help vital industries towards recovery.

If the Government develop their policy further, we shall see a return to growth—sustainable growth—over the next year or two. It will be non-inflationary growth. We have beaten inflation. It is right that the clear, single objective of non-inflationary growth has been the Government's consistent objective since 1979.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): My speech will be mercifully short because of the weakness of my voice. Autumn may be a season of mists and mellow fruitfulness, but in the House of Commons it is a time of sniffles and hacking coughs. I am no exception.

I suggest that the autumn statement may be a turning point. Sadly, it is not a turning point in the nation's economic fortunes. As the autumn statement itself shows, the economy is still in profound recession, with rising unemployment, falling investment, and a large and growing balance of payments deficit at a time of recession, which must be very worrying.

It is, however, I believe, a turning point in the Government's approach to fiscal policy, and here I want to refer to the area about which the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) was speaking, although perhaps in a rather different way. Many commentators have concentrated on devaluation and the ability to reduce interest rates since we were forced out of the ERM. But of course there is little new about this. All that has happened is that we have returned to the floating world of the 1980s, a world which I thought had very grave disadvantages.

What is different in the autumn statement is that for the first time since 1979 the Government are overtly using fiscal policy in what can be described as a Keynesian way. Of course, Ministers are denying that this is the case. The Chancellor continues to say, as he said to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, that he does not believe in kick-starting the economy by "some artificial stimulus or device." This new approach has been forced on the Government by the depth of the recession, and of course the measures that the Government have adopted are too little and too late. Even so, most people would see measures such as the £750 million to buy empty houses, the temporary freedom of local authorities to use future capital receipts, the capital allowances for industry and the removal of the tax on motor cars as stimuli or devices to assist recovery.

Anybody who really believes that Tory economic policy is a seamless web, which is the line that is often peddled before our Select Committee, should compare the 1992 autumn statement—which I agree is a sort of mini-Budget —with the Budget of 1981. In the March Budget of that year the Government drastically tightened the fiscal stance even though the economy was in deep recession. The then Prime Minister's economic adviser called it the biggest fiscal squeeze of peacetime. We have been reminded by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) what that did to industry.

The 1992 autumn statement, with its £37 billion public sector borrowing requirement, its automatic stabilisers—I agree with the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), who was such a good Chairman of our Select Committee, that the automatc stabilisers are fully working —and, of course, the so-called recovery package, modest and inadequate though that is, is totally different in tone and emphasis from what happened in 1981.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): Does the hon. Gentleman not recognise that in the circumstances of the 1981 Budget we were looking at inflation of over 10 per cent.? Does he not accept that now, with inflation below 4 per cent. and still falling, it is a very different economic situation?

Mr. Radice: I agree that it is a different economic situation to this extent: that the recession is deeper, probably, and has lasted much longer. Therefore, it is right that we should be doing something about it.

Mr. Budgen: Since many hon. Members are concerned about the comparison between 1981 and 1992, there is a further difference. The period before 1981 had been marked by very considerable increases in the money supply and there was no doubt that for quite considerable periods credit had been much too lax. On the other hand, the period before today has been one in which credit has been much too tight.

Mr. Radice: I do not want to intervene in the grief of the monetarists because I do not really believe in all that stuff, as the hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well.

Unfortunately, though it may be different in tone, it is unlikely that this package will be enough to bring about the recovery that we all want. The Chancellor has pointed to interest rate reductions as his main weapon in bringing about recovery, but it will not necessarily do the trick. We have only to look at what has happened in the United States, where interest rates are much lower than they are in the United Kingdom, yet, even so, there is not a full recovery taking place there.

Anybody who wants to see what has happened to our debt ratio need only turn to chart 3.8 on page 65 of the autumn statement. It really puts the problem in relief, and it is a very severe problem. Lord Lawson, who was, of course, the chief architect of our financial liberalisation, has admitted that he underestimated the impact that it was likely to have, and it has brought this debt problem with it. The question is whether the reduction of interest rates will be enough to stimulate consumer spending. I do not believe that it will and I do not think that we can risk it. That is the case for Government action and for a more significant package than the Government have brought to the House in the autumn statement.

The Government have missed a tremendous opportunity in one area. They should have used all the existing capital receipts so that local authorities could go ahead with investing in useful projects. I believe that the package should be paid for by borrowing at this time. In a slump of this scale and length, the proper reaction is the Keynesian one of deficit Government financing.

I share, however, the worry about the size of the PSBR; it is £39 billion, I think, in the coming year and it could go up to £50 billion the year after, which would be 7 per cent. of gross domestic product, according to the Grey Book. I agree with my pair, the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), that we cannot allow the PSBR to continue at that level for any length of time. We see only too clearly the consequences in the United States not only in inflation but of the fact that, if the PSBR continues at a very high level for a long time, the Government lose their ability to act, their flexibility.

That is why I agree with the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North and believe that there is a case for increasing taxes, not necessarily in the next Budget but when the economy is on the path to recovery. We have to use all the weapons at our disposal and it is about time the Conservative party stopped its ideological objections to putting up taxes, even direct taxes, because they may need to do so and they should face up to that.

Mr. Higgins: The PSBR that the hon. Gentleman is talking about here is the one before the automatic stabilisers have worked through. He needs to place his worries about taxation against the background that we are back in a situation where they have worked. So I do not share the view expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) yesterday about taxation.

Mr. Radice: The right hon. Member for Shropshire, North wanted it in the next Budget; I do not want it in the next Budget. I want recovery on the way before we start operating. The right hon. Member for Worthing is, of course, right that once there is a recovery that in itself improves the PSBR, because expenditure on unemployment, one hopes, begins to come down and the tax take increases.

I also believe that there are very considerable problems with Keynesianism in one country, as we saw in France in 1981-83. There is always a danger if one expands one's economy when others are contracting theirs. That is all the more true in the United Kingdom when we have this enormous structural balance of payments deficit. I was very alarmed to see on page 65 of the autumn statement that the Government, or at any rate their forecasters, are predicting a further rise in import penetration. That must be extremely worrying and it suggests, as the Confederation of British Industry has pointed out, that our manufacturing base may now be too small, so that if we start to expand we shall suck in imports from abroad.

That makes the case for a European-wide programme of infrastructure projects, as suggested by Mr. Jacques Delors, but turned down by the Prime Minister at the Birmingham summit. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will take a more sensible attitude at the Edinburgh summit. Certainly there is a case for European-wide recovery. If we expand alone, our balance of payments deficit could become so large that it would be impossible to finance, and that must be a serious problem.

The autumn statement shows that old-style monetarism and primitive laissez-faire economics are out, and I am glad about that. There is a new agenda, in the United States and elsewhere, and that new agenda implies a more active role for Governments in economic affairs. In the autumn statement, the Government have moved half-heartedly in that direction. But their heart is not in it and, over the next few years, the country will turn to those who really believe in more purposive government—the genuine article, as represented by my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): Although I may not agree with everything that the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) said, I think that we would all agree that his new voice of mellow fruitfulness suits him; we hope to hear it again in the near future.

The debate to which I have listened over the past two days has been one of contrasts—not least that between Conservative Members' optimism and the considerable gloom and doom of the Opposition. I find it difficult to relate the attitude taken by the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) to the reaction that I found in my constituency last weekend.

Some time ago, when I asked Honda and Rover in my constituency what they wanted the Government to do, they told me that it would be helpful if the car tax was abolished. That has happened in two phases, and the necessary legislation is now before the House.

Given that jobs are at stake in this essential industry, it is surprising that the hon. Member for Peckham should say, disparagingly and somewhat dismissively, that all that the Government had done was to take £400 off the price of an average car. Car workers in my constituency welcome the change because it makes it more likely that they will keep their jobs in future. I should add that, although £400 may not be much to the hon. Lady, an awful lot of people will regard it as the deciding factor in considering whether or not to buy a car. Some Labour Members' suggestions show them to be quite out of touch with reality.

One or two hon. Members who have spoken have touched on the Government's attempt, which I warmly welcome, to use public sector money to increase private sector investment. That affects a number of areas, the first of which is housing. The Chancellor has told us that £750 million will be made available for the purchase of repossessed houses. I welcome that, because I believe that anything that firms up the housing market must, in the long run, be good for housing. I am sure that I am not alone in knowing of constituents who are holding back from buying a house not because they are frightened because they think they may not have the money to pay the mortgage, but because they think that if they wait another two or three months the price will have fallen; it becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy. Any measure which firms up the housing market will bring purchasers back into the market and give it the boost that the construction industry and housing in general so badly need.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will talk in detail to the building societies and housing associations. There is a fear that, as the housing market recovers, a case may be made in the building societies for repossessing houses which are not being repossessed at present because their equity value is too low. That would totally undermine everything that the Government seek to achieve. I hope that my hon. Friend will make that point to the building societies.

I hope, too, that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary was as disturbed as I was to hear suggestions this morning that housing associations would not use the £750 million to buy repossessed houses but would buy new ones. That will not produce the desired effect on the housing market. I hope that my hon. Friend will tell the housing associations, through the Housing Corporation, that the Government have provided the money for a particular purpose. If we are to make money available, we must ensure that it is spent in the most effective way.

I strongly endorse the proposal in the autumn statement to crack open, if not completely abolish, the so-called Ryrie rules. If ever rules prevented public sector finance increasing private sector investment, it was the Ryrie rules. As my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary knows, I have campaigned for some time for their removal, so I welcome that change—even though, at the moment, it does not go far enough.

I was delighted to read the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor at column 996 of Hansard:

> "I have asked my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to carry forward and develop our policy in this area, encouraging the private sector to bring forward proposals and to help us identify any obstacle which frustrates its success."—[Official Report, 12 November 1992; Vol. 213, c. 996.]

There is enormous scope for private sector investment, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will explore it to the full. Certainly in respect of joint ventures, where the risk can be reasonably shared, there is enormous scope for the Government and the private sector to work together on projects which will earn in future and which, in the end, will show a return not only for the private sector but for the public sector.

I was interested to hear what the Chancellor said about leasing, which also has great potential—not just leasing on an ordinary rental basis but leasing on hire purchase terms. Some years ago, it was suggsted that prisons, for example, could be built by the private sector and paid for by the Government on an annual basis over, say, 21 years. That project was prevented by the Ryrie rules, which demanded that the total cost was counted in the first year. I hope that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will explore such projects, in which I see enormous scope.

If the rules are further relaxed, the private sector can be brought in to provide the investment that we so badly need. I am talking not only about prisons. I hope that my hon. Friend will talk to the construction and engineering industries about projects to build hospitals and colleges, and possibly even to build or repair schools. Such projects could all be handled through the leasing system if it were properly organised. Ultimately, it is for the construction industry itself to produce proposals, but I hope that my hon. Friend will set the scene so that the industry understands its limits and remit and can produce proposals that the Government can accept.

The autumn statement is about hope and confidence, as the hon. Member for Peckham said, though listening to her speech I had the horrible suspicion that she was keen to avoid any hope or confidence for fear that it would destroy her case on behalf of her party. I hope that I am wrong in that suspicion, but I have to say that that was the tenor of her remarks and of those made yesterday by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). I have confidence and hope, and I believe that the autumn statement represents the beginning of a new dawn for the British economy.

6.57 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I agree with some of what the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) said, especially about the introduction of private capital into public sector services, although I take issue with his remarks about the reaction to the autumn statement.

When I went to my constituency last weekend, I found that a local creamery was about to close its cheese-making line, with the loss of 250 jobs, that the Inland Revenue was to contract, which may result in the loss of another 200 jobs in the area, and that, instead of spending money on training, the training and enterprise council was to build itself brand new posh offices for senior management, taking another 80 jobs away from my constituency. I suspect that most hon. Members will be able to identify with my constituency experience. If the hon. Gentleman's experience is different, all well and good, but I feel sure that his constituency is not typical.

We have recently heard the alarming news that 5,000 British Rail employees are to get the chop. That will mean dirtier stations, more vandalism, poorer maintenance and a smaller back-up crew in case of illness. Whatever the Government say about improving our infrastructure, they are doing the opposite. As usual, black is white.

Last week The Sun contained a good article entitled "The wisdom of lament". There were four photographs of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in various poses. The article compared what he said last year in his autumn statement on 6 November with what he said this year. The article says:

> "Last year he said:
> 'It has become increasingly clear that we are emerging from recession. Our exporters have performed remarkably well.' Fact: Since last November unemployment is up, while output and business confidence have slumped."

The Chancellor is also quoted as saying:

> "The monthly rate of increase in unemployment peaked in March and is likely to moderate further in coming months as recovery gets under way."

But the article says:

> "Fact: The monthly rise was in fact higher in July 1991 and January 1992 also beat the March 'peak'."

Last year the Chancellor said:

> "Consumer confidence has increased this year and is likely to go on rising as the fear of unemployment begins to abate."

But the fact is that unemployment rose by 380,000 in the past year to 2·85 million, or 10·1 per cent. of the work force.

Last year the Chancellor said:

> "We have followed a prudent and cautious monetary policy, whose credibility has been underscored by our commitment to the ERM."

But the article says:

> "Fact: The pound is in free fall after Lamont blew billions trying unsuccessfully to stay in the ERM."

That was billions of our money. Those are the facts of the matter. That is why Opposition Members do not believe all the talk about the recession being over and the sun rising in the sky.

We have been treated to a remarkable litany of rows between our Government and those of other member states of the European Community. It began with the social chapter. We had to negotiate an opt-out purely as a result of the dogma of the Conservative party. We did not endear ourselves to other member states.

A special provision for Britain on economic and monetary union had to be written into the Maastricht treaty. The Government have always denied that there is any need for harmonisation of excise duties, yet now they are slowly beginning to talk about the problems that will face us on 1 January when it will be legal for citizens of Britain to import cigarettes in quantity and wine in almost unlimited quantities.

Even Chancellor Kohl had to rebuke the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his interpretation of events leading up to black Wednesday. Today, the French have attacked us for what they say is the aggressiveness, incompetence and selfishness of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in his tendentious statements about how the GATT negotiations were conducted.

Whatever the truth of the matter—I do not say that all the criticisms of the Government are right—the rows, taken in their entirety, show that we are not popular in Europe. As the Chancellor had to take us out of the ERM, against all his policies, he has no credibility with our colleagues in Europe. I do not make any personal attack on him, but he got it wrong, and he should be given another job so that someone else with more credibility can take over the extremely important position of Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Unfortunately, integrity is not a trait of the Government. Members of the Government hang on to office. Black is often white. This afternoon, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury said that the 1·5 per cent. limit on public sector pay rises was not an incomes policy. I guarantee that, if he went out into the street and asked members of the public, they would say that it was an incomes policy. Yet the Government say that it is not, simply because they want to be seen to adhere to their political dogma. They know full well that they cannot, so they act differently but maintain that they are not doing so.

The Chief Secretary said that building up a good infrastructure was too great a task for the Government alone. That is a clear-cut example of black being white. The House will not need to be reminded that the Government went to extraordinary lengths in section 40 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 to ensure that they were prohibited from providing any money for the development of the fast link from London to Folkestone and the channel tunnel.

Yet the Chief Secretary told us this afternoon that infrastructure is too great a task for the Government alone, and they must bring in private investment. I do not believe the Government, and I have not believed them for many years. In this matter, they have not changed their ways one iota.

It is true that, after black Wednesday, certain facts dawned on the Government. They realised that one needs a sound economy to back up any political or monetary theory which one may wish to put into practice and on the basis of which one may wish to experiment with the British people.

The autumn statement contained some changes. Let us take British Rail as an example. Leasing will be allowed. There has been great talk about the Jubilee line, as if it will save the whole country from John O'Groats to Lands End. On Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday—every day—we are told in press releases that the Government will build the Jubilee line. Great—I have no objection whatever—but is not a policy or a philosophy: it is a tame excuse for the Government's inadequacy and unwillingness to do anything else.

Why can we not have a fast link between the capital and Heathrow? Why has there been delay and procrastination for years? Other modern capitals in western Europe, such as Frankfurt and Amsterdam, have a fast transport system between their main airport and the city. Yet the British Government refuse to act. Their policy is abject, and our condemnation must be total. Tonight we hear that 5,000 jobs are to go at British Rail. That will make our infrastructure even worse.

I conclude on a slightly more technical point, but one which demonstrates the inability of the Government to govern the country properly. On 3 November, British Rail issued a press release saying that it intended to sell its consultancy subsidiary, Transmark. It said:

> "Last year Transmark had a turnover of nearly £10m and an operating surplus of £1·1m. Its team of consultants worked on more than 200 projects in 30 countries. The company also carried out work for the BR businesses, for Passenger Transport Executives and for County Councils in the UK."

British Rail drew upon that subsidiary's expertise and resources. There might have been a book transaction for services rendered between one part of British Rail and another.

If that subsidiary is sold, British Rail will be forced to go out to private consultants elsewhere: or, if it has financial difficulties, it will not seek the expertise of consultants. It follows as day follows night and night follows day that the quality of decision-making and management at British Rail will deteriorate if Transmark is sold and its services are not available to British Rail as part of its inherent structure.

Yet the Government, in a triumph of political dogma over common sense, are forcing British Rail to put that small subsidiary on the market and obtain a few measly millions of pounds to reduce the borrowing requirement from perhaps £47 million to £49 million.

Mr. Radice: My hon. Friend means "billion".

Dr. Marek: Yes. But the Government will not save even £1 billion. They will save £0·1 billion or perhaps even £0·01 billion.

There is a long way to go, and the Government have not learnt much. They are on a learning curve and some things have been done, but they must answer the questions, "Why privatisation? Is it good for the country?" and decide whether there should be a policy change. Is privatisation absolutely necessary for British Rail, since not one expert has backed the Government's plans for the rail system and the Select Committee on Transport has asked the company to delay privatisation for some time?

I must finish, as I see flashing lights ahead of me. The Government have been listening for once. I commend them for that—they do not often do so—and I hope that they will take some notice of what I have said.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): I remind the House that between now and 9 o'clock speeches will be limited to 10 minutes.

7.10 pm

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): People who try to protect me from myself often tell me that I ought not to talk so much about interest rates and monetary policy. However, even people who are uninterested in the subject should notice the cost of the most recent—and most fortunate—occasion when we broke out of a great monetary mistake.

Before and around white Wednesday, the Government lost three times as much money as they hope to save in the public sector pay freeze. They borrowed $10 million in ecus, partly to encourage support for the exchange rate mechanism, and that cost will be increased by the 15 or 16 per cent. devaluation. Then they tried—on their own behalf—to support the pound, which is likely to cost between £1·5 billion and £2 billion, although they say that the amount can never be crystallised. If it could be today, it would be at about £1·5 billion. The Government will receive a large bill from the Bundesbank for the activities that it carried out on their behalf. Many people in the markets think that that bill will also be about £1·5 billion.

So I shall tell constituents who ask me why I do not ask more questions about the level of public pay or ask for more money for this or that industry that getting monetary policy wrong is expensive. It can be seen to be three times as expensive as the savings made at the expense of public sector employees.

During our recent history we have made two important monetary mistakes and we may make yet another vast mistake. The first mistake was when Lord Lawson shadowed the deutschmark with the pound between 1986 and 1988. Secondly, it has now become politically correct to remark that it was perhaps a mistake to have such a tight monetary policy between 1990 and white Wednesday. I always know when things become politically correct because my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) enunciates them and he said that it was clear that monetary policy was too tight in our recent history. My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) also gave a clear sign that monetary policy was too tight before we came out of the ERM.

The issue is not merely academic. It is not academic to someone who has a negative equity in their house, or to small business people who have been squeezed into the ground in the past two years. It is not academic to the banks—I understand that it is popular to attack them—because their credit base has been severely eroded as a result of the considerable fall in property values. Having lent so unwisely to big property companies, it is understandable that the banks have to preserve their position at the expense of small borrowers, who are being screwed into the ground. Those are not mere academic mistakes and they could be repeated.

I take up the argument put so well by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). By way of an aside, he said that he was in favour of fixed exchange rates but that monetary union would never come about. As I pointed out to him, the rougher but more eloquent members of the Tory Whips Office tell recalcitrant Conservative Members that that is why they should vote for Maastricht. They say, "Okay lad, if you say it's a complete mess-up, it will come apart at the seams so you might as well vote for it rather than ruin your career."

Voting for nonsense is an integral part of the political process, but Maastricht is nonsense which could do a great deal of damage before it breaks up. It is important to understand that, under the proposals for monetary union in the Maastricht treaty, it is at least arguable that we are under a legal obligation to return to the ERM and to stage 2 of monetary union. The fact that we could be forced by the European Court back into the ERM and thus into stage 2 after 1 January 1994 has been well argued. If that happens we shall be ruled by German monetary policy, as we were between 1990 and 1992. I am not attacking the Germans: they are perfectly entitled to run their economic policy in the manner that they regard as appropriate to their economy. The people who put us under German surveillance should be attacked and anyone who votes for the Maastricht treaty is likely to submit us to that.

I have a helpful suggestion. We are fortunate in having an extremely persistent and persuasive barrister, called Martin Howe—I do not know whether he is also learned —who also has the good fortune to be Lord Howe's nephew. He has written some interesting documents which comment on the Maastricht treaty. In one paper, which was recently published by the Centre for Policy Studies, he said that if we ratified the Maastricht treaty and did not go into stage 2 and join the ERM we might find that the court ordered us to do so. Mr. Howe also says of the opt-out, which has been such a source of pride to the Government:

> "The implications of the UK's Treaty obligations would appear to render its position, if opted out of Stage 3 monetary union, quite invidious. The UK would then be obliged by Treaty to seek to maintain a narrow band parity against the ECU block. However, the UK would be excluded from voting on the Governing Council which takes interest rate decisions for the ECU currency. The UK would be obliged to follow ECU interest rates in order to maintain its parity, but would have no say in setting them. This consideration renders the UK 'opt-out' from Stage 3 so unattractive that it must be queried whether its insertion in the Treaty can be regarded as anything more than an attempt at window dressing."

I assume that he does not want to be hit on the head with a frying pan by Lady Elspeth Howe at Christmas, and so I assume that he must have thought carefully before he said that.

We need an advisory ruling from the European Court or, at the least, an indication of the view of the Commission towards the whole subject. We do not want to vote for the Maastricht treaty and for monetary union and then find that we are under increasing pressure, to which our leaders may give in, to go back into the ERM and stages 2 and 3. We must make sure that we retain the right to run our monetary policy in the way that is appropriate to the British economy.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I suspect that we shall hear a great deal more of the subject raised by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) in the coming weeks and months. Indeed, it might be a good idea to apply the 10-minute speaking rule to all stages of the Maastricht Bill.

Our problem was not that we were in the ERM but that we were in it at an over-valued level. We said in October 1990 that the pound was at far too high a parity. Having settled down at about DM2·40 to the pound, with a 7 per cent. interest rate, it seems now to be at a reasonably sustainable level. People in other EC countries recognised way back that a realignment was inevitable, as I discovered when I discussed the matter at length in Brussels in February.

Developments have occurred in an uncomfortable manner, and the whole issue could have been better arranged. Even so, there appears now to be some basis of stability. Does the Treasury see the autumn statement as contributing towards greater convergence or divergence within the figures that are monitored when considering the likelihood of our re-entering the ERM? In that context, will the Minister comment on the Government's latest thinking about the likelihood of our re-entering the ERM, a subject that must have considerable significance for the economic policies that we should be following?

The objective of further pressure on inflation, towards which the Government have been working up to now, is no longer necessary and could be dangerous. It is possible for us to live with somewhat higher inflation—of perhaps 4, 4·5 or 5 per cent.—with an interest rate of 7 per cent. We now need more than anything a period of stability. We also need some strategy. We still face the danger of short-termism, which, particularly on the industrial scene, causes much of our difficulty.

I hope that the autumn statement will lead to greater confidence in industry and that that confidence will be based on stability and a willingness to accept greater risk-taking. That has been missing for a long time. We must ensure stability of demand, stability of interest rates, stability of currency and stability of inflation. I am not yet convinced that those have been achieved, although I have no doubt that the autumn statement reflects a basic change in Government policy.

It will be interesting to see how that change works through. After all, the requirements to which I referred are needed not simply for manufacturing industry but for housing. In particular, they are needed to encourage risk-taking in housing by private individuals. I also hope that the GATT round problems can be solved. It would be disastrous if the GATT position went wrong.

I am perturbed about the lack of reference to unemployment in the speeches of Conservative Members. Unemployment must remain an overwhelming worry. Hundreds of thousands of people in Britain with a contribution to make to the economy are denied the opportunity of contributing. It must be part of the Government's strategy to create employment so as to overcome unemployment, and I hope that when he replies to the debate the Minister will say how the Government expect their employment strategy to work.

There is also concern about what will be the policy of the Department of Trade and Industry towards regional investment. The figures coming from the autumn statement suggest that there will be a rundown in regional spending, and that may result in our not being able to take full advantage of the resources that may come from the European Community in terms of regional policy, with areas such as Wales and Scotland, and some of England's depressed areas, missing out.

The Chief Secretary said that the level of public expenditure as a proportion of GNP had dropped from 46 to 40 per cent. It is projected to increase to 45·5 per cent. Despite his intervention, I suggest that the Chief Secretary misled us by suggesting that the effects of privatisation had been totally taken out when formulating the figures.

I accept that money received from privatisation is not taken into account in the figures, but taxation revenue that used to come in to pay for, say, the water services in years gone by, certainly in the early 1980s, is now in the private sector lock, stock and barrel. The industry is no longer part of the public sector. People are now paying water taxes, as it were, and are thereby paying the water companies for what used to be public sector services but which are now private profit-making activities. That must be taken into account.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, if the water companies had not been able to go out to borrow money, financed by slightly increased charges, taxes would have had to be increased and they would have had to be paid by the very people of whom he is speaking?

Mr. Wigley: Perhaps, but that should be taken into account in the money that is being spent on public sector or quasi-public sector activities and be part of the overall services that in 1980 were in the public sector.

I wish to examine the figures applying to Wales, although most of the figures that we need to see the true picture are not available. I hope that the Welsh Office will be forthcoming in providing the figures in due course. I am disturbed by the fact that the figures for 1993-94 show a reduction for the Welsh Office of £50 million compared with the previous plans.

That is worrying, because the areas that come under the Welsh Office, from the point of view of its activities in Britain as a whole, show increases—agriculture by £590 million; trade and industry by £1,220 million; employment by £170 million; housing by £230 million. All those areas are analogous to Welsh Office responsibilities, but in Wales the total expenditure is to go down by £50 million. In Scotland, expenditure will go up by £70 million and in Northern Ireland by £50 million, but in Wales it will go down by £50 million. We must have an explanation for that, because the implications could be far-reaching.

The figures for Wales have been fudged by the changes in definition. Expenditure on our university and further education has come through to the Welsh Office, along with additional spending on care in the community and the effect of the coal closures, which no doubt are being taken into account. We need clarification from the Welsh Office and, once that has been provided and the figures are available, we must have a debate on the implications of the changed Government economic strategy for Wales.

I press the need for investment programmes in the long term. Those programmes must provide not only financial but social and environmental benefits. For example, I have pressed in the past for house insulation programmes. The implementation of those would save energy costs and, by that means, help disabled and elderly people, who are particularly dependent on energy and spend a large proportion of their budgets on it.

Proper energy-saving policies would also reduce the demand for energy, and that would have implications for the depletion of energy reserves and the avoidance of large-scale capital spending on unnecessary energy projects. That money could be redirected to hospitals and schools. The provision of energy is labour-intensive, so it could be geared to areas of high unemployment.

I also press for more capital expenditure on renewable energy sources, in particular on hydro, tide and wind power projects. The post-1998 position applying to the non-fossil fuel obligation must be clarified as soon as possible. We must spend more on recycling. Such capital expenditure would bring great revenue and environmental benefits in the longer term. We must spend more on public transport, including the electrification of the railway line to Holyhead and the south Wales line right through Pembrokeshire.

We have heard that £700 million will be devoted to the purchase of houses. I hope that the Government, and the Welsh Office in particular, will allow part of that money to be used to buy houses that have been used as second homes or holiday homes, many of which are for sale because people cannot afford to retain them. When the market is depressed, there is often a negative equity element in such homes. Those houses can then be used urgently to provide homes for those on waiting lists.

The cuts taking place in the legal aid scheme are the largest since its introduction 40 years ago. I am concerned not for the well-being of solicitors but because those proposals could hit at least 10 million people who are dependent on legal aid to get justice out of society. If they lose their ability to take their cases to the court and get justice, they will miss out. I hope that that is not the Government's intention.

7.30 pm

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): I welcome the recovery package in the autumn statement, because it includes a number of initiatives that my hon. Friends and I have been calling for for some time, particularly to stimulate the housing market and encourage exporters and investment. I welcome it also because it brought an interest rate cut.

Although the package should bring the confidence that we have been lacking for several months, it would have been better to have it five months sooner. That was not possible because we were locked into the exchange rate mechanism in a straitjacket. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) said, the Chancellor is now on record as saying that, because of those constraints, monetary policy was too tight during the summer. My hon. Friend spoke about the adverse effect that that had.

I remind those who criticise the Government that both the Labour and Liberal parties supported our membership of the ERM to the bitter end. Now that that debacle is over, I wish that the Government would remove uncertainty and make it clear that we shall not return to the ERM. I am afraid that they will not do so, because of the ratification of the Maastricht treaty.

I want the Treasury to reduce interest rates much less frequently but, when they do so, in bigger tranches. Interest rates have fallen by 3 points since white Wednesday. Because they have gone down by one point at a time, there has not been the fillip to confidence that there would have been had they been reduced by 3 points immediately we came out of the ERM, and had we taken the strain off the exchange rate in one go. Nigel Lawson made the same mistake when the economy was overheating. Instead of putting interest rates up by 2·5 per cent. to bring that overheating to a halt, he imposed death by a thousand cuts—two cuts of 0·5 per cent. and one of 1 per cent.

The subjects of public expenditure and Government debt have exercised my mind ever since I have been in the House. Indeed, I have spoken in every autumn statement debate since 1979. As a chartered accountant, my natural instinct is for sound money, control of public expenditure and a balanced budget. However, far too often I have had to chide my Front-Bench colleagues for planning to spend too much or for having spent over their budgets. That failure has resulted in frequent changes in Government spending.

Way back in 1981 or 1982, I said in a speech in the Chamber that the problem of controlling spending was that we had a system in which everybody demanded what they wanted and every spending Minister put in a bid, inevitably causing upward pressure on expenditure. I said that we should change that system and that the total should be fixed and then divided among spending Ministers, who should be told that that was all they would receive and must do their best with it. I am therefore delighted that the Government have now accepted that suggestion, which has long been forgotten, and have adopted a top-down formula, which will go a long way towards preventing slippage in expenditure plans, particularly in the second and third years of the cycle.

Owing to the inexorable rise in public spending and the sharp decline in revenues caused by the fact that the recession has been longer and much more severe than anticipated, our public finances are deteriorating significantly. This year, the public sector borrowing requirement will be £37 billlion, probably rising to £44 billion next year. These two years alone will increase interest costs by some £6 billion, which means £6 billion more taxation or £6 billion more expenditure. Naturally, it will cause upward pressure on interest rates and difficulty in funding, which might crowd out private investment.

I was delighted to hear the Chancellor's commitment to return to a balanced budget, and I strongly supported him when he said that it would be a tough spending round. With our public sector finances in such a state, it could not be tough enough for me this year. I welcome the limit on public sector pay. Indeed, a couple of weeks ago I suggested that there should be a freeze. However, when one looks at the figures in detail, one must ask how tough it has really been. Has the Chancellor really made the spending Ministers' pips squeak? Where is the evidence of blood on the floor? I regret to say that there is not much.

After allowing for inflation, the planning total will go up by almost 4 per cent. and even the new control total, which excludes the cost of recession, shows an increase in real spending of 2·3 per cent. Considering the fact that public sector wages will be fixed at 1·5 per cent., the real increase in programmes is considerably more than 2·3 per cent. That is hardly a tough spending round when our budget deficit is soaring.

If one looks at individual departmental budgets, one would think that those Departments with a high labour content—Education and Health—would show a reduction but, even with the pay freeze, the education budget will go up by 3·6 per cent. and the health budget by 1 per cent. in real terms. Clearly, the money that we are saving in public sector pay restraints will not reduce the budget deficit but will increase programmes. I just hope that the Minister can convince me that that increase will go into capital projects, but I do not believe it will.

Overseas development will go up by £100 million this year. When we have large balance of payments and budget deficits, is it sensible to spend £2 billion a year in that way? We are borrowing from foreigners whom we have to pay back with interest to give to foreigners. We could easily have cut £500 million off that budget, and I hope that the Chief Secretary will consider doing so next year. That would leave us plenty of money for famine aid, disaster aid and other such relief.

I am delighted that, at long last, the outdated Barnett formula for Scotland and Wales, which gave those countries an excessive share of our public expenditure, has been abolished as regards future increases. It was a difficult nettle to grasp, but I congratulate the Government on doing so. However, they have not dealt with the backlog of the past 20 years whereby in Scotland expenditure per head of population on education is 36 per cent. higher than in England, and on health is some 29 per cent. higher. It is higher than in the north of England, which is not the most prosperous area. Next year, the Chief Secretary should look at redressing the balance of the past 20 years. Expenditure in the other countries of the Union should be fixed until the expenditure per head in England has reached the same level.

I accept that the plans for years two and three are slightly tougher. I do not understand why we should start increasing expenditure again in 1995-96. The test will be whether the figures for the next two years will stick. Even if they do, I do not believe that we shall have done enough to reduce the PSBR. If we are to have a strong free market economy, we must bring spending down to below 40 per cent. and balance the budget.

The autumn statement takes us in the right direction but does not go far enough. If we are to deal with the serious problem of the budget deficit, we need another assault on spending next year; otherwise, we must face the unacceptable alternative of increasing taxation. If the Government are in any doubt about which course they should take, I remind them that the pubic elected us because they believed that we would not put up taxes and that the Opposition would. If my right hon. Friends need any help in deciding, I suggest that they look at what happened to George Bush.

The autumn statement sets out a coherent economic policy for recovery. Anyone who believes that it will not be a long haul is fooling himself. We face the serious problem of a double deficit: a budget deficit and a balance of trade deficit. This country is living beyond its means. This year is the first of what will have to be a number of years of financial stringency if we are to reduce those enormous deficits.

I hope that all Cabinet members have the stomach for the fight. Conservative Members will support them, because what is at stake is the creation of a strong and successful economy. If Cabinet members falter, they should realise that we are behind them and will not hesitate to give them a friendly push.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): The hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) welcomed the public sector pay restrictions and said that they could not be too tough for him. I wonder why it is that hon. Members with safe jobs and regular incomes are able to call for sacrifices from those who are low paid. Why is it that the call for belt tightening is always directed at the working people of Britain? It always seems that the people who are the greatest scrooges when it comes to public sector spending and pay for the low-paid workers become the biggest Santas when it comes to giving tax cuts to millionaire fat cats.

In as much as the autumn statement gives the Government a policy where for two months there was only a vacuum, it is to be welcomed, but the statement will not bring recovery or tackle the fundamental problems of British industry. I also suspect that it will not restore to British industry the long-term confidence that it needs. The Chancellor and the Prime Minister cannot bring confidence because no one can guarantee what their policy will be next week. Indeed, there have been so many U-turns, S-bends and policy gymnastics from the Chancellor that I wonder whether his parents, too, were circus acrobats.

The new economic strategy has been forced on a Government who have appeared out of control and very much at the mercy of events. Many of the more sensible U-turns in the autumn statement—for example, capital allowances—have been forced on a reluctant Chancellor. Now that the Chancellor has lost most of his totems—from the exchange rate mechanism to M3—we have to rely on his judgment to guide our economic policy.

The quality of the Chancellor's judgment will not, however, inspire confidence in British industry. After all, he is the Chancellor who said no to devaluation, no to leaving the ERM, no to a public sector borrowing requirement of more than £35 billion and no to necessary interest rate cuts in the months up to September, on the basis that we needed to stay in the ERM. The Chancellor's judgment is unsound. He is in partnership with a Prime Minister who was responsible, when he was Chancellor, for guiding the economy into the ERM at too high an exchange rate—also not a man of good judgment. Industry knows that the Government's judgment is unsound, which is why confidence will be slow to return and recovery will not come easily.

The unemployed know only too well that few of them will find jobs as a result of the autumn statement and that many more people will lose their jobs. The two years since the Prime Minister took office have seen unemployment rise by 71 per cent. or 1·2 million people. During that time, the number chasing each job vacancy has risen from 11 to 30. Can Ministers understand the dispiriting desperation of a family man looking for a job when he knows that he has to compete with 29 other people for that job? The number of young people out of work has risen by 323,000. The number of lost manufacturing jobs has risen by 541,000.

In my constituency of Warwickshire, North the jobless total has more than doubled, from 2,070 to 4,632. Some 587 miners at the Daw Mill pit were told just a few weeks ago that they were about to be made redundant. They have been saved until now only by the review in the coal industry.

The taxpayer pays an average of £9,000 per year—in extra benefits and tax lost—for every person out of work. It has cost my constituents £41·7 million—or more than £560 per voter—to maintain the Prime Minister's high unemployment policies.

After 14 years of Thatcherite policies, the long-term Government policy of individual tax cuts and deregulation of industry has resulted in escalating unemployment, a manufacturing trade deficit, cuts in public services, lack of confidence in the Government, and dismay among the British people such as I have never experienced before. There is a desperation among the people that the Government are incapable of finding a solution and are just plain unlucky. People feel that the Government do not know what they are doing and are a bunch of amateurs.

The Government's stated overall long-term aim of further tax cuts and deregulation will only make matters worse, as the price of doing so will be the Government's failure to provide the necessary infrastructure. In pursuit of their ideological objectives, the Government have succeeded only in damaging the economy.

The basic Tory philosophy of government is at fault. For too long public policy has been solely geared to the myth that Britain's future hangs on helping the mini-entrepreneur, the little man in the garden shed. The aim has been to reduce individual taxation and force self-reliance. However, as Robert Reich, economic adviser to President-elect Clinton, has said, in the age of new technology a nation's economic progress depends not so much on individual entrepreneurs as on collective entrepreneurial talent. It does not depend on little men in garden sheds, but on research scientists in well-funded universities developing advanced conductors, on systems analysts devising new software for international companies and on designers applying new technology to consumer requirements.

For the collective entrepreneur, taxation and tax cuts are peripheral, and a policy of tax cuts is peripheral to the future prosperity of Britain. Good education, a highly skilled work force and an effective infrastructure are essential, as is a Government working in partnership with British industry.

Japan, Germany, Austria, Taiwan and other countries with successful economies long ago learnt the lesson that the collective entrepreneur, not the mythical individual, is the steam engine of change in the economy. They have recognised the interdependence of the components of the modern economy, including that of Government spending. They know that tax cuts are inefficient if they restrict increased spending on universities, transport and infrastructure.

It is clear that this hands-off Government have produced not more prosperity, but market instability and long-term decline. The ideology of less government has produced less public transport and less education, and less of many of the factors necessary to an economy. The free market has its place, but the hidden hand of the market is not enough. The failure of Thatcherism over the past decade has made that clear. As other economies have found, the hidden hand needs a helping hand—not an interfering hand, but a guiding hand. Governments, through intervention and a clear sense of direction, can be that guiding hand.

The Government have spent 14 years saying that they cannot do much except create a low inflation, low tax regime. Clearly, that policy has failed and we need a Government who are prepared to intervene and work in partnership with industry to end the abdication of responsibility which persisted through all those years of Thatcherism. The Chancellor and other Ministers have spent so long saying that they cannot intervene that now no one has any confidence that they could do so even if they wanted to.

The one nostrum that the Government now believe in is that low inflation is, of itself, a prerequisite to recovery. That is one of the few totems left to them after the death of M3 and M1, shadowing the deutschmark and the ERM. However, the intellectual gap in the argument is that our industrial base has been undermined in pursuit of that objective. Industry is now in fundamental trouble. The idea that low inflation of itself will somehow lead to recovery does not make sense. We need a motivating factor and a full-blown Keynesian recovery package if we are to get genuine recovery. Low inflation can only be part of that package. It is the overall package of policies that will bring recovery, and it is the inadequacies of the rest of the package in the autumn statement that will ensure that recovery is still a long time away.

This autumn statement is bad for my constituents, bad for the unemployed and bad for the industry in my constituency. It is also bad for the Conservatives in my constituency. Warwickshire is a Conservative-capped county council and a Conservative council; I would expect the Government to defend it, but I heard this week——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Bellingham.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): The hon. Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. O'Brien) made an eloquent speech, but he wrote it before he heard the autumn statement. He has asked for a package for recovery, including some intervention, and that is exactly what the statement contained. The response to it from builders and people connected with construction and housing in my constituency has been one of pleasure. Small businesses are very pleased; medium-sized businesses are extremely pleased, because they know that there will be a definite boost for construction and housing. They are particularly pleased that certain crucial infrastructure projects will be preserved and boosted. They are also pleased about the preservation of some of the defence procurement projects.

A number of extremely important road schemes are in the pipeline for my constituency. One of them is dualling on the A47, just west of King's Lynn. We hope that it will come on stream soon. There is also the crucial flyover at the Hardwick roundabout outside King's Lynn—a notorious bottleneck. The flyover should be built in the near future. This is why my constituents and many other people in west Norfolk are extremely pleased that the Government are getting their act together.

I also welcome the 1 per cent. cut in the base rate. I only hope that it will be passed on to customers by the banks. The banks have begun to learn that base rate reductions must be passed on. I received a letter the other day from a small business man in my constituency. He was complaining not about the base rate that he was being charged but about the arrangement fees—£1,500 for a new overdraft, a staggering sum. I hope that the Financial Secretary will tell the banks to be more sympathetic to small businesses.

Recovery is all about confidence, which until now has proved elusive. It will start to return, however. Many people have been worried about their jobs and worried because they have detected that the Government have been locked into a system of limitations that has reduced their room for manoeuvre. I believe that the autumn statement can present a new way forward which will help to generate confidence, particularly among the crucial people who will start moving house or improving their homes and spending more in the shops. That in turn will have a knock-on effect throughout the economy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) and the hon. Members for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and for Warwickshire, North all mentioned the ERM, although the hon. Member for Caernarfon was a good deal kinder about it than was my hon. Friend. I am extremely pleased that we are not tied into what is going on in the German economy any more. I think of it this way: we went into the rottweiler's kennel and we did not get just scratched and nipped—we had a limb bitten off and we came out of the kennel severely mauled. I hope to goodness that we will not go back into that kennel for a long time to come.

I welcome the fact that the Prime Minister said the other day that it is not our policy to go back into the ERM tomorrow or the next day but that we will take stock of the situation and take a decision some time in the future. He has also made it clear that the decision will not be influenced or constricted by the fact that we ratify the Maastricht treaty. The Prime Minister is an honourable man, and I prefer his view on the subject to that of my old friend——

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Bellingham: No, because of the 10-minute rule. I was referring to my old friend the former Chancellor's nephew. I spent some years of my life in a part of the Fens renowned for its spires and gargoyles, and I had many a happy evening with the former Chancellor's nephew. He is sound on many points and a first-class barrister—I practised with him for a while—but on this issue his interpretation is over-sentimental and unduly restrictive. I prefer the Prime Minister's view to that of Martin Howe.

I welcome this package, but I am still worried about home owners in my constituency and about those trapped in mortgage equity debt. A home owner told me the other day that he had bought a house for a considerable amount of money and then seen its value drop. His fiancée had left him, he had lost his bonuses at work and he was in dire straits. He had thrown the keys back at the building society thinking that everything would be all right, but he came to my surgery having received a letter from the building society asking what was to happen to the £20,000 that my constituent owed it—he did not understand that the money was his liability.

I ask the Financial Secretary to consider carefully what it would cost to give tax relief to constituents like mine who have lost huge sums of money when their houses have been repossessed. May we have the figure? I urge my hon. Friend also to consider a scheme to encourage mortgage insurance. Many people do not insure their mortgages, but they could. It would make life a lot easier for budding home owners if they knew that they could get tax relief under a mortgage insurance scheme.

Many hon. Members have been selling Britain short, but I do not think that we should. We must try to build up confidence, which is what my constituents need. Small business men who are determined to get going and medium-sized businesses that want to invest—they all need confidence. We have heard a great deal about the decline of British manufacturing, but the figures do not add up to the gloomy totals that the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) proposed. Twenty-seven of the top 50 European companies are British. The other day The Economist carried out a survey which discovered that 13 of the top 30 medium to small-sized firms in the world were British. Statistics from America the other day, published in "Week's 5th Global 1,000" showed that 110 of those 1,000 companies were British. It is time we stopped selling ourselves short.

I do not often listen to Radio 4 in the morning, but the other day I tuned in to "Thought for the Day" at the absurdly early hour of 7.50 am. A bishop was speaking and he quoted a remark that I think came from the Bible. He was not asking to avoid trouble, turmoil and tumour; all he was asking for was to overcome, not to be overcome. I hope that the Chancellor will overcome. This autumn statement is a step in the right direction, and I shall back it wholeheartedly.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): It strikes me that much of the reaction to the autumn statement derived not so much from what was in it but from what was not in it. Many of the plaudits that it earned were a result of briefings emanating from Ministers and their officials before the statement, suggesting that there would be tax increases, cuts in benefits, measures to send people who rely on disability support reeling, and so on. They also suggested that, against the wishes of those who have campaigned for so long to increase overseas aid from this country, it would be cut.

After all these behind-the-scenes briefings, reported in the newspapers, we were meant to cheer—Conservative Members did—because these terrible things had not come to pass. It was not a particularly original political trick, nor did it produce an autumn statement that will start to turn around our economic problems. That is the other respect in which the statement was remarkable not for what it contained but for what it did not.

Much of the autumn statement is welcome. We argued for many of its measures a considerable time ago. Those who have lost their job in the meantime might well be looking for an apology from Ministers, not just a U-turn. However, its measures go nowhere near far enough to turn the economy round. The job losses and business failures that followed the previous Budget and autumn statement when Ministers made similar predictions prove the point. The action being taken now is too little, too late, a phrase which has been used a lot about the autumn statement.

That the action is too late can hardly be denied by Conservative Members, let alone by the Chancellor and the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. It is self-evidently too late to be taking investment measures—which were advocated so many months ago—for all those people who have lost their jobs and for all those businesses that have gone bankrupt in the meantime, waiting for precisely the kind of U-turn that the Government now claim to have made.

But the action is too little as well. A few weeks ago my hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) and I led a delegation of people from Cornwall to Downing street. It was not party political. It was composed not of party politicians but of representatives of a cross-section of businesses, jobs and political viewpoints in Cornwall. It included an architect, a farmer, a postmaster, a builder, an hotelier and others who once worked but are now unemployed, who once ran businesses but are now unemployed.

Those involved in the delegation were united, not by a political ideology but by a belief in their county and in their ability to put things right for themselves if only they are given a fair wind and the necessary support from the Government. Each member of the delegation wrote to the Prime Minister and the Chancellor outlining the problems in their own sector of the economy. That presentation, "Cornwall's charter for jobs", concluded:

> "We now ask this Government to recognise the difficulties we are facing. Most are not of our own making. They have been created by national policies that have treated Cornwall, its people and communities harshly. Our wish is for the Government to behave as any business and employer must: we ask it to become pro-active. We ask it to remove the obstacles to Cornwall's success. We ask it to provide its people with the tools it needs to create jobs for its jobless, and a future for its children."

Those sentiments would be echoed by people throughout Britain, particularly in the rural, so-called peripheral, areas that have been particularly disadvantaged by so many of the Government's policies.

Along with millions of people in Britain, people in my part of the world are suffering from the devastation of the economy that the recession has wrought. In Cornwall, male unemployment is approaching 20 per cent. Business failures in the south-west are up 40 per cent. this year on last year. High street banks are closing and tourism, fishing and farming are suffering terribly, too.

I do not ask merely for expenditure; there are other things that the Government can do. One is to tackle the problems within the banks, not merely the lack of interest rate cuts, but, even more significantly, the way in which the banks treat so many small businesses. I campaigned at the general election, as did my colleagues, for a banking charter. The Government have done nothing to make the banks establish a proper contractual relationship with small businesses that would ensure that when the banks sting their fingers abroad and with big businesses, it is not local small business men who are asked to pay the price.

The cut in interest rates is welcome, but promises of a new economic strategy raised hopes of much more. In many areas such as my own, businesses need a reduction in the uniform business rate, a fully funded development agency and assisted area status to aid investment. Instead, in the longest recession since the 1930s, the Government are proposing to review assisted area status, reducing the area of the country that is eligible for help from 35 per cent. to around 30 per cent. That will cut off the blood supply, the lifeline, for so many more businesses.

More generous investment in the infrastructure would have put our builders, plumbers and electricians back to work on projects for the future. To suggest that future capital receipts will be released for that is a some time, one time, maybe never, kind of promise. Cornwall has money from its capital sales, particularly the council house sales. We have people who are now jobless with the skills to build homes. We have one of the worst problems of homelessness in the country. All we need is the political will from the Government to release even a proportion of those funds for the investment that is needed, but that political will is still not there.

Our businesses face further threats of continued high water rates, higher electricity charges because of the distance from generating stations, the possible termination of inter-city rail services at Plymouth and Exeter. Time and again, we have to put up with Conservative Members in the south-west and elsewhere complaining about the effects of the very policies for which they voted in the first place. They have shed crocodile tears about electricity price increases, when they voted for the system that has led to those increases; about water rate increases, when they voted for the system that led to those increases; and about rate increases, when they voted for the system that created those increases. Worst of all, they have had meetings with Prime Ministers and Ministers when they hold in their own hands, through their votes, the chance to change Government policy and to defeat Government policy merely by coming together and exercising the power that they have—crocodile tears indeed.

To those Ministers and other Conservative Members who may be worried about taking such a wide turn away from past policies I say that half a Keynesian is better than no Keynesian, but full-hearted policies are what our county and country need.

The British public are forgiving of people who make U-turns. They know that if one drives down the wrong road, the most sensible action is to turn round at the earliest moment and find the right route. They ask only two things—first, an apology for the mistake and, secondly, that there is some indication that, having turned round, the Government know where they are going. For a start, it is better to go back up the road one has come down than to drive off into the fields or woodlands on either side where one is only likely to become bogged down and in a worse situation than when one started.

One area that is being attacked because the Government believe that they must tackle spending in some small way is legal aid. The legal aid changes are designed to save money for the Government, but they will make no great difference to our general economic problems or fortunes. However, they will make an enormous difference to those individuals who can no longer obtain the legal help that they would once have had.

Millions who were once eligible for legal aid have already been taken out of it. The Government say that legal aid costs have increased, but that is because of the complexity of cases, not because more people are eligible for it; fewer are eligible for it.

The Government should be tackling the legal system, not the legal aid. They should be seeking to create simpler routes by which people can obtain the genuine redress to which they should be entitled in our modern society. The Government are tackling the symptom, not the cause, and millions of people, many of them those hit hardest by the recession, will suffer as a result.

Those changes could have been included in the autumn statement. They could have been made. I fear that the Government have realised their mistakes and pulled into the field only to find themselves bogged down. I fear that unemployment will continue to increase this autumn——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Douglas French.

8.8 pm

Mr. Douglas French (Gloucester): I have no hesitation in welcoming the autumn statement as a reasonable formula to provide a short-term way out of our current economic problems, but I have the greatest difficulty in being persuaded that it was the logical next step in a long-term policy strategy. We must consider carefully what our long-term aim for the economy is.

Like other hon. Members, I remain extremely uneasy about the planned level of public borrowing. In the 1991 autumn statement, borrowing was set at £19 billion; by the time of the 1992 Budget, it was at £28 billion. We are now told that it will be £37 billion in 1992-93—about twice the original estimate. The forecast for 1993-94 puts it at £44 billion. I cannot help fearing that it is heading inexorably towards £50 billion, which would be 8 per cent. of gross domestic product and would take us back into IMF territory. We must avoid that at all costs.

Some forecasts—even those of reputable City analysts—now suggest that the figure may reach £65 billion in 1994. Goldman Sachs, using a 1·5 per cent. growth projection, puts it at £80 billion. If such figures are really being contemplated, they are much too high. As we know, a burden of debt must be serviced. In the past 10 years we have made impressive progress in reducing debt servicing; we do not want to make a deliberate decision to return to it now.

My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury said that we had managed to cut the debt-servicing burden by £10 billion. It seems, however, that we are now set on moving in the opposite direction. We had a hard lesson to learn, and I am disturbed by the possibility that we shall have to learn it again.

Many hon. Members have mentioned the 1981 Budget. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) and with the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) that the situation in 1981 was different from the present situation, but there is some common ground. The public borrowing level was then far too high. I well remember the difficulty experienced by the then Chancellor—not his nephew—in trying to decide how to handle the deficit. He had to make the difficult decision to raise taxes—not a welcome decision, given that the 1979 general election had been fought on a platform which preached the virtues of a low-tax economy, but a decision that had to be made to reduce public borrowing. Within a short time, things were moving reliably in the right direction.

Although I am a great advocate of low-tax regimes, if I had to choose between borrowing moving out of control and increasing taxation, I would reluctantly choose to increase taxation. One of the worst courses is to pretend that tax increases may not be necessary, before eventually finding that they have to be imposed after all.

What worries me particularly about the present circumstances is the speculation now rife in the press that taxes will have to rise in the next Budget. Such speculation is most unhelpful and pulls us in exactly the opposite direction from the one in which we should be moving. If the aim is to create confidence, the chances of creating it will be undermined when people start worrying about facing tax increases before long. The prospect of an increase in indirect taxation—in VAT, for example—may conceivably have a beneficial effect in bringing forward a purchase, but it will result in a vacuum later. Threats of income tax increases cause people to worry about their household budgets and are likely to prevent the renewed confidence that the rest of the strategy seeks to promote.

It is very unwise to let it be known that taxes are likely to rise or, indeed, to set out a package in which the arithmetic points inescapably in that direction. If tax increases are eventually to be necessary, the longer they are delayed the more damage there will be. More debts are incurred, more uncertainty is caused, confidence is undermined, and the economy remains further away from where we want it to be.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) mentioned the change in Budget timetables. I think that mini-Budgets should be avoided wherever possible. They do not help the continuity of policy, they do not increase confidence, and they do not provide the reliable framework that businesses need. If judgments are sound at the time when a Budget is made, they ought to remain in place for at least a year.

I welcome the bringing together of the income and expenditure statements, but I view with dismay the prospect of another Budget in March and a further one in December. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) referred to two Budgets in a year; in fact, there will be three in a little over a year. That is unnecessary, and almost certain to undermine confidence.

I am also not in favour of time-limited incentives. I thought that we had learnt our lesson when Lord Lawson ended the system of dual mortgages on single properties, and in doing so caused no end of trouble. We then tested the market with a temporary moratorium on stamp duty, which had absolutely no effect. Now we have a 40 per cent. capital investment allowance, which is apparently to end towards the end of 1993. Trying to concertina people into making decisions in such a limited time is likely to undermine the quality of the decisions made. I firmly oppose time-limited incentives as they merely distort markets and increase speculation.

I accept that some of the measures in the autumn statement were necessary because the recession was so deep, but I suspect that some would not have been necessary if interest rates had come down earlier. Here I entirely agree with what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend). The policy of dribbling the rate down one percentage point at a time strikes me as being open to considerable doubt. The single percentage point was invariably heavily trailed, discounted in advance and implemented in a diffident fashion, with an obvious fear of the exchange rate consequences.

At no time did it look as though that would be the end of the matter. It always looked as though there might be a further instalment, and the reduction was frequently accompanied by a warning that in the event of adverse consequences the rate would have to rise again. It never looked to business men as though rates were set to remain at a particular level for any length of time; the old enemy, uncertainty, was a constant factor.

It is hardly surprising that in such circumstances a business man should defer decision making, and hardly surprising that it should be concluded that low interest rates alone were not enough to get his business moving and to move us out of recession. It was clear that a further raft of measures would be needed.

From the point of view of the international capital markets, it is clear that capital movements are influenced by comparative interest rates, but interest rate levels are only one indicator of the health of the economy.

Capital, after all, seeks out currencies in anticipation of potential movement in their capital value. That is bound to be a reflection of international judgment of the underlying health of the economy involved. Capital likes to move into a currency when, on a balance of probabilities, it is likely to be at its lowest and ready to move up; strong currencies are those that markets expect to move up, and weak ones are those that they expect to move down.

That perception could better have been created if at some stage in the downward spiral a reduction of two percentage points had been made. It could have been done without adverse exchange rate consequences. I very much regret that the Chancellor did not choose to make that reduction. Had he done so at the right time, I believe that much of this package of measures would have been unnecessary.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Last Thursday Conservative Members waved their Order Papers after the Chancellor's speech. The same Members waved their Order Papers after the Budget statement earlier this year. The difference is that in his Budget statement the Chancellor forecast that growth would be 1 per cent. this year, but in his autumn statement he forecast a 1 per cent. reduction in growth. In his Budget statement, the Chancellor forecast a current account deficit of £6·5 billion, but he is now talking about £12 billion. In his Budget statement, the public sector borrowing requirement was to be £28 billion, but it is now forecast to be £37 billion. With that forecasting record, one has very real doubts about whether the forecast for next year of 1 per cent. growth is right. If it is not, the economy will continue to decline.

It is not just the figures that have changed. The words have changed, too. Last spring, unemployment was still "the price worth paying" for reducing inflation. Now the accent appears to be on growth, jobs and dealing with unemployment. Even borrowing is no longer a dirty word on the Conservative Benches. It hardly could be, given the amount of Government borrowing.

When one looks at the details of the autumn statement, which we have had the opportunity to do since last Thursday, one finds that they contain no coherent or effective plan of action to deal with the depths of the recession and depression that the Government have created. There is no effective plan of action to create the jobs that people require.

We find that there is no new money in the autumn statement, but if we are to create jobs we shall have to spend money. The Government are constrained by their own problems with the public sector borrowing requirement—a self-inflicted problem. The Opposition support a major expansion of investment in the infrastructure. We make no apology for saying that the public sector has to be the motor for recovery. Of course we want investment in the private sector, but, at a time when confidence in the private sector is so low, the public sector has to be the catalyst to get the private sector going. That may demand, in the short term, a further increase in the public sector borrowing requirement, but if it is properly managed it will generate the revenues that are necessary to pay for it in the medium term.

Before the Government accuse the Opposition of wanting to increase the PSBR, I should like them to explain how they calculated the autumn statement figures relating to public expenditure and the PSBR. Why do the Government believe that they are the right figures to deal with our present economic problems? The figures for public expenditure have all the signs of having been decided before the Government made their U-turn, to some extent, and of the Government not having altered them in the light of the circumstances that we now face.

As well as there being no overall increase in expenditure, most of the schemes put forward are not new, either. The Government have highlighted certain key projects, but in the last few months there were suggestions that they would be cut. The Government now claim a victory and a boost for recovery, simply by maintaining schemes that were already in the programme.

The Government admitted to some cuts last Thursday —cuts in legal aid and invalidity benefit, which I deplore. Since last Thursday, however, we have found hidden cuts that were not declared. There is to be a cut in the urban programme, which represents the expenditure of money that is targeted directly on the most deprived areas of the country. The Government have placed particular emphasis during the past few years on spending to help to generate economic activity in the most deprived communities—in particular, expenditure on infrastructure projects. The end of the urban programme will affect people who have the least change of getting jobs and will increase unemployment where it is already at the highest level. That cut ought to have been explained openly to the House. It is a disgrace that it was not.

When we hear about local government expenditure proposals next week, we shall no doubt find that there are further hidden cuts. Every local authority—not just Labour local authorities—is talking about the jobs it will have to shed next year and the people it will have to get rid of. It is yet another aspect of the autumn statement that will lead to increased unemployment, not to more jobs.

On the question of public sector pay, we were told this afternoon that this is simply a matter of employers dealing with the employment costs of their workers. That is an incredibly narrow view for the Government to adopt. They are an employer, but they are also supposed to be managing the economy. If we take spending power away —for that is what reduced wages mean—from the poorest in our community, we shall reduce demand in the economy. That, in turn, will create job losses in other sectors of the economy. This is yet another measure which will have a depressing effect on jobs in general.

Where the Government have acted, they have acted insufficiently. Why did they not let local authorities spend the housing capital receipts that they now hold? My hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) well illustrated the problems that local authorities will face in trying to sell assets in a depressed market. Why force local authorities to do that when they already hold sufficient resources? New homes are needed. Houses and schools need to be repaired. Expenditure on housing repairs could be put into effect very quickly. The need is there; the money is there; and the private sector has the capacity to carry out the work. Why will the Government not put the money held by local authorities to work in the private sector and therefore meet the needs of local communities? It would be a simple matter for the Government to do that.

It is worse than that, however. The Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to adjusting the capital control totals of local authorities. I have an awful feeling that when local authorities are told how much their capital allocations are to be, they will find that part of the miserable amount of extra money that they received through the capital receipts initiative will be clawed back by means of a reduction in the credit that they are allowed to have in the next financial year. The effect of the measure, therefore, will be even less than the Government pretend.

I welcome the reduction in interest rates and the relaxation of the ridiculous rule that prevented private sector capital expenditure in the public sector. That rule is nonsense. We ought to get rid of it. However, the Government will not face up to the fact that the lack of confidence in the private sector means that these measures will have little impact. We can reduce the cost of money to as low a level as we want, but if the private sector does not feel that the risk of investment is worth taking, investment will not occur. That is the problem that the Government face. The reduction of interest rates by 3 per cent. in the United States has not stimulated much investment in the private sector. That is why a major public sector thrust is needed.

The autumn statement contains no reference to European-wide initiatives. We have the presidency of the European Community for six months. What a wasted presidency it has been. The Government refused to put European economic recovery on the agenda. By doing so, they have failed not only the British people but all the people in the European Community. They should be ashamed of themselves.

There is a medium-term problem for the housing market. We have heard a great deal about the immediate crisis that faces the housing market. In real terms, house prices are falling. Money is relatively cheap. People are using their savings to reduce indebtedness. Building societies are not lending much money. No new houses are therefore being built. If confidence returns in two or three years' time, it will amount to a potentially lethal mixture that will lead to another massive increase in house prices.

The autumn statement will do nothing to get the economy moving. There is no coherent strategy, beyond the immediate survival of the Government. There is no new money. There are few genuinely new schemes. There are hidden cuts and missed opportunities. There is no European perspective. The package is long on rhetoric but short on any real strategy to assist the unemployed and to create the climate for economic success. It is a missed opportunity for the Government, but, more importantly, it is a missed opportunity for the country.

8.29 pm

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): I should like to give a wholehearted welcome to the autumn statement. I should have liked to give it a fulsome welcome, but, with the constraints of the 10-minute rule, suffice it to say that with the lowest interest rates and tax rates in Europe we now have the basis to rebuild consumer confidence, which is crucial. We hear so much talk about investment as though it were virtuous and consumption was somehow naughty. The only reason for investment is that there is already consumer demand, which the investment is aimed at meeting. I have no hesitation in emphasising the elements of the Budget that will encourage consumers to spend more.

The figure for lending in October was £5·1 billion—the highest since November 1990. That is one small sign that perhaps consumers are feeling more optimistic about the future. It was an encouraging indicator.

I know that many people in the Treasury still have at the back of their minds the terrible warning of 1972, when we left the previous attempt at a fixed exchange-rate link with the continent of Europe. It was the basis on which the Barber boom subsequently took off. We allowed borrowing to rise out of control and eventually suffered the inflationary consequences.

Although I welcome the cuts in interest rates, I hope that the Chancellor and the Financial Secretary will be able to make it absolutely clear that, if there is any prospect of inflation rising above the target range, and particularly if the growth of M0 and M4 are rising towards the top of their target range, they will have no hesitation in increasing interest rates. The only thing that would be worse than the recession of the past two years is if it were to be followed by the same mistakes as happened during the Barber boom.

I want to dwell briefly on one exciting element of the autumn statement—the proposals on private finance for public projects. I welcome the special responsibility that the Financial Secretary is being given to carry that initiative forward. I am sure that he well knows that there is a history of Treasury teasing on the subject.

We have been told before that liberalisation of the rules on private finance for public projects is to take place. Ingenious schemes are proposed by merchant banks and construction companies for building and operating prisons, roads or hospitals, but the Treasury says, "This is all very interesting and is a good idea, but, of course, it would be cheaper if it were carried out in the public sector, with borrowing at gilt rates"—and, sadly, we decide not to carry them forward. According to that argument, we would nationalise ICI to reduce the cost of borrowing to finance investment. I hope that this time around the changes are serious.

I have noted in particular how the stress has been put on private sector road building and toll roads. Of course I welcome interesting innovations, but the significant feature of the roads example is that there is a private stream of revenue that the firm operating the road can enjoy. The significant challenge or test for the Treasury is whether it is prepared to bring private finance into schemes where services will be sold to the public sector.

I am rather troubled to see that such schemes are described by the Treasury in the autumn statement as leasing arrangements. I regard leasing as financial engineering to get around a public expenditure constraint. I would not support leasing fiddles where something impossible under normal public expenditure disciplines was allowed simply because of a change in the financial structure. That is not what we are looking for. We are looking for Treasury recognition that, if the private sector is free to build and operate a private prison or hospital and sell its services on a long-term contract to the public sector, that arrangement may release new ideas for better management, use of labour and maintenance of capital and achieve improvements that, sadly, have not been realised in the public sector.

Hitherto, Departments have not registered the fact that, if the public sector is to run a hospital in a different way—possibly by saving staff or using them differently —it wants to be able to design the hospital so that the physical plan matches the way in which it wishes to use staff. In other words, if I may slip into the jargon of economics, it wants the physical capital for which it is responsible to embody working arrangements that it can achieve but which have not proved possible in the public sector.

The ultimate argument in favour of private finance and private management for such projects is that they are better managed and more efficient and innovative than if they remain in the public sector. They are far from being leasing fiddles. I therefore very much hope that the Financial Secretary will be able to assure us of the energy with which he will approach his exciting remit.

The Chief Secretary should be congratulated on the way in which he has conducted the Treasury's negotiations. He has at last been able to get the message home that, if public expenditure negotiations are to be responsible, they should be on priorities within an agreed total rather than attempt to overturn financial discipline. I welcome the new public expenditure control arrangements, which seem to have achieved that conspicuous success.

I welcome the statement's focus on the medium term. Too often, public expenditure negotiations have degenerated into horse trading about next year, with years two and three in the survey largely being ignored; they are left for next year's negotiations. This time, we had serious negotiations on years two and three, and the Treasury achieved new figures for growth in years two and three of 0·75 per cent. real growth and 1 per cent. real growth. That is a conspicuous achievement, on which I congratulate the Chief Secretary.

Having achieved those marvels of public expenditure control under the new Cabinet Committee arrangements, I am surprised that the Treasury is further considering more institutional change next year. My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) spoke about that. I am worried about the change in the timetable for economic decision-taking, so that expenditure and tax announcements are brought together in the autumn.

There are three reasons for my concern. First, I hope that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will accept that I am truly concerned about the work load that is falling on him and other Treasury Ministers. I am sure that being a Treasury Minister is a tough job. Between September and December, there will be the major international conferences, the tough public expenditure negotiations in the Committee that is now chaired by the Chancellor, with the Chief Secretary actively involved; and at the same time the Chancellor and the Financial Secretary will be considering Budget starters and trying to reach tax decisions. That is a heavy burden.

My second concern is an operational one. Many public sector bodies such as local authorities and district health authorities need to know as soon as possible what their budget will be for the following year. After the autumn statement, Departments spend weeks working out what the overall expenditure figures mean for local authorities, health authorities, the remaining nationalised industries and other public bodies. Next year's autumn statement may be a month later than this one, so there will be less time for public bodies to take important operational decisions.

Finally, there is a risk of the Treasury, having established control over public expenditure this year, sacrificing control over taxes next year. If public expenditure negotiations and tax negotiations are being conducted together, spending Departments may be tempted to press for tax increases to finance higher departmental expenditure or at the very least to undermine the Treasury's wider fiscal position. I therefore hope that Treasury Ministers will be able to make it clear that the new arrangements to be implemented next year will avoid those pitfalls.

8.39 pm

Mr. Roger Godsiff (Birmingham, Small Heath): When the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his statement last week, there were scenes of wild delight on the Government Benches and much shouting in parts of the Tory press that the economic recovery had begun.

There may have been wild delight on the Tory Benches, but if Ministers had cared to visit Birmingham and the rest of the west midlands—the real world outside this place—they would have found no wild delight. On the contrary, they would have found disbelief, anger, bitterness and real frustration among the people of Birmingham and the rest of the west midlands who have no jobs or spending power, and who have seen their industries destroyed in the past 13 years. Those people were saying, "Why have the Government missed their opportunity yet again? Why have we gone through all that, and seen the Government make so many U-turns? Why, even in the autumn statement, which takes half a step forwards towards a Keynesian policy, are the Government still not prepared to admit the mistakes that they have made in the past and do something to regenerate British industry?"

Let us see how good the autumn statement was, and how much it will do for British industry. What will it do for GDP and growth? The forecast is for 1 per cent. growth in 1993—and that will follow a drop this year. What will the statement do about unemployment? Unemployment now stands at 2·8 million, but everyone in the House knows that the unemployment figures are massaged and that 2·8 million is not the true figure. Everyone knows that the true figure is nearer 4 million. What will the statement do for those 2·8 million-plus people who are unemployed? By 6 o'clock this evening, anyone who cared to look at the ticker tapes of news coming in could see that in one day a further 10,000 jobs had disappeared. What did last Thursday's statement do for those people?

Will investment increase? On the contrary, it is still falling. Will the balance of payments improve? Will we suddenly see a great narrowing of the gap? That will not happen. We have only to examine the Government's own forecast.

What about public borrowing? In 1988 the Prime Minister said that public borrowing of £25 billion was unacceptable. He asked why we should pass on to the future the burden of the follies of the present. The figure was £25 billion then; it is £37 billion for 1992; and it will be £44 billion for 1993. Why should we pass on to future generations the burden of the follies of the present Conservative Government? That is what the Prime Minister asked in 1988.

The Chancellor told us that from now on we could spend some of our capital receipts, that the money received for every public asset—every council house, school playing field or piece of land—which local authorities sell between now and the end of 1993 could be used for new capital projects. Local authorities throughout the country are saying, "Thank you very much, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer. That is very kind of you. That will really solve our problems. Here we are in the middle of a massive recession, property prices have collapsed, and for everything that we can sell—if there is anything that we have not already been forced to sell, and if we get a decent price for it—we shall be able to use the money for new capital projects."

What about the £5 billion which is locked away and which the Chancellor will not allow local authorities to spend? Why will he not allow them to spend that money to build desperately needed houses, to improve roads which are falling apart, to improve the infrastructure of the inner cities, to improve people's quality of life and make some amends for the follies of the past 13 years? "No," says the Chancellor, "You cannot spend that money—you must use it for debt repayment."

Outside in the real world, the Chancellor's statement was greeted as a nonentity. In my constituency, 26 per cent. of the population is unemployed. There was one small cheer for the Chancellor's statement: my constituents were grateful that their social security benefits would not be cut. Most of them are on social security. They do not have jobs—their jobs have disappeared—and they were thankful that the Tory Government who destroyed their jobs did not intend to victimise them again by cutting their social security.

That small debt of gratitude was more than outweighed by a feeling of despair and anger. In Birmingham, four out of 10 people have been unemployed for longer than a year. That may be of little concern to certain hon. Members, and to others it may be an irrelevance, but it means a lot to the people who have experienced it.

I do not know how many Conservative Members have ever joined a dole queue and waited to sign on. I am sure that some of them have, but I think that most of them have not. I wonder if many of them have even gone to see what the process is like. As somebody who experienced unemployment, although for a relatively short time, I can tell them that it is not a pleasant experience, and certainly not an experience that we should want to pass on to others. The present Administration seem impervious to that.

The west midlands used to manufacture cars and export them all over the world; it was the hub of the British car industry. The motor manufacturers were pleased that the car tax was abolished last week. Hon. Members may think that throughout Birmingham people will stampede down to the car showrooms with £10,000, £12,000, £15,000 or £20,000 in their pockets wanting to buy brand new cars and save £400 in car tax. I must enlighten them: anyone with that sort of money who wanted to buy a new car could go into any showroom in any part of the country and name his price. Hon. Members will know that my point is valid because many of them will have done just that. One can get any discount now, because the car salesmen are so desperate to unload their cars. The idea that £400 will suddenly provide a massive boost to the British car industry amounts to sleight of hand.

The abolition of the car tax is welcome—anything is welcome when one is lying flat on one's back—but it will not regenerate the British car industry. Why not? Why did I begin by saying that most people greeted the Chancellor's autumn statement as a nonentity? I said that because our problem is one of confidence. The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) referred to confidence. Yes, there is a crisis of confidence. That is what it is all about. People do not have confidence in the Government or in their policies. They are not going to dash out and spend money——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order.

8.49 pm

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): I congratulate the Chancellor on the autumn statement. Despite what the hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Godsiff) might think, I am from the real world. I will indulge the House, if I may, in the sense that, for the past 10 years, I was in manufacturing, and may be a small microcosm of the British economy. I have always maintained that it is manufacturing that made this country great and put the great into Great Britain.

My own firm—I am indulging myself and I declare an interest—moved to Cornwall. We set up a factory in the constituency of my hon. and athletic Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe). We established the factory there because it is a pleasant area. More importantly, there are a willing and able work force. There were investment grants from the Government and there were economic wage rates in that part of the United Kingdom.

Opposition Members continue to espouse the minimum working wage. The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has identified the minimum working wage as the single most important factor which is creating unemployment in France. A minimum working wage in Cornwall for our factory would have driven us out of Cornwall, would have driven us out of business and, more importantly, would have put those Cornish workers out of work. That cannot be to the advantage of anyone who wants manufacturing to get on.

I fully appreciate that it is the Opposition's job to oppose, but there are times when opposition is destructive. There are times when it is a good thing to blow the nation's trumpet. Manufacturing output went up from around 1982 onwards by 3·7 per cent. each year on average in the 1980s. That is something to blow our trumpets about. Export manufacturing went up by 6 per cent. each year on average. That is a triumph of which we can feel proud.

Opposition Members say that there has been a decline since 1990. I can see that thought in their faces. There has been a decline, but there has been a greater decline in Germany. The Opposition must recognise that fact.

I spoke to a group of industrialists from the midlands yesterday. They said that it is the lack of confidence that is creating the economic difficulty in which we find ourselves given that we now have the lowest rates of interest in Europe. It is a fear of losing jobs which is preventing people from spending money in the shops. I was pleased to see in last night's Evening Standard that spending has gone up: it is 1 per cent. higher than it was in the summer and 1·5 per cent. better than it was a year ago. At last we are beginning to see some improvement in spending patterns.

Simply talking down the economy does nothing to encourage confidence in this country. We now have everything to be confident about. We are now top, whereas we used to be bottom, of the G7 productivity league. We have one of the lowest interest rates in Europe. We have the lowest taxation in Europe, as other hon. Members have said.

What is the bottom line of all this? The bottom line is that we are seeing huge amounts of inward investment into the United Kingdom. Some 40 per cent. of investment from outside the European Community comes into the United Kingdom, with the remaining 60 per cent. being scattered among the other 11 E.C. countries. In Mid-Staffordshire, that means more jobs for people in places such as Lichfield, who will work in the Toyota plant which is not far down the road.

I will focus on two specific aspects of the autumn statement which I welcome. The Chancellor will know that I have nagged him consistently since I became a Member of Parliament for the introduction of greater capital allowances. As I am in business, I have always felt that unilateralism was nonsense. I believe that, just as it was crazy in the 1980s that, when the Russian SS20 missiles moved across the Urals and across eastern Europe to the borders of the then West Germany, the Opposition said that they wanted us unilaterally to disarm and that the Russians would disarm if they were asked nicely to do so, so it is equally nonsense for us unilaterally not to have capital allowances when our competitor countries have capital allowances.

We have increased capital allowances for plant and machinery from 25 per cent. to 40 per cent., and we have increased the capital allowances for industrial and agricultural buildings to 20 per cent. I welcome that increase, although I believe that it is overdue. France, Germany, Japan and the United States have accelerated capital allowances, and capital allowances work there because they improve investment.

The second aspect that I will focus on is interest rates. Although I have not been known for my great enthusiasm for Maastricht, I have never felt that being a member of the exchange rate mechanism per se was necessarily a bad thing. As a business man, I welcomed our entry into the ERM. After all, although we were manufacturing broadcasting equipment in Cornwall, we imported equipment from countries within the EC. We had to quote for large contracts abroad in foreign currencies. To get our costings right, we either had to buy currency forward or we had to build in a sufficient amount to allow for fluctuations in the exchange rate. I welcomed our entry into the ERM.

Being in the ERM is worth while only if the mechanism works. It is far better not to be in a mechanism than to be in a mechanism that is flawed. I am pleased that the Prime Minister has said that we shall not re-enter the ERM until our currencies converge. I go further and agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) who said that our currencies should all be synchronous. Only in that way will the ERM work. In the unlikely event of such a situation arising, then, and only then, would I welcome our going back into the ERM, because it would then help British businesses. Sadly, I can see no circumstances in the next few years in which any currencies in Europe will be synchronous.

I must say that some of the comments from the Opposition have been quite incredible. We have heard the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) make three impossible statements together. Constantly he said: keep us in the ERM; keep us in the ERM and do not devalue; and keep us in the ERM, do not devalue, but cut interest rates by half the current rate. That is absolutely impossible. It is like saying let us free-wheel on a bicycle uphill: an impossibility; economic innumeracy.

[Mr. Michael Fabricant]

Our interest rates, thank God, have fallen. I would have preferred bolder reductions, but the rate is 7 per cent., the lowest in Europe. In Germany and France the rates are running at 9 per cent., in Spain at 13 per cent. and in Italy at 15 per cent.

I join the chorus of hon. Members on both sides of the House asking my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary to keep up the pressure on the banks. It is one thing to reduce interest rates but, if the banks do not follow suit, there is very little point to this. Moreover, overdraft facilities that can be withdrawn at almost no notice are not helpful to small businesses. There must be some permanence.

The Opposition say that the Government should be an engine for growth. Nothing is that simple. If Governments could make engines for growth, all economies would be growing. They are not. It is not that simple, and when they talk—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

8.59 pm

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): I welcome the opportunity to make a short contribution—very much shorter than I had intended—to this debate.

I very much welcome the autumn statement, and I agree that it is a turning point in our economic affairs. Listening to speeches on the economy, and particularly those from the Opposition Benches, I sometimes think that we tend to dwell on the present and forget the lessons of the past.

One of the obvious lessons of the past is that there is no such thing as sustained economic growth, except for a few short years. History tells us that after every upturn there is a downturn, and after every downturn, mercifully, there is an upturn. As surely as the sun will rise tomorrow, our economy will improve.

I believe that successive Governments have deluded the people into thinking that Governments are all-powerful. History ought to tell us that Governments are certainly not all-powerful. There is very little that Governments can do to affect the economic cycle. Let us look very briefly at a few years of our own economic history.

The years 1965 to 1980 were an unmitigated disaster, and it is not unworthy of note that for 11 out of those 15 years the Labour party was governing this country. Those years convinced me that Socialist economics do not work. Inflation averaged 15 per cent.; income tax rose to 83 per cent. and, if one had what the Labour party called "unearned income"—that is, income from one's life savings—one was taxed 98 per cent. There were strikes almost every day, and that more than anything killed the car industry in the west midlands, to which hon. Members have referred. Average earnings rose by a miserable £2 per week, nurses' pay was cut in real terms and so badly did the Opposition mismanage the economy that they could not even pay pensioners their Christmas bonus.

I searched the speeches of Opposition Front-Bench Members in vain to find any new ideas. What I did find was constant carping and criticism, with the benefit of hindsight, but no constructive attempt to explain to the British people how they would get the country out of its problems—except, of course, their traditional three policies: spend, spend, spend.

In 1981-89, before the world economy was blown off course by the present economic hurricane, which is affecting every developed country, our economy grew by more than 3 per cent. per year—faster than that of France or Germany—and average incomes were up 35 per cent. More families in this country today have a car, a television set, a telephone and central heating than at any other time in our history.

We have cut inflation dramatically and, despite the recession, nine out of 10 of our citizens in the work force have jobs. We have 1·8 million more jobs than we had in 1983, and a higher proportion of the population are in work than any other country in the European Community except Denmark. Strikes are now a thing of the past, and this was so even before unemployment began to rise. Even though repossessions are very bad, fewer than 1 per cent. of owner-occupied houses are being repossessed.

What caused the world recession? I have asked economists this question many times, and the consensus seems to be the bubble economy in Japan and the enormous deficit in the United States. [Interruption.] Opposition Members laugh. Of course they do. It is very inconvenient for them; it would suit their purpose very much better if they could fix the blame for the world recession entirely on the British Government., but I am afraid it will not wash.

We made a serious mistake in trying to shadow the deutschmark and entering the exchange rate mechanism. As a result, we have had interest rates much too high for much too long. Interest rates at a very high level have been the most important factor in the present economic downturn in this country. Joining the ERM was doomed to failure from the beginning, and had I been in the House at the relevant time I should not have voted to do so. The Labour party and the Liberal Democrats must share responsibility for that mistake, because they were as enthusiastic to go into the ERM and stay in it as we were —if not more so.

The venture was doomed to failure from the start, because all the money in all the central banks of the world together is equal to the sum traded on the foreign exchanges almost every working day. Had King Canute been alive today, he could have told us that the ERM was doomed to failure from the beginning. The fact that he was a Dane is not without interest.

The value of a nation's currency is simply an indication of what millions of economic decision makers around the world think of its economy. Trying to fiddle the exchange rate and put it into an artificial straitjacket is like fiddling with the oil pressure gauge on one's motor car instead of attending to the engine. Fortunately, we are now at liberty to attend to our own engine.

I am glad that interest rates have come down, although I would point out to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor that, although low interest rates are good for borrowers, we must also consider the interests of lenders. The retired people in my constituency who invest their money in the economy through the banks and building societies deserve a decent return on it.

The speeches by Labour and Liberal Democrat Members have been wholly negative—not a single constructive idea has been produced. The Opposition have an investment in gloom and doom because no one votes for them when things are going well—indeed, if the last general election is any guide, no one votes for them even when things are not going particularly well. We do not need lectures from them about the problems; we see the distress caused by repossessions and redundancies in our own constituencies. I have set up an employment action group in my constituency to tackle this matter locally.

Opposition Members have had a lot of fun referring to predictions made in the past, and, with the benefit of hindsight, crowing that those predictions were wrong. I felt like reminding all of them that they predicted that they would win the election! They have had a bit of fun with the Chancellor's reference to the green shoots of recovery, but I would rather hear the Chancellor trying to talk our economy up than to listen to the dismal Jimmies and moaning Minnies on the Opposition Benches constantly trying to talk it down.

Labour Members vaguely talk about "industrial strategy", "investment strategy" and "training strategy". Of course such strategies are desirable, but we know that there is no crock of gold at the end of the rainbow from which their schemes can be paid for. They talk about Government intervention. Intervention in De Lorean cars and Meriden motorcycles? Was that not a wonderful success?

The economic problems of today have nothing to do with lack of investment, lack of training or lack of housing, and everything to do with lack of demand. The Government have maintained their capital spending programme, and that is a good thing. In my area, £3 million is being pumped into the economy by the excellent Conservative-controlled West Sussex county council. However, any Government can only do so much, and this Government have done it. Thereafter, it is up to industry and the consumer. At £37 billion, borrowing is much too high. What do the Opposition say? "Put it up still higher."

Let me conclude with a comment about what is generally described as Thatcherism. We think that the best thing to do is to give the British people freedom. Unfortunately, freedom to make good decisions also means freedom to make bad decisions. The British people, like any other people in the world, will not work for medals or for public approval. They will work for money so that they can support themselves and their families. Some may think that that is selfish. I remind the House that, in the 18th century, John Wesley, that famous preacher, said to his congregation:

"Gain as much as you can,
Save as much as you can,
Give as much as you can."

That is equally relevant to the conditions prevailing today.

9.9 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): After seeing the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen) being passed a note to tell him to sit down, I understand how the Government overshot their public spending targets.

I sense a certain nervousness on the Government Back Benches. I do not want to appear unsympathetic. I certainly do not want anyone to think that I am not taking a constructive approach. I understand that Conservative Back Benchers are nervous about the ERM fiasco. Indeed, several of them mentioned it. Some of them are nervous about devaluation, although I noticed that some of them welcomed it.

Of course, there is nervousness among Conservative Members about the loss of the previous Heritage Secretary, about the pit closure programme, about the Bank of Credit and Commerce International and about the confidence vote a few weeks ago when only the Liberals kept the Government in office. Now they are bound to be nervous about the sale of armaments to Saddam Hussein.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) was right to point out that, as the Chancellor sat down at the end of his statement last Thursday, Conservative Back-Bench Members cheered with sheer nervous relief that they would not have to defend large-scale state benefit cuts as well as deal with every other problem that currently confronts them.

In order to put these matters into context, and in an effort to keep the whole House cheerful, perhaps I can take a leaf from the lead given by my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and remind Conservative Members of some of the points which they enthusiastically cheered in last year's autumn statement.

On 6 November 1991 the Chancellor boasted that he had "reduced the ratio of public spending to national income by over 5 percentage points."

A year later, half of that reduction has disappeared. I see that the cheers have disappeared, too. The Chancellor told the House that his careful and responsible approach had enabled the Government to reduce public borrowing. Yet we have moved from a repayment of 2 per cent. of GDP to a borrowing requirement of 7·5 per cent.

At Budget time the Red Book forecast for the PSBR was £28 billion or 4·5 per cent. of GDP for 1992-93. Now we have a PSBR of £37 billion or 6·25 per cent. of GDP. How can there have been such a large move in such a short period? Is not the answer that the first forecast was given before the general election and the actualité has come home to roost substantially after the general election?

As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Godsiff) astutely pointed out, future generations will now have to fund the tax cuts of which the Chancellor was so proud only a few months ago. Back in November 1991 the Chancellor told the House that it remained the Government's policy

"to balance the budget over the economic cycle."

I suspect that that is now completely unsustainable and that we can expect a massive PSBR until the end of this Parliament. Borrowing currently accounts for 14 per cent. of Government spending. However, the greatest difference —several Conservative Members referred to it—is with the Chancellor's comments on inflation last year. He told the House:

"we have followed a prudent and cautious monetary policy whose credibility has been underscored by our firm commitment to the ERM. The success that we have achieved on inflation has allowed us to cut interest rates without jeopardising sterling's position in the ERM."

Conservative Members have rejoiced during this debate that we are no longer in the ERM. Let me remind them that at the general election the Conservative party manifesto pledged that the policy was not merely some peripheral matter but a centrepiece of the Government's economic policy. Conservative Members cheered the Chancellor when he said:

"it has become increasingly clear that we are emerging from recession."—[Official Report, 6 November 1991; Vol. 198, c. 449.]

The end of the recession has been announced even more times than the Jubilee line extension.

As for the famous green shoots of economic recovery, there is only one possible remaining explanation. It is that the Chancellor has pulled them up and is smoking them. He sees the recovery. No one else sees the recovery. He believes that others see the recovery, too. He comes to the House of Commons and tells us about the recovery. Truly, the Chancellor is now the Keynesian that my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) made him out to be. The Chancellor is truly a child of the 1960s. Last year, the Chancellor went on to say that he expected personal consumption to rise by 2·5 per cent. in 1992, to provide the impetus for recovery. As we know from the autumn statement, personal consumption is down by 0·25 per cent. for 1992.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms. Anderson) told us that questions of trust and confidence were at the heart of this debate. Can I, my hon. Friend or any hon. Member have confidence in a Chief Secretary whose idea of reading around the debate on the autumn statement is to study thoroughly, "Thomas the Tank Engine"? I see that the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), who chairs the Conservative Back-Bench committee on such matters, thinks that that is a laudable way to prepare for a debate, and that may tell us how Conservative Members prepare for them—[HON. MEMBERS: "It was his copy."]—or, as my hon. Friends suggest, perhaps he lent his copy.

Last year the Chancellor told us that growth would gather pace throughout the year and that output would increase by 2·75 per cent. between the second half of 1991 and that of 1992. The outturn was a fall of 1 per cent. All those predictions look ridiculous with hindsight, but remember that they were the foundation of the Government's general election manifesto. I remind the House that Philip Goldenberg of S. J. Berwen said of that document:

> "If it had been a Companies Act prospectus it would have landed the entire Cabinet in gaol."

Well, who knows what the future holds?

I do not want to appear destructive, carping or all of the other things that Conservative Members like to pretend that they believe of the Opposition Front Bench. Some manifesto pledges were redeemed, or at least addressed, in the statement: enhanced first-year capital allowances; conceding the principle that local authority capital receipts can be released; allowing the involvement of private sector capital in public sector projects; allowing British Rail to lease new rolling stock; and a reassessment of the Treasury contribution to the national insurance fund. Those go some way towards implementing manifesto pledges and it is nicely in keeping with the consistency of the Government's present economic policy, and the way in which the Conservative party deals with such matters, that the pledges that the Chancellor has been so kind as to bring before the House were from the Labour party manifesto.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) said that the need was for immediate measures to get people back to work, and I agree. It is doubtful whether local authorities will ever be able to do much with the release of future capital receipts because people do not anticipate very much——

Mr. Stephen: We have heard much about capital receipts from council house sales. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that if he, his hon. Friends and the Liberal Democrats had had their way, there would have been no receipts because there would have been no sales?

Mr. Brown: I do not accept that. We would not need to release them, in any event, because recessionary forces would not be at work in the economy. They are solely due to the Government's unique approach to worldwide crises.

My hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) said in a debate on Monday that the 20,000 house target set for the Housing Corporation was unlikely to be achieved. He felt that one tenth of that figure was optimistic and that may turn out to be the case.

I want to deal with other aspects of the statement: the pay freeze in the public sector; the rise in council house rents, which will be twice the rate of inflation for 1993, at 9 per cent., and 5 per cent. ahead of inflation for the following year; the cut in the Department of Employment's budget; and the legal aid reduction. Free legal aid will now be available only to people who earn the magnificent sum of £2,213 per year or less—the income support level. There has been no discussion of easier or cheaper routes to justice, just a primitive budget cut.

Mr. Brazier rose——

Mr. Brown: I shall give way shortly to the hon. Gentleman, who is one of the intellectual dynamos of the Conservative party.

All those changes fall hardest on the least well off, and those changes are paralleled by changes that have been made to the tax burden in the past 10 years. In 1978-79, a family earning 75 per cent. of average earnings paid 30·9 per cent. of those earnings in tax. By 1990-91, that burden had increased to 34·7 per cent. In other words, regressive changes in public spending are paralleled by a regressive tax system. The burden falls hardest on those least able to afford it, which is manifestly unfair, manifestly unjust, and manifestly Government policy.

Mr. Brazier: The hon. Gentleman referred to what he described as straightforward cuts in the legal aid budget, which has doubled in four years and is projected to go on increasing at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum for the next two years. What does the hon. Gentleman mean by cuts?

Mr. Brown: I mean, when I refer to cuts, a reduction in the annual income level at which people are eligible for support. I am talking about real cuts, because less money will be spent on legal aid next year than is being spent on it this year.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Norman Lamont): Wrong.

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman says I am wrong. According to the Law Society, about 7 million people will fall out of eligibility—[Interruption.] I speak for the 7 million and the Government can speak for themselves when the Minister replies to the debate.

The pegging of the wages of 3 million people, and the attempt to peg the wages of a further 2 million, was described by the Financial Secretary as an evolution of policy. It is like describing our leaving the ERM as an evolution of the policy of not leaving it; or calling devaluing the currency an evolution of the policy of not devaluing it; or the Conservatives adopting some of the policies of the Labour party and describing that as an evolution of the policy of rejecting and denouncing those policies outright at election time. So much for evolution. I am not sure what Darwin would have made of it. Nor am I sure what the public sector workers will make of it.

The Chancellor began his autumn statement by pointing to the world recession and claiming it as an excuse. Yet it is clear that this country's recession contains some peculiarly British features. For example, from the second quarter of 1990, Britain's GDP shrank by 4·5 per cent; Germany's rose by 5·25 per cent.; France's rose by 3·33 per cent.; Italy's rose by over 3 per cent.; and the Netherlands' rose by 4·8 per cent. Despite the worldwide recession, our European partners' economies have grown while ours has shrunk dramatically.

The Government obviously feel that some response is needed. Prodded by the Prime Minister, the Chancellor has had to go for growth—just a little growth, and he is not too sure about that—and it is clear that the Chancellor is not entirely comfortable about it all. He claims in his autumn statement that the Government have no intention of engineering a short-lived boom, but then he introduces a supplementary package of time-limited fiscal measures which he clearly hopes will engineer a boom and which, by the fact that they are time-limited, are bound to have a short-lived impact.

Indeed, the Chancellor has managed to do a U-turn from the beginning to the end of his autumn statement, and that must be a record. He has announced a package of measures putting about £4 billion into the economy over the next three years. In the context of an economy of over £600 billion, that is not much, about 0·2 per cent. per annum. In other words, the real impact of the measures will be minimal.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. O'Brien) said, there is a difference between spending money as part of a coherent strategy for recovery and drifting into short-term expediencies for want of a better plan. Perhaps the Government are really saying, "Because everything else has been tried, let's give this a go."

The attempt to give the British economy a short-term fix to get it out of recession comes nowhere near dealing with the scale of the problem. The Chancellor is trying to buy his way out of the slump without spending money. The long-term issues remain unaddressed. The largest single factor inhibiting recovery is the fear of unemployment, yet the Government are still content to let unemployment rise steadily. They even admit that they expect recovery next year to be limp, and forecast growth of only 1 per cent. The measures that they are taking will simply not get us far.

Only by 1995 will output have recovered to what its level was when the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) became Prime Minister. Today, as this debate began, we heard a further 10,000 job losses announced. The Government may anticipate a recovery in the construction sector, but it is clear that Blue Circle, which supplies the cement, has carried out its own survey on those matters and, with obvious pain and regret, has followed an earlier 700-person redundancy round by making another 500 workers redundant. So much for industry's optimism about recovery in the industrial sector.

In his Guildhall speech, the Chancellor said that he was dressed like a magician, but was only the Chancellor. As with everything else that he has said on economic matters, the reality is the other way round. He comes before us dressed like a Chancellor, but he is only a magician. The children's conjurer has tricks and illusions that convince those in the audience behind him who desperately want to be convinced. He must appear to hit spending targets of £1·2 billion off next year's EC funds. Have Conservative Members been told about that yet? I wonder how it will turn out. Unallocated reserves of £8 billion become unallocated reserves of £4 billion.

The trick for which we are all waiting—the most anticipated conjuring trick of all—is entitled "the disappearing Chancellor". I expect that you, Madam Deputy Speaker, will know how it works. You hear a voice off stage saying, in a south London accent, "Goodbye Norman". There is a flash of light and suddenly the Home Secretary is standing at the Treasury Dispatch Box. It is wholly in keeping with the efficiency and effectiveness of how things are run in the Conservative party that that trick, which would doubtless have been popular in the country, has not come off. We have been treated to smoke screens, illusions, mists and reality obscured, yet behind all the stagecraft, deceits and deceptions, the Chancellor remains. As the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) so astutely pointed out, he is stil there. It is the only real trick that the Chancellor has pulled off. Some people unkindly suggest that it is the only trick that really mattered to him. If that trick is unworthy of applause, it commands a certain amount of admiration, if only for its breathtaking audacity.

Conservative Members usually ask, "What should we do?" I had five years doing that, so I anticipated it. Before the elections, they stand up and beg Opposition spokesmen to give them advice. Afterwards, they plunder our manifesto and try to take that which they think would be helpful, but during election campaigns they denounce us thoroughly for the programme that we put forward.

The Chancellor shouts, probably with even more relief than Conservative Back Benchers when they cheered him desperately on his autumn statement, "And we win". I am not sure that the country is happy about that, but I am certain that the Chancellor would not want to put the matter to the test tomorrow. I am sure that the Prime Minister would not wish to do so, because for the first time in recent history the Labour party's standing is some 51 per cent. in the opinion polls. If the Chancellor feels that confident, perhaps he would like to test the matter—before Christmas would suit me fine.

May I try to help the Government and be as constructive as Conservative Members urged me to be at the start of my contribution to this debate. What would we do about the problem? We would start by acknowledging that the recession is continuing, that unemployment and bankruptcies will continue to rise, and that investment has fallen substantially and will fall again in 1992. Even in the present slump, we would acknowledge the worsening balance of payments position.

The solution is for the Government to develop a policy for manufacturing industry that contains something other than neglect of the regions, or what the Chancellor chooses to call the territories or not the south.

We could acknowledge that the economic outlook is so bad and the autumn statement such an inadequate response to the slump that we now need an emergency employment programme to reduce unemployment and remove the fear of unemployment—the largest single factor affecting consumer confidence. We need additional investment measures to boost the construction industry and business in general. We need a long-term industrial training policy. As all those items are contained in the Opposition amendment. We can make a start tonight by voting for it and giving the Government the guidance that they so clearly need.

9.30 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): During the debate Labour Members have tried to argue that the Government do not have a strategy, but they have ended up by proving that it is Labour Members who do not have a strategy. Even the customary bonhomie of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) failed to obscure the fact that Labour Members are at sixes and sevens with themselves about how policy should evolve. That is in sharp contrast to the autumn statement presented to the House last week by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which set out a clear path for the years ahead and described the mechanisms by which we propose to deliver our objectives.

My right hon. Friend started by making it clear that we intend to safeguard our key achievement of the past two years: delivering a low inflation rate. My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) stressed the importance of that in his speech. As he recognised, the success results not from a fetish about numbers, but from a clear analysis of the reasons for the long-term under-performance of the British economy.

A necessary precondition for stable growth—if we do not know now, we never shall—is the establishment of sound control of inflation. There is no trade-off between inflation and growth. We have often sought a trade-off in the past, but failed to find it. Every time we have experienced inflation in this country, we find that, far from creating jobs at the margin, it destroys growth, jobs and hope. That is why we will not jeopardise our achievement of the past two years in reducing the inflation rate to an acceptable level.

Our success in reducing the inflation rate is what creates the opportunity for growth to which my right hon. Friend drew attention in his autumn statement. It is because we recognise that it is success against inflation which creates the opportunity for growth that my right hon. and hon. Friends have been to the fore in celebrating and advertising that achievement.

Producer price inflation is now 2·5 per cent. lower than at any time since 1968. Average earnings rose by 5¾ per cent. in the past 12 months—a lower rate of growth than for a quarter of a century. Those successes have resulted in a retail price inflation figure of 3·6 per cent. We have succeeded in controlling inflation—a goal for which successive British Governments have striven, but only few have achieved. We achieved that control in the 1980s, but regrettably lost it for a short period.

The Labour party has never achieved that objective, and the House would do well to remember that during the last Labour Government the average inflation rate imposed on the British people was 15·5 per cent.—for five years. We shall not return to such statistics while the present Government are in office.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): The hon. Gentleman has been lecturing the House about what high inflation costs in high unemployment, but will he explain why unemployment is now at a record level? Given that inflation is now low, why have a further 10,000 jobs gone out the window today? Why are we heading for a real unemployment rate of 4 million next year?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman reminds the House of the cost of losing control of inflation at the end of the 1980s. Inflation is what destroys jobs. That is why we are determined not to make again the mistake that we have too often made in the past.

Having delivered effective control of inflation and sound money, it is now possible for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to plan for the long term. The plans published last week reflect the choices that he can make because of the success that we have had in controlling inflation over the past two years.

This success explains why we can deliver our manifesto commitment to spend £6·3 billion on the roads programme over the next three years. That continues the Government's record of road building and represents a real terms increase in roads expenditure of 95 per cent. since 1979—a sharp contrast with the record of our predecessors, who cut the roads programme by 33 per cent.

We shall continue our record investment programme in British Rail—up 23 per cent. since 1979. We shall continue to invest in London Regional Transport. My hon. Friends should remember that next year we plan an investment programme in London Regional Transport that is up by 350 per cent. on the figure that we inherited in 1979. For the next three years we shall be investing in London Regional Transport more each quarter than Labour did each year. That is what we mean when we say that we are safeguarding the long-term future in the plans that we published last week.

The health programme used to take up more of my time than it does now, but it is still close to my heart. Health investment has risen by 65 per cent. in real terms since 1979, compared with a cut imposed on health investment by Labour of 24 per cent.

We do not believe that investment is measured only in terms of bricks and mortar or physical capital. The most important investment in this as in any other country is in the skills and inventiveness of our people. That is an investment that we continue to safeguard and expand in the autumn statement. More young people go into higher education in Britain today than at any time in our history: 12 per cent. of the relevant age group went into higher education in 1979—now 25 per cent. do. We are committed to increasing that to 33 per cent. before the end of the decade.

It is not just a matter of universities. Within those figures we plan for a 25 per cent. increase in the number of students going into further education. We also plan for a higher proportion of school leavers to join youth training, with a total training spend two-and-a-half times higher in real terms today than in 1979.

These are real investments, through public expenditure programmes in bricks and mortar and in human capital, to set this country on the path of growth again.

My right hon. and hon. Friends will be the first to recognise that the key investment, if we are to create economic success in the years ahead, is in the business sector—in the private sector, which creates the wealth and the jobs and which improves the living standards of all who live in Britain. Once again, the story of the 1980s was a story of success on which we are well placed to build. Between 1974 and 1979, business investment grew by 10 per cent. Since then, it has grown by nearly 40 per cent., measuring it in today's figures, which are below the peak because of the recessionary pressures with which we are only too familiar.

During the 1980s, not only was there more investment, but the returns that British business earned on that investment were significantly better than they had been in earlier years. Throughout the 1980s, returns from British business were nearly half as high again as they had been at the end of the 1970s, and by the end of the 1980s those returns were 62 per cent. higher than they had been during the 1970s. The Government are determined to continue to create, as they did during the 1980s, a favourable climate for business investment here in Britain because we recognise that that is the only means by which we shall succeed in delivering our objectives of growth, jobs and improving living standards.

The Opposition continue to run Britain down, but if we look at what is happening out there in the economy which they affect to describe we find that business is voting with its feet and investing in Britain. During the 1980s more than half of all inward investment into Europe came to Britain. Who should we believe about the atractiveness of Britain as an investment location: the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) or those who make the decisions in Toyota, Honda, Nissan, Ford and Bosch—companies which have brought investment to Britain because they believe that Britain is an attractive place in which to do business?

I agree in this at least with Mr. Delors: the Government have created here in Britain an investment paradise. It would be nice to hear the Opposition welcome that fact. That success was reinforced last week by the autumn statement, which was widely welcomed by British business. Let us hear less from the Opposition about what is alleged to be happening in business. Let us believe instead what British business says is happening in British business.

Dr. Marek: Statistics are all very well, but we all know that we can select a particular time from which to calculate statistics and a particular time at which to finish them. Examples are a lot better. The new bridge being built across the River Severn is basically a French affair. Can the Minister give us a few examples of where British companies are investing in France and Italy and building roads and bridges? I suspect that he will not be able to. There is a difference between foreign investment in Britain and the fact that the Government have done nothing to assist British industry to invest abroad.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman has at least one thing in common with the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East—he prefers dealing with words to dealing in numbers. If, rather than measuring the quantum of investment and the return on investment, he wants to move to words and understand clearly the right conditions for British business in the opinions of the people who matter—British business men—let him hear the words of the Institute of Directors, which said after the autumn statement last week:

> "The Chancellor this afternoon has given business the framework needed to begin the recovery."

The British Chambers of Commerce said:

> "Businesses have heard the right messages today."

The CBI said that CBI members would warmly welcome the autumn statement. Mr. Nigel Rudd, chairman of Williams Holdings, said that it > "provided a practical and positive . . . stimulus to the United Kingdom economy."

Those are real people working in the real economy, not the "experts" sitting on the Opposition Benches.

Several of my hon. Friends have expressed concern today about the scale of the deficit. That is a proper concern. Of course we all want to see the deficit held under proper control because we all recognise that it is essential to the delivery of our objective of sound money. But it is also important to be aware of where we stand in relation to the deficit.

Last week, we published a figure of £37 billion for the current financial year. During the debate, there has been a fair amount of speculation about what will happen in later years—all of it based on getting out a ruler and assuming that there will be no changes in the future. The public sector borrowing requirement for next year is not yet predictable, because we do not yet know the contents of my right hon. Friend's Budget. No Government can rule out tax increases. My right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) was right to draw attention to that, but my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) was also right to remind us of one of the features which distinguish the Government from our opponents: our clear objective that tax yields should determine expenditure, rather than the other way round.

It is also important not to lose sight of the significance of the changes in public expenditure planning which my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury introduced in the figures published in the autumn statement. The new control total, as defined in the statement, identifies core expenditure. For that, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary is planning average growth of 1·4 per cent. over the three years of this programme. As everyone will agree, that is less than the long-term growth rate of the British economy. The move will have the effect of controlling the share of the national economy taken by core public expenditure, defined through the new control total.

In the rest of Government expenditure are significant programmes which are directly related to the level of activity in the economy. As activity recovers, we can expect those programmes to absorb a smaller share of the resources available. Another factor which is acting to reduce the deficit is the fact that, as activity increases, revenues will increase as well. Within the plans, a three-pointed pincer movement is being directed at the deficit: all three points are deliberately aimed to ensure that, as activity recovers, public sector borrowing takes a smaller share of national income than it does today.

Let me say a word about the use of private capital. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor made an important statement about that last week. The relevant passage in the autumn statement has been widely welcomed, and I personally welcome the task given to me by my right hon. Friend—the task of finding new ways of introducing the ingenuity and the problem-solving capacity of the private sector into what has traditionally been regarded as the heart of the public sector.

This is not a new theme for the Government. After all, a decade ago investment in the electricity, gas, telephone and water industries was restrained by the rules of public finance. The decision made by the Government, with the support of the House, to privatise those industries made possible the investment boom that they are currently experiencing—a boom that is under attack from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, who wishes to reward the industries for their investment activity by raising an extra tax on them.

Last week, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced further developments in the use of private capital within the public sector. He announced that projects paid for by charges would no longer be tested against a theoretical public sector alternative which there was no realistic prospect of building. That relates directly to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts). My right hon. Friend the Chancellor's announcement also encouraged joint ventures between the public and private sectors, and a more flexible use of leases.

My hon. Friends the Members for Havant and for Newbury (Mrs. Chaplin) both rightly stressed the fact that questions remain to be answered in relation to the extension of scope for private capital within the public sector. I can assure them that both I and the whole Government are committed to challenging conventional assumptions about how the public and private sectors are defined and what is undertaken in the public and private sector context in order to create new options to improve the public sector services available to the general public.

The purpose of this initiative is to shift emphasis away from an obsession with inputs—with trying to second-guess every element of cost involved in the delivery of a service—to concentrate instead on the services themselves and to insist, in line with the principles of the citizens charter, that what matters in assessing whether a project is right or wrong is the quality of service that we in the public sector provide to the taxpayers who pay our salaries.

My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General said last night that the Labour party finds itself in some difficulty. It has been unable to decide whether to attack everything that the Government have done or to claim credit for the ideas that it believes that it persuaded the Government to adopt. Some Opposition Members have therefore claimed credit for certain ideas and then found themselves targeted by their own colleagues, their arguments being contradicted. It is what in the military context might be described as red on red.

There was a good example yesterday. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said that the exchange rate needs to fall by a further 10 per cent. to 20 per cent. before we can win back the lost ground. Rather to my surprise, he was joined today by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), who said that he favoured a rate for the pound somewhat below its current level against the deutschmark. Both of them were taken to task last night by the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), who made it clear that he did not agree with those whom he called devaluationists and whom he clearly regarded as dangerous bollweevils within his own party. The hon. Member for Oxford, East needs to watch out. In the morass that is today's Labour party he may find himself being hit by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, who used to agree with the hon. Member for Oxford, East. It is by no means clear, however, that he still does.

On 11 September the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, asked about the prospects for deutschmark realignment within the exchange rate mechanism, said:

> "One of the things the Germans may wish to propose is a realignment of the currencies . . . it is not our policy."

It was surprising, therefore, to hear him say yesterday to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer:

> "We have said to the Chancellor that he had the option of realigning within the exchange rate mechanism."—[Official Report, 18 November 1992; Vol. 214, c. 309.]

That is exactly what he did not say at the time when it mattered. At the time when it mattered, he made it clear that that was not a policy that he espoused. What he did say, on the other hand, on the "Today" programme on 14 September was that, although he was in favour of stability within the exchange rate mechanism:

> "The Chancellor should announce now that he is prepared to cut rates."

The effective commentary on that statement was provided by his right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), who said:

> "I do not reveal any new economic law when I say that is simply nonsense."

Shadow Treasury spokesmen experienced further difficulty with technicalities last week when they published their campaign for recovery—a document which allegedly set out the alternative path to recovery that they believe we should be following. They espoused "an emergency employment programme." The document told us little about the programme, but we were told one key fact: it was to be built on the programme that they published in April, but that it would be substantially bigger than originally planned. That was the only detail that they volunteered.

They also spoke last week about a new industry policy. I imagine that some Labour Members were interested in what the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East would say because, unlike the hon. Gentleman, some still believe that therein lies the key to economic success. I carefully read what the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East had to say, and the key sentence reads:

> "We call on the government to bring all sections of industry together to discuss the immediate implementation of an industrial strategy."

Labour has laboured mightily and brought forth an embryo.

For the first time in my life, I found myself in some sympathy with Labour Briefing. The October edition said:

> "Brown has already proved a disaster as Shadow Chancellor, despite his willingness to make himself available for twenty second TV sound-bites day or night. His recent attempts to score points . . . by making vacuous demands for economic 'co-ordination, action and competence' have impressed nobody."

I could not have put it better myself.

Shadow Treasury spokesmen will not put a figure on their recovery package, but it does not stop them from advocating a new tax on the utilities. I apologise to the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) because I realise that this is a sensitive subject for her. She sought to explain to Radio 4 listeners last week that this was not a tax but only a levy. The argument did not convince her interviewer and I do not believe that it will convince any of the staff or customers of the utilities, whose investment budgets would be slashed if the policy of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East were introduced. It does not seem to have occurred to him that there is inconsistency between using rhetoric about the importance of investment while singling out the utilities—the water industry, for example, with a £30 billion investment programme—for his latest tax increases.

Labour always has trouble with tax; it is its achilles heel. In The Sunday Times on 29 September, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) reminded Labour Members of that. Referring to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), he said:

> "It is, as he well knows, the hurdle over which Labour fell at the last two general elections. He, as Shadow Chief Secretary, and I, as Shadow Chancellor, made a botch of it in 1987. John Smith and Margaret Becket did better last April, but nothing like well enough. We all made the same mistake."

It is not surprising that shadow Treasury spokesmen are experiencing difficulty within their own party. The hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) has said that Labour's Front Bench has failed to offer a coherent economic strategy. The hon. Member for Hackney South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) says that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East has no understanding of the "elemental laws of arithmetic." The Labour party lives in a fantasy land, where it does not have to make any choices and does not have to disappoint anybody: which is delivering. Harold Wilson dreamed of turning Labour into the natural party of government; it is the achievement of the present Labour Front Bench to turn it into the natural party of opposition—an achievement that my hon. Friends and I warmly applaud.

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Adjournment Debates

9.35 am

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Adjournment debates are within your gift, and I am grateful to have the opportunity to speak on the Adjournment later today, but I and many other hon. Members are concerned that the Adjournment debate of last night never took place.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker, I seek your guidance on two matters. First, will you confirm that the schedule of Adjournment debates for today and next week remains the same, even though last night's Adjournment debate never took place? Secondly, if, as is strongly rumoured, last night's problem was due to abject incompetence on the part of the Opposition Whips' Office, will you suggest to the official Opposition that any new debate on the subject that was to be discussed last night should take place in Opposition time?

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I think that the hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) has the matter wrong. I know that he is the Parliamentary Private Secretary to a senior Minister, but it is obvious that he does not know the procedures of the House. I understand, Madam Speaker, that Thursday night Adjournment debates are within your gift and that other such debates are determined by ballot. If anyone spiked my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Ms. Squire) to prevent her from initiating the Adjournment debate last night, it was the Tory Whip, who immediately jumped to his feet to move the Adjournment.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. As a simple man and a PPS, I seek your guidance. Is it the constitutional position that the Labour party, after two days of debate on the autumn statement and several instances of Prime Minister's questions is now in favour of all the contents of the statement?

Madam Speaker: Order. I can resolve the matter. As the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) said, Thursday night Adjournment debates are within the gift of the Speaker. They do not affect Friday motions because those are dealt with by the ballot procedure.

Perhaps we might move on to the first motion.

Workfare

9.37 am

Mr. Ralph Howell (Norfolk, North): I beg to move,

That this House recognises that unemployment is nearly three million and rising; considers that unemployment is wasteful and soul destroying; recalls the original Beveridge proposals; believes that reform of the trade unions and the removal of restrictive practices have a valuable part to play in increasing employment opportunities; believes that the great majority of the unemployed desperately wish to work; considers that all sections of society would benefit from improvement of the environment and the infrastructure of the country; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to give the unemployed a voluntary choice between the current benefit system and participating in paid, environmental, caring and minor infrastructure work at an enhanced level of remuneration, thus in due course establishing the right to work and implementation of the original Beveridge proposals in full.

This is an attempt to discuss a solution to an awful problem that confronts the country. Nearly 3 million people are unemployed, and the numbers are rising. If the old recording criterion were used, we know that unemployment would be set at a higher level than ever before. It is a national and human tragedy.

Unemployment must be shattering for those who experience it. I am sure that the whole House joins me in recognising what an awful experience it must be suddenly to find that one has no job and nothing particular to do. Boredom and family strain go with a person suddenly losing his job and often having nothing to do for a long time.

There are now nearly 1 million people who have been unemployed for more than a year. That is the greatest problem confronting this country, and the world. It is really a non-party issue. Unemployment is rising all over the world, for the simple reason that more and more sophisticated technology is continually putting people out of work. The banks are shedding labour because of their sophisticated machinery, and in shops new cash registers and so on are replacing jobs and putting more people out of work. On top of that, the end of the cold war has meant that the armaments industry throughout the world has declined—a fact for which everyone is grateful.

I believe that the time has come when this House should give serious consideration to finding a way out of this impasse. In the 1930s, we did something about the problem: we set people to work building roads. Most of the ring roads around our cities were built in the 1930s by people who had been unemployed. That was and is helpful to this country. We should learn from that experience, and also from the experience of America in the 1930s.

The Americans had an even worse depression than we did, and when President Roosevelt came to office in 1933, in the depths of the depression, he immediately said that he would get the country back to work. He set up the Civilian Conservation Corps and recruited 250,000 young men. Altogether, some 12,500,000 people were put to work under Government schemes. Although that was not as comprehensive as what I shall propose today, it did represent work for about a third of the unemployed people in America.

We should give this problem more serious thought than we have in the past. The election is not far behind us. Unemployment was not properly debated during that election; it was not a major issue, although it should have been. The time has come when the Government must give serious thought to finding a way out.

Month after month, we hear of increases in unemployment, and on every occasion we are told that there is some reason for hope—the figures are not quite as bad as we had anticipated. We seem to pretend that the problem will go away or will improve. The Government's solution is to train, retrain and provide work experience: never to give work. Of course the Opposition makes as much capital as they can out of the Government's misfortunes, but what are their solutions? To train, retrain and provide work experience: never work. The only difference between the Government and the Opposition in this respect is that the latter say that the Government are not doing enough of these things. I say that we have not applied our minds to the real answers.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): Before my hon. Friend moves on to those answers, can he tell us whether, during his examination of this problem, comparing today's position with that of the 1930s, he has discovered that a greater number of middle-aged and elderly people —in career terms—are unemployed today than then? If so, will the suggestions that he makes for dealing with today's problem incorporate this particularly disadvantaged group of workers?

Mr. Howell: My solution, when I come to it, will be comprehensive—to include anyone who wants to work. The state is the provider of the last resort; it has to make sure that everyone has adequate funds for housing, clothing and food. We spend about £10 billion in support of the unemployed. All I am saying is that we could offer work to everyone who wants to work, for roughly the same money—but I shall develop that point later.

We must examine every possible way of dealing with the problem. I know that the Minister of State has just been to the United States to look at workfare there. I do not believe that workfare, as practised in the United States, is the ideal answer, but I am glad that we are looking into it.

Under workfare in the United States people are obliged to work for benefit. My idea of the right to work is to do away with unemployment benefit and to make sure that everyone has an opportunity to earn a decent wage. The workfare experiment in America has been under way for some time. It was started by Governor Reagan in California and subsequently developed there.

The BBC sent over a "Panorama" team to America some years ago and made a programme that is well worth seeing, but its objective was clearly to discredit workfare. The programme met various people who were doing menial jobs. One of them was a former miner on a dustcart who described how pleased he was to be doing that job and how awful life had been before—his family had almost broken up before he was lucky enough to get onto workfare. It had saved his marriage, and he was a very satisfied person.

The programme also showed a single parent somewhere in the mid-west who had to take her three very young children right across town to the day centre every day and then go all the way back to her work, which was near her home. She then worked all day and repeated the performance each night. She insisted that she would rather be doing that than be locked away indefinitely at home with the children, but without work companions. In short, her life was 100 per cent. better than before.

I believe that it would be good for the country and for everyone in it if we could find a way of offering work to all who want it, but, before I get onto my proposals proper, I want to tell the House about how badly unemployment is rising and will continue to rise, whatever anyone says.

Average unemployment during the 1950s was 370,000. In the 1960s, it was 480,000, and in the 1970s it was more than a million. Average unemployment in the 1980s was more than 2,700,000. An artificial dip was created. Had the rules not been changed, unemployment would never have fallen below 2.25 million. That was static.

The dip has now disappeared, and unemployment has been rising again. Unemployment always rises whenever a Government decide to attack inflation. When inflation is brought down, unemployment goes up. Right at the end of the Thatcher Administration, when we started to become nervous about the level of unemployment and reflated to bring it down, we ran into the difficulties from which we are only now emerging. So there is no escape.

In view of those figures, which are rising in a steep curve, how can any reasonable person believe that unemployment in the 1990s will not average well over 3 million? We must face that, and we need to do something positive about it.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I believe that the House will agree that my hon. Friend's argument works, whether or not unemployment rises above 3 million. Even if unemployment stood at 1 million, it would be a scandal for £8 billion to be paid to people on the sole condition that they did nothing worth while. The House is grateful to my hon. Friend for finding a non-partisan way in which to raise the problem of the non-use of people. It is a sin to abuse people; it is wrong to misuse them; but the greatest problem is not to give people any use at all.

Mr. Howell: That point has been well made, and I believe that the figure is higher than £8 billion or £10 billion. We have now reached the stage at which the official figure for the coming year is more than £10 billion of total waste; £10 billion of our money will be paid to people who in the main desperately want to work, and it will be paid on the condition that they do nothing whatever to help society. That must be a crazy idea.

Three arguments are put against my idea. The first is that it would be too costly. The second is that it would be compulsory, and the third is that there would not be enough work to be done. I think that I shall be able to argue against those in due course.

In my opinion, there is plenty of work for everybody to do, in any society, anywhere, at any time. It is crazy to believe that there is an economic argument which makes it necessary for people to be idle.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): Does my hon. Friend not agree that, when we try to match people to all the work available, we must ensure that the work is appropriate to their skills and backgrounds? There is no point in trying to make a dustman take over the job of the managing director of a charity—or vice versa.

Mr. Howell: Yes; I will deal with that question in due course. People must have a choice. My scheme does not involve the direction of labour. What I shall suggest will be in no way compulsory. I say only that the state should offer work of various kinds—for example, environmental work, such as President Roosevelt offered in the 1930s. That category could cover all sorts of activities—improving derelict land, making the streets clean and planting millions of trees, as we ought to. It would cover infrastructure work and caring work. I shall deal with all that in due course.

My principal proposals are clearly set out in the pamphlet "Why Not Work?", which was published with the help of the Adam Smith Institute a year ago, and received considerable support right across the political spectrum. The best press report, which appeared in the New Statesman and Society, slated the Opposition for not coming up with the idea years ago. There was a time when we always used to hear from the Opposition about the right to work—so the article said that it was rather strange to hear that idea coming from this side of the House.

However, I am not interested in party political banter. I want to try to galvanise everybody into recognising that we could solve the problem quickly and for all time. I shall describe what the scheme would be like when fully operational—but, as I shall explain, it would come into operation over a period.

When fully operational, the scheme would establish the right to work. Every adult would be offered work for 40 hours per week at £2·50 an hour, or one third of the national average wage, whichever was the greater. That would be free of income tax, so it is a better deal than most of the unemployed get today.

Every person aged 16 or 17 would be offered the right to remain in full-time education, supported through child benefit and educational grants, or the right to paid training, or the right to employment in the right-to-work scheme, or up to 40 hours a week at £1·25 per hour for 16-year-olds and £1·75 per hour for 17-year-olds. That would be free of income tax.

Unemployment benefit would cease. The status of being unemployed would also cease. Every person would have the right to work or, for the under-18s, the right to education or paid training. The fear of unemployment, the fear of being discarded, would be removed, and everybody would have the right to make a contribution to society in general. Thus, every adult would have access to £100 per week, tax-free, if he or she cared to work for 40 hours. That is considerably higher than the present rate of unemployment benefit.

Adult couples, married or otherwise, with or without children, would be entitled to earn up to £5,200 each per year, tax-free, and would receive no other benefits. Couples with children and single parents would be entitled to the same overall support from the state as at present, but the first £100 would come from the right-to-work scheme. For example, a family unit now receiving £150 per week in various benefits would receive £50 automatically, and the other £100 would be paid if 40 hours' work were done. For every adult, it would be deemed that the full £100 had been earned, and any entitlement to further family or housing benefit would be paid accordingly. If someone did not avail himself of the opportunity, that would be entirely up to him.

Sickness, disability and similar benefits would continue as at present. People who were 50 per cent., or less than 50 per cent., disabled would be entitled to participate in the scheme, but they would receive disability benefit automatically as of right. In other words, someone who was 50 per cent. disabled would receive whatever he is now entitled to for his 50 per cent. disability but, as he is also 50 per cent. able, he would be able to participate either at a reduced rate of pay for 40 hours, or at the full rate for 20 hours. It is important that the scheme should enable partially disabled people to participate.

Now I shall explain how the scheme would be phased in. Initially, it would be for the under-21s. Little change in legislation would be required. We already have on the statute book a system whereby no benefit is paid to 16 and 17-year-olds. They should be—I say "should be" because I am not sure whether the system has worked as it should—entitled to training or to be able to continue with their education.

I suggest that we should extend that system to include all those between 16 and 21. As soon as possible, we should set up facilities for turning jobcentres into work centres. We should operate a scheme to find work and, as I said, there would be a variety of work available. There would be environmental work, coast protection work, minor infrastructural work and caring work.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman. As he will hear from my later remarks, I do not approach what he is trying to do with any sense of absolute hostility. However, I point out to him that a guarantee was given to young people when benefits were taken from them. Unfortunately, one of the results of the Government's failure to honour that guarantee is that about 75,000 young people are waiting to take up youth training courses.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Patrick McLoughlin) indicated dissent.

Mr. Lloyd: The Minister shakes his head, but he does not know what he is talking about. Of those 75,000 people, there are certainly quite a few who, because of cessation of benefit, find themselves with no income. I am simply not prepared to listen to anyone who says that we can establish schemes the effect of which would be to deny many of our young people any access to income. Such a scheme would be a cruel illusion.

Mr. Howell: In principle, I agree with the hon. Gentleman. However, I do not believe that his figures are correct. I do believe that we have not honoured in every case what we should have honoured for 16 and 17-year-olds. I very much regret that, because it discredits such schemes. However, let that not put anyone off the idea. The guarantee has proved a little difficult; I know that we intend to correct it as soon as possible. That difficulty does not detract from my proposal.

We should introduce my proposed scheme as soon as we can. We should extend the withdrawal of benefit, but should offer a generous and real work possibility at a higher rate of pay than at present. By the time the 21-year-olds reach 22, we should advance the scheme by one or two years a year. In other words, we should make it impossible for any more young people to move forward into the something-for-nothing society which has destroyed our whole social system.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): There speaks the party of freeloaders.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I believe that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) may want to make a contribution later.

Mr. Howell rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am dealing with a seated intervention. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West cannot make his point from a seated position now.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the great advantages of his scheme is the reduction it would be likely to bring, on the basis of experience in other countries, including the United States, in the high rate of juvenile and youth crime? It would take us away from the dependency culture into which so many people in their late teenage years fall. Boredom encourages juvenile and youth crime, which is one of the most serious factors in the rise of crime, especially in crimes of dishonesty such as car crime and dwelling house burglaries, which are such a scourge on society.

Mr. Howell: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend who makes a valuable point. When we talk about the social damage being done and about the overall cost, we should realise that a huge cost goes along with unemployment, especially for young people in the inner cities, in terms of policing and the extra cost of insurance for homes that are being burgled week in and week out. A tremendous benefit would accrue from the scheme in that important area.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We shall gain more interest in examining the details of my hon. Friend's scheme if we do not rely too much on the crime reduction element, although that has a part. We should remember that 10 per cent. of males aged 15—well below school leaving age—have already been convicted of an offence for which they could have been sent to gaol for six months or more. We should recognise that the scheme would have some advantage in reducing crime, but the main purpose would be to avoid people being paid money on the sole condition that they do nothing worth while.

Mr. Howell: I was talking about the stepping up of the age limit at which benefit would be withdrawn and at which there would be no entitlement to benefit. By the time the 21-year-olds reached the age of 22, the limit would be stepped up to 23. No more young people would ever get into the dependency culture.

Lady Olga Maitland: Would my hon. Friend seriously consider suggesting his scheme to people in their 30s and 40s? The new age travellers, for example, were clearly fit and able to work, but showed no intention of looking for work.

Mr. Howell: Of course we should tighten up the work test. When the scheme was fully operative, it would be a work test. There would be no payments to new age travellers when the scheme was fully operative. There would be no classification of "unemployed". Work would be offered to everybody, and people could take that work the day after they left their previous employment. There would be no break. Whenever a person wanted to take up a job, there would be a basic income which would be a basic right for everybody.

A few months ago, I discussed my scheme with people in a job centre in Sheringham. I nearly got to the point of taking a vote; I am sure that, if a vote had been taken, it would have been carried almost unanimously. At least 75 per cent. were in favour. Just as I was about to get to the vote, somebody intervened and made sure that no vote was taken.

As well as starting with the young, I suggest that, in Sheringham or some such place, we should also run an experiment with older people. We should say that we have an obligation to ensure that all the young under 21, for starters, have work available to them. We should also put aside 20 or 30 places for other people on a first come, first served basis. There would soon be a queue. I know of many constituents who would love to take up such work. The pressure would then come from the unemployed themselves for more places in any particular locality.

That would not be something imposed by the Government; it would be demanded of the Government by the unemployed. That is a sensible and practical way in which to proceed.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): Does my hon. Friend agree that the real problem is that of the long-term unemployed? In any six-month period, some 4 million people move in and out of work. Would not my hon. Friend's scheme be easier to implement if he allowed unemployment benefit to remain for the first six months of unemployment and operated it thereafter?

Mr. Howell: I am grateful for that suggestion. I do not take a rigid view; I am suggesting the scheme as a cockshy. Refinements may be needed and what my hon. Friend suggests may be one of them.

The scheme would simplify everything. There would be no tribunals or refunds and no complicated calculations involving thousands of civil servants mulling over silly sums and claiming back £2 here or as little as 10p there. The whole thing would be quite simple. There would be a work centre. A person who worked for one hour would get £2·50, and a person who worked for the full 40 hours would get £100 at the end of the week, which could be paid straight into his bank account. There need be no cash exchange.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): My hon. Friend has already made it clear that he envisages a scheme whereby unemployed people would receive £100 a week, but he has added that entitlement to other benefits such as housing benefit would remain and that, if a family was entitled to benefits worth more than £100, the benefits system would be used to top up the income from the scheme.

Does that not mean that my hon. Friend would not succeed in removing all the complications? In practice, the benefit system would continue and it would be necessary to calculate the benefit entitlement of people with families to housing benefit and so on. Can my hon. Friend assure the House that his proposed scheme would yield the administrative savings that he claims?

Mr. Howell: I agree with my hon. Friend. I should like us to go for the full scheme immediately, but it is not practicable to do so. Once the principle was in place, however, we could adjust benefits accordingly and, in due course, phase them out and so wean the whole country off the dependency culture. That could not be done immediately. That is why I suggest that, initially, while we are trying to find a way to start the scheme——

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): By the sound of it, the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that an unemployed man with a family—perhaps several children—would be paid £100 if he worked a full week. Does the hon. Gentleman expect anyone to take seriously the suggestion a family man would be able to pay his rent and feed, clothe and look after his family on that sort of income?

Mr. Howell: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was in his place when I explained my scheme in full. I said—I was challenged on this by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts)—that a family receiving a total of £150 in various benefits today would automatically receive £50 in benefit, while the parent or parents would be offered 40 hours work at £2·50. Both parents could earn £100 per week if they wished to, and if they did, they would probably be able to afford to pay someone to look after their children. Thus, no hardship would result from the scheme if it were introduced in the way that I have suggested—although, as my hon. Friend the Member for Havant pointed out, it would not clear away all the deadening bureaucracy in the system immediately.

Lady Olga Maitland: Has my hon. Friend taken into account, in considering how his scheme would work, the fact that, although it is laudable to encourage the unemployed to take up an occupation, they need time to look for long-term employment that is sustainable and viable? We do not want to take that from them.

Mr. Howell: Perhaps it would be necessary to introduce a refinement there, although I personally believe that, if someone seriously wants work, he will find the time to look for it after he has put in his 40 hours. We do not want too much of a nanny state, and if we go in for such provisions, we may find that the scheme is wrecked.

Over the years, I have received a great deal of support for my scheme. It is not something that I have thought up in the past day or two, but something of whose benefits I have tried to persuade many Governments over a long period. Lord Carr, who was Secretary of State when I entered the House in 1970, heard all about it—indeed, they have all heard all about it. Sooner or later, I shall win.

I have had something of a victory. I remember going to see Lord Tebbit in the early 1980s when he was Secretary of State. Norman Tebbit did not want to know anything about it. He had the answer to unemployment: it was coming down. In fact, it went up, but that is par for the course for all Secretaries of State. It is interesting to note, therefore, that, in his recent book "Unfinished Business", Lord Tebbit has given my version of workfare the top spot in his suggestions for putting the country back on course for prosperity. We have all heard about St. Paul, but it is cause for rejoicing when one of our number sees the light at the end of the Corridor.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will do his best to draw the attention of the present Secretary of State—who used to be one of my constituents and who has known all about my scheme for a long time—to our debate today. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will show—rather more than she did in the House the other day—that she is just as enlightened as Lord Tebbit.

The Employment Research Trust, which a number of my friends and I set up 12 years ago, has done much work in conjunction with Buckingham university to try to get the idea across. I am also grateful to the Adam Smith Institute, which supports the scheme and which helped me with the publication of the pamphlet "Why Not Work?" At the other end of the spectrum, the Low Pay Unit has been especially helpful. I have worked closely with Chris Pond for many years, and he fully supports what I am trying to do. Moreover, the New Statesman and Society gave the exercise a year ago a better write-up than any other periodical.

I have received support from unemployment groups throughout the country—including, in particular, a group in Finchley. I do not believe that any of those involved support my hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mr. Booth) or that they supported his predecessor. Nevertheless, they have devoted most of their recent publication to saying that the scheme should be carefully considered and that it must be given top priority.

Every time I speak on this matter, I receive support from unemployed people throughout the country, almost all of whom want to work. I stress the fact that the majority of the unemployed want to work. They want comradeship, they want something to do, they want a purpose and they want an escape from the boredom of unemployment.

Mr. Hawkins: Can my hon. Friend confirm that one of the most interesting developments in workfare has been in the USA, in particular in California and West Virginia? Earlier this year, I was fortunate enough to observe the West Virginia experience, which has been particularly positive. It certainly reinforces what my hon. Friend has been saying.

Mr. Howell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments.

A constituent of mine—a Mr. Haines—has suddenly found himself unemployed at the age of 58. He started work when he was 15 and spent 41 years in employment and two years in self-employment. He is not entitled to any unemployment benefit—partly, I think, because his wife works for more than 16 hours a week, and perhaps partly because of his self-employment. I doubt whether he is even included in the unemployment statistics. There is something wrong with that.

Mr. Haines went to his local jobcentre, but he was told that it was impossible to find him work. He was told to come back in six months, by which time he would have lost the will to work and the jobcentre would reinstil it in him through some scheme or another. What could be more ridiculous than that? I am glad to say that he is one of those who are working hard and successfully to promote my scheme.

Mr. Gerst: My hon. Friend should persevere with his scheme beyond today's debate and beyond his conversations with eminent Secretaries of State. There is one important principle in politics—not that one does something that is right, but that one puts it across at the right moment. This is the right moment for my hon. Friend's scheme. In the past, Governments have wanted to spend money; more recently, they have wanted to save it. Today, they want to get value for their money. That is why my hon. Friend's scheme is worthy of support.

Mr. Howell: I am grateful for those comments. We must curb wasteful Government expenditure. We waste at least £10 billion in this area, and that is one of the most important aspects of the problem. We can push and push to no avail when the time is not right, but I believe that the right moment has arrived. All sides of the political spectrum realise that this is not a party political issue—it is a national and international issue. We should make it the cornerstone of our plans for reviving the economy.

Instead of telling our partners in Europe that we want nothing to do with the social chapter, we should say, "This is our social chapter. It is the answer to our problems and your problems." My scheme could be the answer to problems in Poland and Russia. I am sure that everyone realises that we cannot just worry about our problems, because the worldwide problems in, for example, the eastern European countries will soon become our problems if we do not find an answer to them.

I was pleased to receive a letter from my hon. Friend the Minister of State on that very point only a few days ago. He suggested that there might be a scheme of some sort, although I do not think that it would be the right sort to satisfy me. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will outline a pilot scheme to investigate whether my ideas could be used to find a way to solve such terrible problems.

We must deal with this matter with the utmost urgency. If it is left much longer, we will be in a deeper and deeper hole, pouring more and more money down the drain. We are ruining our economy because we have not faced such an important problem. There is only one way out. As I said earlier, when President Roosevelt took office in 1933 in the depths of the depression, he said that there was only one way out of the problems: "We must work our way out." That is the way to proceed.

10.26 am

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell), who spoke without party animus, for the opportunity to debate, in the words of his motion, the "wasteful and soul destroying" effects of the ever-growing job losses in Britain today.

The debate comes on a day of rapidly mounting public concern about the huge costs of mass unemployment, in economic and human terms alike. These costs have increased, are increasing and will go on increasing, in spite of the measures announced by the Chancellor in his autumn statement on 12 November. Indeed, many people think that the statement will make the dole queue even longer by reducing the purchasing power of millions of people who are already among the lowest paid and who, in many cases, have living standards that are little better than those of people on state benefits.

As of now, the increase in the jobless total compared with only two years ago is almost 1·25 million—71 per cent. The number of jobless people chasing every vacancy has shot up from 11 to 30. The number of young people out of work has risen by 323,000—an all-time high—and 541,000 jobs in manufacturing industry have disappeared.

It is against this background that I want to discuss the extremely daunting difficulties of disabled people—for whom the hon. Gentleman said that he wanted positive discrimination—as they seek to show that they have abilities as well as disabilities. I hope that, by common consent in the House today, it will be agreed that they are among the least fortunate and the most distressed of all the victims of the jobs famine. For them, unemployment is a double handicap that leads to double despair. They seek not sympathy but social fairness; not the dependence of state benefits but the independence of reasonably paid employment; not expressions of compassion but practical concern in a society about which one highly skilled disabled person, who lives in Surrey, commented to me recently:

> "It would be an exaggeration to describe my status as that even of a second-class citizen."

Another very able, but physically disabled, correspondent wrote to me last week from north London to say:

> "I was made redundant as a Senior Research Officer into special needs education when the ILEA was disbanded. Since then I have attended 32 interviews for virtually the same kind of employment. Obviously my written applications were acceptable but the interviewing panels were either unable, or unwilling, to look beyond the nature of my physical disability, thus ignoring my proven ability to do the job."

In the queue for jobs, these and other disabled people are the tail-enders in the longest and most soul-destroying queue in Britain today. The Spastics Society, in a justifiably bitter comment about the unmerited but widespread discrimination against disabled job-seekers, has been displaying a poster which pictures two job applicants, one disabled and the other able-bodied, with the caption:

> "One has the degree in engineering the other has the job."

As the society points out, employers can blatantly discriminate against disabled people, with no real fear of being called to account.

Colin Barnes, in his book "Disabled People and Discrimination", amply exposes and documents the extent of discrimination in comtemporary Britain. The 3 per cent. quota scheme which the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944 provided is now a dismal failure. More than three quarters of the employers who are subject to its requirements do not meet the quota. There have been no prosecutions of defaulting employers since the present Government came to power.

Employers are now six times more likely to turn a disabled person down for an interview, even if his or her qualifications and experience are identical to those of a non-disabled applicant. People with disabilities are at least two-and-a-half times more likely to be out of work than the general population. Nor does that figure take into account the large numbers of employable disabled people aged 16 to 64—perhaps as many as 1·2 million—who are excluded from official unemployment statistics. Although they are very much "out of work", they are hidden by the Government's figures.

At present, only 1 per cent. of the work force are registered as disabled; yet according to the Government's own surveys, well over 3 per cent. are registrable. For their part, Ministers say that education and persuasion are preferable to the legal requirements of the 1944 Act. But the more repetitively they state their view, the more tragically unemployment grows among employable disabled people. However, that is not the clinching argument against the Government's view of the way forward.

If education and persuasion alone can achieve equal opportunities for disabled people, why is the Government's own record as an employer so poor? They are a huge employer and, if education and persuasion are better than statutory requirements, why have they not yet either educated or persuaded themselves to employ more disabled people? How persuasive is the advocate who has still to persuade himself of the worth of his own advocacy?

I want to set out briefly some of the most recent information available about the Government's approach as an employer to the quota of 3 per cent. In a parliamentary reply on 14 July 1992, the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, said in column 659 of Hansard that in June 1989 the number of registered disabled staff in his Department was 156—1·2 per cent. —and that in June 1990 the number was 153—again 1·2 per cent.

Also on 14 July, the Home Secretary told the House:

> "In 1989, 143 members of staff in the Home Office were registered disabled, representing 0·3 per cent. of all staff."—[Official Report, 14 July 1992; Vol. 211, c. 540–41.]

The percentage in June 1991 was approximately the same.

On 15 July, the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), reported:

> "In June 1989 there were 30 registered disabled people employed in the Department which represented 0·7 per cent. of the total work force. In 1990, the comparable figures were 29 and 0·6 per cent."—[Official Report, 15 July 1992; Vol. 211, c. 748–49.]

With such figures to explain, Ministers are being told not only by disabled people, but by employers, that it is not what they say that impresses those they lecture about education and persuasion, but what they do.

Lady Olga Maitland: Could you possibly explain——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Lady not to use the word "you" in that way.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the right hon. Gentleman kindly explain that, when disabled people are employed in any sector, it is expensive to meet their needs? It is all very well to say that not enough disabled people are employed, but the reality is that not all disabled people are suitable for certain types of work. It is necessary to provide facilities to help them to work. For example, they may need computers tailored to their needs. It is expensive, and it is a great problem.

Mr. Morris: I speak with some experience of administering help for disabled people. The hon. Lady is right to say that we must never simplify the problems. For example, there are often difficulties of physical access for disabled people to places of employment. Under the last Labour Government, capital grants were made available for the first time, in recognition of that difficulty, among other special measures. However, the inescapable fact is that the abilities of disabled people are massively under-used. For their part, the Government say that 3 per cent. of the work force are registrable, but nothing like 3 per cent. of the work force are registered disabled people. That is why disabled people feel that the way in which they are treated is a major scandal. They passionately want to work and, as I said, to demonstrate that they have abilities as well as disabilities.

Official statistics also show that, even when disabled people are in work, they are more likely to be lower paid and, despite their qualifications, in lower-skilled occupations than the general population.

Mr. Hawkins: The right hon. Member's work for the disabled and in championing their opportunities for work is widely respected on both sides of the House and throughout the country. Does he accept that great strides have been made in recent years, especially by voluntary organisations—I know that he is connected with many of them? While he is on the subject, I pay tribute to Blackpool and Fylde Access for the Disabled, in which, as the right hon. Gentleman may know, the work is organised by Clarissa Clarke, who is well known throughout the country.

The work of voluntary organisations, which have made the same case that the right hon. Gentleman has been advancing, is enormously important, and I hope that he will join me to pay tribute to their work.

Mr. Morris: I am grateful to the hon. Member for his intervention. I most warmly endorse what he said about the superb work that is done in the voluntary sector. Many years ago in the House, it was argued that, as state provision expanded, the voluntary sector would wither away. That was total nonsense. As state provision increased, so did voluntary effort. If we are to make disabled people fully a part of society, instead of being apart from society, there is enormous work to be done in both the statutory and voluntary sectors. The voluntary organisation to which the hon. Member referred is one of high reputation in the north-west. I am delighted to know of his connection with its work.

To resume, I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House would agree that, when disabled people are in work, they are more likely to be in lower-paid and—despite their qualifications—in lower-skilled occupations compared with the general population. The rights of disabled people in and seeking employment are further undermined by an education and training system that frequently operates in an openly segregationist and discriminatory way.

As I have shown in many representations to Ministers on behalf of the Rathbone Society, in whose admirable work my good and hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) also takes a close interest, most training and enterprise councils fail to meet the concerns of disabled people in their areas. A report about that, soon to be published by the Spastics Society, will further document the failure of TECs in their dealings with disabled people.

The right to work is dismissed as a slogan by disabled people who are denied basic civil rights which the non-disabled can take for granted. Their response to the Government's talk of "citizens charters" is to insist on becoming full and equal members of society. They want this House to provide a proper framework of legal rights to end discrimination against them. They point to the German levy system as a simple but very effective method of making employers meet their responsibilities. Employers in Germany have to meet a financial levy if less than 6 per cent. of their work force are disabled people. Large numbers of German employers meet the quota, but the levy produces an annual income of about £100 million, which is channelled directly to employment programmes for people with disabilities.

[Mr. Morris]

Nor are Britain's disabled people alone in insisting on a proper framework of legal rights to end the unjustified discrimination that they now have to endure. In a highly distinguished speech in another place on 4 November, Lord Renton, formerly Sir David Renton and the Member of Parliament for Huntingdon, appealed to the Government to find time in this House for the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill, which all organisations of and for disabled people want to see speedily enacted. He said:

> "It is extraordinary and not very creditable that there has been such opposition, or nonfeasance" in the past. He went on to say that when the Bill returned to this House the Government should

> "at least provide time for its discussion . . . Better still",

Ministers

> "could take on the Bill themselves and make it a Government Bill."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 4 November 1992, c. 1526.]

Much to their honour, other Conservative peers supported the Bill, just as many Conservative Members have also given it strong backing and continue to do so.

Civil rights legislation for disabled people is not just an idea whose time has come. It is an idea whose time came 10 years ago, when the committee which, as the then Minister, I appointed to look into restrictions against disabled people in 1979, reported in 1982 in favour of legislative action. Since then, legislation has been enacted in the United States, Australia and Canada, among other countries. We could have led the world, but instead we trail far behind.

It was left to President Bush, when signing the Americans With Disabilities Act 1990, to say from the White House lawn:

> "I want to appeal today to our friends in the business community. You have in your hands the key to the success of this Act, for you can unlock a splendid resource of untapped human potential that, when free, will enrich us all. Let the shameful wall of exclusion finally come tumbling down."

I referred earlier to the Spastics Society's poster about two job applicants, one disabled and the other able-bodied. Another of its posters is even more eloquent in its message to parliamentarians in all parts of this House. The poster shows two infants and the caption says:

> "One has cerebral palsy, the other has full human rights."

The picture of the two infants symbolises the rank injustices that millions of our disabled fellow citizens have to live with day in and day out. I ask not only the Government but the House not to forget them in this debate.

10.47 am

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) on raising this issue today and on his contribution to the debate on the problem known as, "Why work?" Whatever his frustrations in getting his message on workfare across, several measures that have been introduced to try to deal with the "Why work?" problem in the past decade can be traced back to the battles that my hon. Friend has fought. I shall mention three.

First, the benefits system now, more than ever before, ensures that, whatever their family circumstances, people can be better off in work than out of it. Family credit, which was introduced five years ago, is aligned with the structure of family premiums for income support, and ensures that one will always be better off in work, however low paid the job.

The only remaining wrinkle in what would otherwise be a complete benefit system, ensuring that people are always better off in work, is the provision for mortgage payments. There has been a welcome extention of home ownership, but, unfortunately, we are at the bottom of a recession. People have told me at my surgery in Havant that they will be worse off taking a job because, although they will receive family credit and housing benefit, while they are on income support their mortgage is paid. With that one exception, which is admittedly increasingly important, the benefits system ensures that people are better off in work.

Secondly, the Government have tightened up on what used to be called the "available for work" provision. In the past one was entitled to receive unemployment benefit if one was genuinely available for work, but that requirement has now been changed to one of "actively seeking work". I am sure that all my hon. Friends welcome that crucial improvement in the benefit system.

The third change was announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security during his uprating statement last week. Those people who are not actively seeking work will no longer be penalised with a 40 per cent. reduction in their benefit; they will now be in danger of losing all of their benefit. That is another welcome measure designed to deal with the absurd and anti-social behaviour of new age travellers and other groups.

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor and Maidenhead): Does my hon. Friend share my welcome for the new training for work programme, which was announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment following the autumn statement?

Mr. Willetts: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has added a fourth item to my list. That list adds up to a series of significant initiatives aimed at encouraging people into work to ensure that we do not reward people who remain unemployed for a long time.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman has referred to those who are denied benefit because they are deemed not to be actively seeking work. Does he understand that in many areas there is no work for people to seek actively? The idea of penalising people because they cannot find work is morally dubious.

The hon. Gentleman also spoke about rewarding people for long-term unemployment. Surely he appreciates that, even under this munificent Conservative Government, under whom income support and other benefit rates are poor, the reward for not working is poverty.

Mr. Willetts: The test of actively seeking work does not depend on the availability of numerous jobs in an immediate area. If someone sends off many job applications and, when offered, accepts a place on a training scheme, even if they live in an area which, sadly, is suffering from a high rate of unemployment, any sensible adjudication officer will accept that that person is seeking work and will not penalise him.

The hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) also referred to the current rates of benefit. One of the reasons that the benefit for low-income working families—family credit—was improved was precisely so that the Government could create a gap between income received in work and that received out of work. They have not done that by reducing the available benefits to those out of work, but by boosting the incomes of those who are in low-paid jobs. I stress the importance of improving the assistance available for people in such low-paid jobs, which creates an incentive for them to work. It is not true that benefits for the long-term unemployed have been cut in real terms.

I must express some doubts, perhaps the fashionable term is scepticism, about the new proposals on workfare from my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North, which go beyond the specific initiatives launched by the Government in the past few years. I am afraid that my doubts are wide ranging. The first relates to a matter of principle. As my hon. Friend made clear, his scheme essentially means that the state acts as the employer of last resort. In effect, a large part of the labour market would be nationalised, which represents a significant extension of the Government's role in that market. As a believer in free markets, I could not support such an extension.

I know that we are always told that if there are idle hands on the one side and unmet needs on the other, surely it is right for the state to step in to bring the two together.

Mr. Ralph Howell: I am sorry that my hon. Friend does not agree with the idea of the state being the employer of last resort, but I am grateful to him for his pleasant references to what I have tried to achieve in the past.

I am sorry that my hon. Friend has not taken on board the fact that the state is the provider of last resort and, therefore, it is the waster of last resort because it insists on providing billions of pounds while getting nothing in return. I know that my hon. Friend is a free marketeer, who really believes in the free economy, so surely he sees the good sense of getting some value for the £8 billion that we spend. Why should we not get something done in return to improve society? People could work to clean up our cities and our countryside; they could plant more trees to help the environment. It seems to me that my hon. Friend insists on being the waster of last resort.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I must point out that interventions seem to be getting a trace longer each time and that they are now too long.

Mr. Willetts: I was, of course, shocked to be described as a waster of last resort by my hon. Friend. I have not previously attempted to adopt such a role and I am not pleased to have it attributed to me today.

The problem is rather more complicated than my hon. Friend imagines. Of course, in the short term, my hon. Friend may be tempted by the idea of putting someone to work straightaway on planting trees, because that is better than having him unemployed. However, let us imagine that a software programmer is made redundant when his firm folds. If he lost that job on a Friday and, on the Monday, he is set planting trees, that would not be an efficient use of his time or his skills.

My hon. Friend should recall that one of the ideas of Beveridge—the early Beveridge of great insight, who advocated and introduced labour exchanges—was that it was inefficient if an unemployed person accepted the first job that he could find. It might be better for that person to spend several weeks, indeed up to several months, on labour search to find the job that matches his skills.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Willetts: I will, but I hope that my hon. Friend will bear in mind the stricture that we received from Madam Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Dicks: My hon. Friend has highlighted the difference between his view and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell). The workfare programme would offer a temporary post to someone while he was seeking a permanent job. My hon. Friend is confusing the two types of employment.

Mr. Willetts: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point, which I shall address later.

I have attempted to set out the reasons for my concern about the ambitious workfare scheme that my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North has advocated. My first objection is one of principle. Of course it is frustrating when one sees idle hands when there is unmet need, but it is not the job of the state to make those idle hands meet those unmet needs; it is the job of a properly operating labour market. It is not an enormous command economy directing people into jobs that politicians decide are useful. That is not how a free economy works.

My second objection is a practical one of cost. It is difficult to see how any such scheme would be less expensive than our current system. I do not believe that there would be any savings on the administration burden of the benefit system. It is already clear from the debate that people who received £100 a week contribution for work that they might do under the workfare scheme would still remain entitled to income support and housing benefit to top up their family income. All the intricacies of the current benefit system would still be with us.

My next anxiety, which ties in with the point made about short-term versus long-term, arises from the unhappy experience that we have had with what is, in effect, a version of workfare for 16 to 18-year-olds. I supported that measure in principle because it seemed to make sense and, after all, it matched a proposal in the Beveridge report of 1942. But in practice it has not been possible for the training agency and TECs to deliver training schemes rapidly and effectively——

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for me to request that the Secretary of State for Transport be instructed to come to the House this morning to answer questions about the 5,000 redundancies announced by British Rail and the extremely serious difficulties that rail investment faces as a consequence of the autumn statement? It is appalling that such a state of affairs should exist in an industry for which there is ministerial responsibility, yet a responsible Minister is not present to answer for it.

As British Rail has directly linked its announcement of 5,000 redundancies with the inadequacy of last week's settlement, it is essential that the Secretary of State comes to the House before those shocking redundancies have time to take effect.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Whether Ministers come to the House is not a matter for the Chair, but I can inform hon. Members that Madam Speaker has not received any application from the Government for a statement to be made on that or any other matter.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I appreciate, of course, that it is not a matter for you directly to get involved in the movement of Ministers. The difficulty is that the 5,000 job losses have safety implications for many people using British Rail, and the redundancies are being implemented very quickly. The House should receive a statement from the responsible Minister because the Government's plan to privatise British Rail is the cause of the 5 ,000 job losses.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I can only repeat what I said, which is that it is not a matter for the Chair. Representatives of the Government are present, and I can say no more than that.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to the point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. You will know that in recent years, attempts have been made to get Ministers to come to the House to explain various matters. Sometimes the Chair has been able to convey a message to the Government to the effect that while a Minister might not be available immediately, arrangements should be made for a statement to be made before the end of the day's sitting.

You rightly point out, Madam Deputy Speaker, that representatives of the Government are on the Front Bench. Unfortunately, there is not among them a Minister who is directly involved in the issue. Would it be possible for you to convey to Madam Speaker the fact that we are raising these points of order in which we are urging that a Minister should make a statement, so that a Minister is here before 2.30 pm to make a statement before the Adjournment debate comes on?

The weekend lies before us. It is not as though we can press for a Minister to appear for questioning tomorrow, although that might not be a bad idea. I urge on you to take that step, Madam Deputy Speaker, because in the present climate of mass unemployment, with a Government who are causing more wreckage than Hitler caused in the 1939-45 war, at some point, Madam Speaker, Front Benchers or Back Benchers, must say, "Enough is enough". Accordingly, I appeal to you to inform Madam Speaker that we would like her to convey to the Ministers concerned our demand that one of them should be here before 2.30.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Further to the point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I understood you to say that Madam Speaker had received no intimation from the Secretary of State for Transport that he intended to make a statement today about the job losses. Has Madam Speaker received a message about a statement being made next week by the Secretary of State for Scotland concerning the announced 3,500 job losses by the Royal Bank of Scotland?

Are you aware, Madam Deputy Speaker, that that scale of job losses in Scotland is equal to job losses caused by, for example, the closure of a large shipyard or a steel mill? It is a matter of the gravest importance to us in Scotland. I am wondering whether Madam Speaker has been told that we may expect a statement on Monday or Tuesday of next week.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I understand that the answer is no.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. May I, through you, ask for a message to be sent to Ministers to let them know how seriously the announced job losses are taken in my constituency, which could be absolutely devastated by job cuts of that magnitude? Yesterday when I told Roger Freeman—[Interruption.]—who was in York, that there could be hundreds of job losses——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. In his concern, the hon. Member has forgotten the custom that we do not refer to a Member of the House by name.

Mr. Bayley: I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I am concerned because while the Government yesterday morning described rail job losses on that scale as bunkum, the announcement of those redundancies was made in the evening. It is surprising that a Minister has not explained why such a change occurred in the course of just six hours.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) said, there should be time today to get a message to the relevant Minister so that he may have an opportunity to answer to the House for the appalling job losses that have been announced and the consequences for the travelling public.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I rise, rather extraordinarily, on a genuine point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker, to seek your guidance. Under the rules of the House, a Standing Order No. 20 motion cannot be moved on a Friday. So we are in a predicament in that my hon. Friends and I would like to have had the opportunity, had this been a normal day, to raise not just the fact of the loss, or possible loss, of 5,000 jobs on the railways, but another report to the effect that Ministers have been thrown into panic by the requirement that people working in the public sector who move into privatised jobs will carry with them the rights, privileges and conditions that they had while in the public sector. That suggests that the two situations are interrelated and that an attempt is being made to get rid of 5,000 workers——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is now beginning to debate merits, whereas I can deal only with points of order.

Mr. Williams: I come directly to my point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker, having given you some background on the two aspects, which appear to be interrelated. We are in the predicament that we cannot raise a Standing Order No. 20 motion until Monday. May I ask you at least to facilitate our attempts to get a statement from the Minister by saying that, should a Minister not come forward at some stage today with a statement, on Monday you, or the then occupant of the Chair, would be inclined to give sympathetic consideration to a Standing Order No. 20 motion moved from the Opposition Benches?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I cannot anticipate what Madam Speaker's views might be on Monday.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Would it be possible for the Secretary of State for Transport to come to the House now and speak in this debate and, in the process of doing that, explain the bunkum of his policies that have led to the redundancies?

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a slightly different point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. It is clearly important that we should debate transport at the earliest possible date. The person to facilitate that is not the Secretary of State for Transport but the Leader of the House, who almost certainly is now in his office in the Palace of Westminster.

In my constituency we are now going ahead with the Leeds-Bradford electrification scheme, and the announced job losses might throw that whole venture into jeopardy. Accordingly, you may have been informed, Madam Deputy Speaker, that the Leader of the House would be prepared to announce changes in the business for next week so that we may incorporate a debate on the catastrophe that is facing British Rail.

Mr. Tredd rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. Member raising a point of order?

Mr. Tredd: Yes, Madam Deputy Speaker, it refers to points of order made earlier about the events of last night. As a new Member, I have been sitting here brooding on the matter since those points were raised and I seek your further guidance. Was it a matter of parliamentary privilege, in the sense that one hon. Member wished to present a petition and another wished to move the Adjournment debate, and both were prevented from doing so through no fault of their own? Is it right, under parliamentary procedure, that they should have been prevented from proceeding as they wished?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I understand that Madam Speaker dealt with that matter last night and I have nothing to add to what she said on that occasion.

Mr. Keith Hill (Streatham): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. We should be grateful if you would convey our urgent request to Madam Speaker for a statement by the Minister on the railway redundancies on three grounds. First, those redundancies—5,000 over a period of four months—are on a scale comparable, although by no means similar, to the coal fields redundancies on which statements were rightly made to the House. Secondly, British Rail has directly ascribed the redundancies to the tight settlement in the Chancellor's autumn statement. There is therefore a direct ministerial responsibility for those redundancies. Thirdly, as we have already heard, the crisis now facing British Rail has safety implications. It has been the traditional and historic right of the House to ask Ministers to explain the detail of British Rail policy on signalling and other matters. On all those grounds, there is an urgent and pressing case for a statement by the Minister.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Dicks.

Mr. Dicks: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Would it not be possible, even at this late stage, for the Opposition, who have their own supply day on Monday to change the nature of their business to discuss that point? I do not sit in the Whips' Office but if there are behind-the-scenes discussions, I should not be surprised if my hon. Friends said that they would be prepared to listen. It is no good the Opposition ranting and raving about safety today when they have their own supply day on Monday.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have now heard quite sufficient to offer a comment to the House. Of course, I shall see that Madam Speaker is acquainted with the strength of feelings that has been evinced in the various points of order. Although she cannot command Ministers, I have no doubt that Ministers sitting on the Front Bench will make it their business to convey those feelings to those concerned.

We must now continue our debate.

Mr. Willetts: Moreover, when one looks at the practical difficulties in implementing a workfare scheme it is clear that lessons can be learned from the experience of youth training schemes for 16 to 18-year-olds. I entirely supported that attempt and had no difficulties in principle in expecting that 16 to 18-year-olds should be in education, training or paid employment. However, in the past few years we have encountered serious practical difficulties in delivering a job guarantee. That is not surprising because, if a 17-year-old loses his or her job on a Friday evening, it is difficult for them to turn up on a Monday morning and suddenly be put straight onto a training scheme.

Training schemes operate on the basis of planning ahead. Employers who take on trainees want to know in advance who they will get and in what circumstances. They need to be confident that the trainee will stay for a year or two. Such long-term training is different from a social security system, which rightly tries to pick up short-term needs of people who suddenly find themselves without a weekly income.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North was a trifle casual when he said that if someone loses their job on Friday, on Monday they can immediately turn up and be put to planting trees. That is not how any employer can operate in the real world.

Mr. Ralph Howell: May I clarify that point? There is a great difference between fitting somebody into a training scheme and adding him to a work force—tree planting or whatever it might be. It is a pity that so many difficulties are being put in the way.

Mr. Willetts: I am sorry if my hon. Friend thinks that I am simply putting difficulties in his way. I am not trying to do so. I am trying to deal with practical issues, which would have to be dealt with before a scheme along those lines could become a viable proposition.

The American experience has already been described in an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins). Many of us are wary of American experiences, as they can be misleading. Many states operate schemes which they call workfare because federal grants are available for such schemes. If they called their programmes "training schemes" or "assistance for single parents on aid for families with dependent children benefit", they would not receive federal support. So if the federal Government become keen on workfare, there is an enormous incentive on the state to dress up any old training scheme as workfare.

In practice, many of the schemes that now operate in America under the name workfare would, in this country, be classic operations carried out in the past by the Manpower Services Commission and now carried out by the Employment Service and training and enterprise councils. It is wrong to regard America as a country that has implemented workfare along the lines now advocated by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North.

Mr. Hawkins: My hon. Friend takes up a point that I made in an earlier intervention. Although I accept his point about federal grants, which is an inevitable concomitant of grants being made available in any country, I strongly urge him to bear in mind the fact that many distinguished congressmen in the United States have called for genuine workfare. Those include a good friend of mine, Republican Congressman Bill Emerson from Missouri, whom I have had the opportunity to visit. I endorse those in the United States who call for genuine workfare and I believe that the states to which I referred earlier have implemented successfully precisely the kind of genuine workfare that my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North believes in, and in which I also believe.

Mr. Willetts: I defer to my hon. Friend's wide experience of the American debate.

May I conclude with some constructive suggestions? I do not wish to leave any hint of a suspicion in the mind of my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North, that I am here to carp or be negative. One possible way forward is for TECs to review how they are currently dealing with their work for the unemployed. I am worried about how TECs are now operating.

Although it is imaginative to bring together public funding, people from the private sector and people with business experience who know about training and the business of creating jobs, many of them seem to be tempted by the prospect of elaborate and ambitious training schemes that will produce computer experts and people for the high-tech industries. They are tempted in particular to cream off from the unemployed those people who may already have considerable skills and who, with a modest amount of extra training, will be able to contribute most obviously to the local economy. I do not blame them for that. I can see the commercial incentives for a group of local employers to operate in that way.

The trouble is that if TECs operate like that they are mimicking what a commercial training agency would do —taking on the best risks, best prospects and the people with the greatest chance of commanding a job in the future.

Surely public sector training schemes and publicly financed training organisations should aim to help the most difficult cases—people who may have been let down by the educational system or who may have modest skills. They should not help only those people who will immediately go into high-paid jobs at the sharp end of local industry but people who, if they can establish a track record of turning up for work at 9 am, can be given the confidence to seek work actively. They may then be able to hold down a job—admittedly a less well-paid job, but nevertheless a well-paid and useful job in the community.

My concern is that TECs are not paying attention to the hard cases. Instead, they are creaming off the exotica, the exciting cases. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to offer an assurance that TECs will not ignore their responsibilities for the long-term unemployed, especially those who, sadly, left the education system with modest qualifications.

I hope that we can establish even more clearly than in the past that if someone employed within the Employment service or in a benefit office doubts that someone who is signing on for benefit is actively seeking work, he or she should be able to offer such a person a place in a training scheme. Obviously, employment training is very relevant here. A refusal to take up such a scheme would be clear and unambigious evidence that the unemployed person was not actively seeking work.

We have made considerable progress over the past few years. I remember the time when the old Manpower Services Commission did not want its schemes to be used as a means of testing whether someone was actively seeking work. In those days the test was availability for work. The commission said that it did not want reluctant recruits. It did not want people participating in its training schemes only because the alternative was loss of benefit. That is another classic example of the creaming-off problem. The MSC, for example, wanted those who were already well on their way to finding jobs.

A positive way in which we can help to deal with the problem that is posed by those who lose the will actively to seek work is to use Government training schemes on a selective basis to test whether individuals are actively seeking work and to ensure that if they are not, their bluff can be called through the offer of a place on a training scheme.

As I have a constituency engagement early this afternoon, I shall not be able to remain in the Chamber until the end of the debate. It is——

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: Of course.

Mr. Banks: I asked the hon. Gentleman to give way —I have listened carefully to his thoughtful speech— because if I manage to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall refer to him. He said that it is not the role of government to stimulate the labour market or to create employment. I think that he said that. He suggested that it is the role of an efficient labour market to provide jobs. Perhaps he will take the opportunity to explain why the Japanese have recently announced a $87 billion programme of public sector work to try to stimulate both their economy, which is in a much better state than ours, and the labour market generally.

Mr. Willetts: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention because it gives me the opportunity to clarify what I said earlier. Obviously I did not make the point sufficiently clear.

The Government have enormous responsibilities in terms of employment and the labour market. The Government's responsibility is, first, to ensure that there is the right economic framework. That means ensuring that the growth of total spending in the economy is neither unsustainably rapid nor negative. We now have growth of nominal GDP running at about 3 per cent.

Another responsibility of government is to ensure that the labour market works properly. That is why we need trade union law reform. We must ensure that people are better off in work than out of it. It is a responsibility which calls for supply-side reforms, which the Government pursued in the 1980s. I hope that they will continue pursuing them in the 1990s.

It is the question of Government intervention that causes me to part company with my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North. I do not think that the Government have a direct role to intervene in and run the labour market, and themselves to link idle hands and unmet needs by employing millions of people who would otherwise be unemployed. If the Government intervene in that way they will be nationalising the problem. It is, however, the Government's responsibility to make the labour market operate freely.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) referred in his intervention to the Japanese. It is true that the Japanese Government have produced a reflation package that is aimed at dealing with the problems of their economy. The hon. Gentleman says that the problems facing the Japanese economy are not as severe as those that face us. Actually, the collapse of property prices, asset prices and financial confidence in Japan is a more serious problem for the Japanese economy than that which faces our economy. In any event, in the autumn statement there is a set of measures which, I am confident, will bring economic growth next year.

If the Japanese are to succeed in their enormous programme of extra Government spending, they will do so only because of years of prudent control of both spending and borrowing. It is impossible for the Japanese Government to borrow for more than 10 years ahead. That is ruled out by the Japanese constitution. As a result, any Japanese Government who are faced with the problem of recession have the enormous advantage of having much less public sector debt than that of most other Governments. A lesson to be learnt from their reflation package is that when years are good we should run surpluses and pay off debts so that when years are bad there is some scope for the issuing of gilts. I am pleased to say that in these terms the British Government are in a much better position than that in which the American Government find themselves.

Mr. Tony Banks: I relish the opportunity of entering into a debate with the hon. Gentleman on some future date on the comparative states of the Japanese and British economies. Unfortunately, it is not possible to do that today, but I hope that the opportunity will present itself.

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, although Japanese property prices have fallen alarmingly, Japanese manufacturing capacity is so strong that the impact on the Japanese economy has been nothing like the impact of the fall of property prices in the United Kingdom? It is the underlying strength of manufacturing industry in Japan that places it in a much better position economically than that of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to the strength of Japanese manufacturing industry. Sadly, we cannot say that Britain's industrial performance in the post-war period matches that of Japan. If, however, we wish to learn lessons from the Japanese industrial performance, we must recognise the importance of having a large and vital small-business sector, and of the Government staying clear of detailed intervention in the labour market and rewarding innovation and entrepreneurship.

Many of the stories that we hear about the role of the Ministry of International Trade and Industry—MITI—and Japanese Governments in their country's economic growth are not borne out by the facts. The Japanese had a great plan for their car industry; there was to be one Japanese Government-sponsored car firm that would lead the Japanese industrial revival after the war. The entrepreneurial spirit of Japanese industrialists was such that they did not fall in with the grand MITI plan. Instead, several individuals built up their own car firms. They established a much more dynamic industry than would ever have been created had there been adherence to the original strategy. I do not believe the claim that Japanese manufacturing and industrial success has been derived from so-called industrial strategies. Many of the claims are put about by MITI. They are not, however, borne out by the real evidence of what actually happens in Japan.

Before the hon. Member for Newham, North-West intervened I was bringing my remarks to a conclusion. Many of my hon. Friends—there is a galaxy of talent on these Benches—have important contributions to make to the debate, which was initiated so wisely by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North. I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak in the debate.

11.28 am

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I congratulate the hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) on securing this debate on the work force—a debate which could last five hours. Had it not been for a mistake discovered in the Table Office, I would have introduced a motion today that would have lasted five hours as well. When the ballot names were called out, I, like most hon. Members, understood that my name had been called. I know that we are not supposed to name names, Madam Deputy Speaker, but I am sure that you will forgive me if I do so today. My name, Ray Powell, was called by the Speaker. I am not often successful in this place at catching the Chair's eye, perhaps because I am short and need to stand on a seat to be seen.

Be that as it may, it seems that the name Ralph Howell was called that day. I have listened to the tapes, and bad as my hearing is, the tape is clearly audible—I could not hear the name Ralph Howell being called. Six days later, and after I had been invited to introduce a motion this morning, the Clerks told me, five minutes before midnight, that they had made a mistake. Unfortunately, millions of pensioners had already been told in the intervening six days that I was going to initiate a debate on their plight and their fears—probably to last for five hours on a Friday. So they were all very disappointed, as were my staff, who had worked like the clappers to organise the debate.

I am given to understand that this is the only time the Table Office has ever made a mistake of this magnitude. Knowing how ultra-helpful and efficient its staff are, I accepted their explanation and went on to raise a point of order with Madam Speaker the following day. She kindly informed me that there had been a mistake; she apologised, and told me that I might be lucky in the raffle taking place a matter of seconds later.

I could have told the Clerks how to ensure that I won that raffle, but I could not get to them so to advise them. So once again, after 14 years, I have failed in my attempts to secure a debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Norfolk, North on being much luckier than I am. I listened to 49 minutes of his introductory speech——

Mr. Ralph Howell: I was in the House when the draw was announced, and I heard Madam Speaker call the ticket that I had just signed. I was in no doubt that my name had been called, and it is rather strange that there was any misunderstanding. I am extremely sorry that the hon. Gentleman lost so much time preparing his debate. I wondered why the Whips had still not told me how to proceed some days after my name was called. Perhaps that explains the delay.

Mr. Powell: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has explained his position. I feared that there had been some sort of ploy in the Table Office, prompted by the Government Whips. Just a week before, they had used strong-arm tactics, and I thought that they might be transferring their attentions from the dissidents to the Table Office—but I accept the hon. Gentleman's explanation.

Unfortunately, pensioners will not have a five-hour debate on their problems, their fears and their poverty——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The pensioners have done quite well so far, but I must remind the hon. Gentleman to address the subject of today's debate.

Mr. Powell: I was just coming to that.

I should like to tell the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) that, in the days when a Labour Government set up the Manpower Services Commission, the then Conservative Opposition strongly objected to it. Since 1979, when the Conservatives took office, there have been many changes in the schemes and organisations designed to find jobs for the unemployed. One hon. Member who is in his place today will well remember the Select Committee on Employment, on which I served some years ago. Like me, he will recall the many changes introduced by this Government. Many of those who have tried to run schemes to help the unemployed have run into difficulties.

The system of training and enterprise councils gives many people a licence to milk the unemployed and to profit from their difficulties. These vultures set up private schemes in my constituency to do just that. It is high time the Government took action to remove that licence from them. If we have money to spend on this grave problem, it should be spent on people who are out of work, not on those who profit from them.

In the past few weeks, the construction industry has issued a great deal of literature. Only yesterday, we heard that thousands are being made redundant in the cement-making and brick-making industries—yet we know for a fact that people in almost every constituency in the land are homeless. Some of them are homeless because they are out of work and cannot pay their mortgages, others because they can only afford to rent, but no local authority can build houses for tenants because of Government-imposed cuts in local government finance. As a result, construction workers are out of work and the homeless are not being housed.

I admire the hon. Member for Norfolk, North for studying the subject of workfare. I can well understand, too, why some of the people to whom he has spoken over the years have rejected his proposals. They probably found them rather bizarre. I would applaud any scheme that helps people who are out of work back into work——

Mr. Hawkins: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the main reason why people are homeless, especially in areas where his party is in control of local government, is that many Labour authorities have failed to refurbish their housing stock? If all the council housing stock that is not available for occupation were made so, the homelessness problem would be fairly well wiped out in most Labour authority areas.

Mr. Powell: I doubt that the hon. Gentleman's contribution or his analysis of the problem of the homeless is one to which I want to waste time responding. I invite the hon. Gentleman to my consitituency where, prior to the 1973-74 local government reorganisation, we had the largest rural authority housing association in the Pen-y-bont rural district, which built more houses in that area than were built anywhere else in the country. If the licence to sell people their council houses at a knockdown price had not been introduced and promoted by a Conservative Government, many more people on the housing waiting list today could be accommodated. That housing stock no longer belongs to the council but is privately owned.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to intervene?

Mr. Powell: Allow me to reply to the last intervention.

Lady Olga Maitland: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Would it not be correct to point out that the hon. Gentleman is talking about homelessness, not workfare?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Lady anticipated a point that was going through my mind.

Mr. Powell: Perhaps it would have been more proper, Madam Deputy Speaker, for the hon. Gentleman who intervened in my speech to be told that—rather than for me to be called to order for answering him.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman noticed that I did not do so, but I said that I was considering that point.

Mr. Powell: With all due respect, Madam Deputy Speaker, I was not taking the matter up with you, but was responding to the second intervention while replying to the first.

Perhaps we may move on from the problems of the homeless, although I could speak at some length, and remain in order, about the number of people in the construction industry who have been put out of work by Government policies—engineers, architects, and other technicians who have no jobs as a consequence of Government policy.

In 1979, I was elected to represent Ogmore, which at that time had an unemployment rate of 3·7 per cent. The population was 105,000, and the electorate was 83,000. Two and a half per cent. of those out of work were unemployable because they suffered from silicosis and pneumoconiosis and were genuinely unable to work. In addition, we accept that 1 per cent. of the population might not want to work even if it were made available —and I think that most of them voted Tory at the last election. Nevertheless, everyone, including the Government in the past, accept that 1 per cent. element.

Although that situation changed, some people in Maesteg in my constituency, the unemployed male population—consistent with what the hon. Member for Norfolk, North said about people being unemployed for 12 months—have been unemployed since 1983.

Lady Olga Maitland: Can the hon. Gentleman say whether they are actively seeking work?

Mr. Powell: I am given to understand that they are obliged actively to seek work if they are to receive unemployment benefit. They are told by the DSS officer that if they do not actively seek work, they will not receive unemployment benefits. They are often invited to consider jobs that do not relate at all to their qualifications, but they are compelled to do so. Therefore, they are continually looking for work.

In 1981-82, the Government decided to close several collieries in my constituency, which meant putting 7,000 miners and many supporting workers out of work. The Government also declared redundancy for 12,000 workers when they started shedding workers at the Margam steelworks. In the course of 12 months, 7,000 miners, 12,000 steel workers, and 1,000 others were made redundant in my constituency.

In 1983, the last remaining colliery—St. John's—which employed 7,800 miners, was involved in the miners' strike and threatened with closure. Within a matter of months after that strike, it was closed.

It is no use the Government funding factories to produce dolls' eyes or teddy bears, when the unemployed are industrial workers used to a colliery. We want more than money and that kind of investment—we want community programmes of the kind introduced by a Conservative Government in 1982-83. Because of the extent of unemployment in my constituency when that scheme was devised, jointly with a trade union and others we formed an organisation named CATO—Community Activities and Training in Ogmore—to help produce jobs for the unemployed under the community programme.

That scheme lasted 10 years, until the introduction of Mid Glamorgan TEC, when it was refused further funding because it was not a private organisation run for profit, but instead allowed industrialists to contribute in the way that they wanted.

Lady Olga Maitland: Can the hon. Gentleman explain what happened to the 20,000 who were made redundant? Of course that was a great tragedy, but the Government introduced many training schemes. Did those people take up those schemes, and what occupations do they have today?

Mr. Powell: I was on that very point. I was talking about the CATO training scheme, which, under the community programme, had 650 trainees. We took the lease of a redundant hospital at Blackmill and created a day centre for the elderly, where caterers were trained to produce the midday meals not only of the elderly at that centre but of those who were brought to it just to have a day meal.

We created also a building programme for bricklayers, carpenters, plasterers, plumbers and other tradesmen. We trained not only carers for the elderly but caterers and building trade workers. A multifarious training programme was undertaken to help the elderly in particular to care for themselves in their own homes.

The current proposals for employing people in workfare is bizarre. In the CATO programme, the section for the young was organised at training workshops in Llynfi in Maesteg. In that workshop we had trained 280 of the young people when a Minister visited us. I forget the Minister's constituency, and his name, but I remember that he was involved in a fracas with a taxi driver at the Tory party conference. His successor as the Under-Secretary of State for Employment, who is in the Chamber, will know to whom I am referring.

That Minister visited the Llynfi training workshop to open a new section. He was told by the management and the staff—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) is reminding me that the Minister concerned was the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls)—so now we all know who I am talking about.

The management and those involved with training the 280 young people on the 12-month course had changed it to a two-year course; there was a 12-month extension. The Minister was told that 95 per cent. of the previous group of trained young people aged 18 had places in employment before they left their training at Llynfi. The Minister said that he thought that the youth training in his constituency was good, but that it could not find jobs for more than 60 per cent. of the trained young people.

CATO's objective was not only to train young people but to contact local industrialists who were prepared to offer them jobs when they had completed their courses. It is important that people in training do not find that they have served a period of apprenticeship only to find themselves without a job at the end.

I can speak with the benefit of some experience, having chaired CATO, and spent 10 years organising training for unemployed people. That training was essential in Ogmore, because of the massive unemployment created over a three-year period. I doubt whether we shall ever return to the position that we enjoyed in 1979, with a mere 3·7 per cent of people unemployed, most of whom were unemployable.

The time has come for a new method of audit for the present system of Government training schemes. I know that the Comptroller and Auditor General told the chairman of all the TECs last November that they were personally responsible for ensuring that the money was spent properly. But there is also a need for further careful examination—especially of the Mid Glamorgan TEC, which I believe has some explaining to do about where its money is spent. Who gets the profit from the Government grant aid?

If the Government continually cut the funds available for training schemes, they will continue to make life even more difficult for those who genuinely want to train people. Organisations such as Mid Glamorgan county council are doing a worthwhile job——

Lady Olga Maitland rose——

Mr. Powell: Let me finish my sentence.

Organisations such as Mid Glamorgan county council are doing a worthwhile job training the work force, so they should be afforded the funding, or local government funding should be extended to help them to assist the unemployed.

Lady Olga Maitland: I am sorry to intervene yet again, but while the hon. Gentleman is talking about the sum which the Government are providing for training schemes, does he not agree that it was made clear in the autumn statement that the Government were altering the arrangements for such schemes, rather than making reductions? That is an important distinction.

Mr. Powell: With all due respect, I am beginning to wonder who is making this speech—the hon. Lady or myself. Nevertheless, I accept her intervention. She talks about the Chancellor's suggestion about how to tackle the problem of funding training, but we have had so many changes over so many years that the people involved in training the work force in this country have become more and more disillusioned. People who have devoted their whole careers to training now find themselves not only out of work but with little chance of finding themselves another job in training.

Funding should be made genuinely available—not, I repeat, for those who have invested money to make public limited companies out of the training schemes, but for people who are training with funding from Government and other public sources. If that happened, and the Government did not allow people to make any profit out of it, the money might be well spent. But if the money is given to those who have set up plcs to run TECs, it will go back to the profiteers rather than helping unemployed people.

We talk about trying to get jobs for the unemployed, but very few Conservative Members would talk about the poverty and degradation of families of people who are made unemployed. But those who represent constituencies such as mine travel around the valleys seeing miners, who have worked for 30 and 40 years in the collieries, out of work at 50. They are pushed on to the dole, with no chance of another job in another colliery, because there are no collieries in Wales left to which they could travel to work.

After 40 years in the coal mines, they find themselves without a job. At 50, they have no chance of getting a job, of getting out of the house and out of their wives' way. That causes misery. At 55, having worked all their lives to provide for their families, to buy their homes and the contents of their homes, they find that they are pushed out of work, with no chance of another job. Moreover, their sons and daughters are in a similar predicament; having gained degrees, they come back home to look for work and find that they cannot get jobs either.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Powell: I was in full flight then, but I will give way.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that. Is it not precisely out of care for families with unemployed members that my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) wishes to introduce a scheme of workfare—to provide people with work if they want it?

Mr. Powell: I wish the hon. Member for Norfolk, North well in any sort of scheme that will provide jobs for people who are out of work, because I see the misery that unemployment creates. People may be trained as consultants, and they may have spent 10, 15 or 20 years becoming consultants. People can even become brain specialists, and they still find themselves without jobs in the national health service. Some people have devoted their lives to the national health service, and now they find themselves redundant. If the Government go ahead with their plans, we may find that many more trained and qualified people in the London area are unemployed. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) could say a lot more about the people whom the Government intend to make unemployed in the foreseeable future.

Lady Olga Maitland: The hon. Gentleman spoke about people moving out of their jobs. It is interesting to see that the culture has now changed. People recognise that, although they have been in one career for 20 years, it does not mean that they have to stay in that career for the rest of their lives.

Does the hon. Gentleman see any comparison between the position in his constituency and the coal mines that closed in Scotland? The middle-aged generation in Scotland have now been successfully retrained for the computer industry to such an extent that there is now an area known as Silicon Glen between Edinburgh and Glasgow.

Mr. Powell: I am pleased that people in Scotland are getting jobs. I was talking about 7,000 miners and 12,000 steel workers being put out of work in one constituency within 18 months. If those 20,000 people were retrained in the computer industry, they would supply the whole industrial force for that industry. I very much doubt whether such retraining would be a solution in my constituency although it has happened in Scotland.

The Government should set their sights on trying to solve the problem of the unemployed. The points of order at 11 am today dealt with further mass redundancies. The Government do not solve the problem. I rarely read the Financial Times. I do not read it to find out whether my stocks and shares are going up or down because I do not have any. The headline today in the Financial Times is "Industry sheds 10,000 jobs." I read my local paper, the Western Mail, to see whether I have been quoted. I rarely have been. Its headline reads: "Black day as 9,000 lose jobs in Wales". Unemployment in Wales has increased by 150 per cent. since the Government came to office.

It is no good the Government saying that they have run down the steelworks because there was over-employment. I accept that there may have been some over-employment in the steel industry, but the seven pits in my constituency were closed when there was still a demand for coal.

We recently debated the Government's bizarre proposal to close 31 pits. As I have been involved in the mining industry and as I represent a mining constituency, I attended the debate throughout. My father was a miner, and I well understand the heartache of miners who may lose their jobs if the 31 collieries are closed. Some 30,000 more jobs may be lost.

The energy in those mines would be sealed in, and it would be difficult for future generations to tap it. Mining engineers have told me that, when collieries are capped, gas and water make it practically impossible and economically unwise for future generations to recover the energy resources underground. Twenty-one pits are under review and will be the subject of the inquiry, and 10 are to be closed—so much for the Government's promises in that debate. I feel for the miners and their communities because, over the past 30 years, my people have suffered. There is no chance of their finding work in my area.

I am a senior sponsored member of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. The proposals on shopping could lead to an increase in part-time workers. I wonder whether the hon. Member for Norfolk, North can enlighten me on the following point. At present, some people work only on Sundays. They are employed part-time to work in shops that are open illegally. Can such people be considered legally employed when the shop in which they work is breaking the law by being open? Such an employer may be small or large. Such an employer may be Tesco or Sainsbury.

If the Minister for Industry, the right hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Sainsbury), had been here today, he might have told us, because of his family connections, whether Sainsbury provides the proper rate of pay for workers on Sundays. Such companies are not legally obliged to pay the recognised rate because it is illegal to trade on Sunday. Companies could be paying wages below those legally required in the present system.

This week, the Government have proposed to do away with the wages councils which protect the underpaid and the under-privileged, including the low-paid shop workers. There will be no protection for them. Is the hon. Member for Norfolk, North prepared to ensure that, under his proposals, workers would be protected by councils similar to the wages councils?

Lady Olga Maitland: The hon. Gentleman referred to wages councils. I get the impression that, in trying to support a minimum wage for Sunday workers, the hon. Gentleman is trying to deny other people the chance of getting work. Surely that is not consistent with his desire to get as much work as possible for as many people as possible.

Mr. Powell: I take the hon. Lady's point. A person may be obliged to work on a Sunday and may be getting a Sunday rate at a store that is legally open under the Shops Act 1950. Shops in seaside resorts are among such shops. I am not talking about shops that may open if the Government's proposals are accepted. Some people may be able to work only on a Sunday and only in a shop that is open illegally. They have no legal protection when they go to work, because the shop should not be open.

Mr. McLoughlin: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that wages councils do not set rates of pay for Sunday work?

Mr. Powell: That may be so. I know the history of this Government since 1979. Some workers were protected under previous wages councils which were taken out of the system in 1979, in 1982 and in 1985. The Government have reduced the number of wages councils three times. Most of the councils protected poorly paid people, including those in the shopworkers' union, which I represent as its senior sponsored Member. During the past 13 years, the extent of the protection afforded by the wages councils system has diminished. I cannot understand why there is a need to dispense entirely with that protection.

I have referred to shopworkers, although not at great length or in great detail. I had intended, Madam Deputy Speaker, to raise a point of order with you at 11 o'clock, but I could see that you were inundated, and I felt that, if I did so, I might not catch your eye immediately after the debate resumed. I wonder whether you will take the point on board now. I was going to ask whether a Minister was to make a statement about the Government's intentions and proposals on Sunday trading.

We read about the proposals in the Evening Standard and elsewhere in the press, and for six weeks we have been promised a statement. It is suggested that the Government will show us three different Bills and ask hon. Members to toss a coin to decide which one should be introduced. The details have not yet been disclosed to us, however. In the run-up to Christmas, the Minister has a responsibility to let shopworkers know whether the shops in which they work will be allowed to open on the Sunday before Christmas with the blessing of the Home Secretary, or whether they will be made to close under the Shops Act 1950. Like 4 million others, those people are seeking work. They are prepared to undertake menial tasks and will even go so far as to work on Sunday at very low wages, because they need the additional income.

I have described the problems in my constituency. I am eager to welcome to my constituency hon. Members who think that they have problems, and to show them the dereliction that has been wrought there by 13 years of Tory Government. I will take such hon. Members to the homes of people who have been made unemployed and show them the meanness of monetarism and the aggravating effect that it has had on a good work force. In short, I will show them the result of 13 years of Tory policy, and why the Government are in such an economic and industrial mess.

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor and Maidenhead): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) on securing the debate. He spoke of his work, which has extended over many years, as a cockshy. I beg to disagree with him. His Adam Smith Institute text of 1991, entitled "Why Not Work?" is no cockshy; it is the locus classicus of all those interested in the work force, and for many years to come it will provide the starting point for serious consideration of the subject.

Workfare is a difficult word, prone to many different interpretations. I shall use it in the broadest sense. In that broadest sense, workfare has interested many Conservative Members in recent years. That is, in part, a tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North. Two former Members of the House who have now been translated to the other place have recently written about it. In his "Unfinished Business", Lord Tebbit adopts almost precisely the scheme that my hon. Friend proposes, and according to the press, workfare is also mentioned in Lord Lawson's memoirs—although I must say that, in that substantial book of more than 1,000 pages, I have not yet been able to find the section in which he is said to recommend workfare. The President of the Board of Trade has also written fluently on the subject, from a slightly different point of view. It is a subject of great interest, but one involving problems of definition. We must accept that, for the moment, the broad definition will suffice.

There are many different types of workfare in existence throughout the world. The example of America has again been cited today. The American system is very piecemeal: in some areas it is highly developed and in others it is fairly crude. I am sure that we will hear about Sweden which has a highly involved and expensive system. In considering Sweden, we must bear in mind the difficulties into which the Swedish economy has run in recent years and weigh up workfare as part of the Swedish Government's policy as a whole.

In the past my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North has referred to Switzerland, which is an interesting case. Switzerland has a programme that runs along similar lines, although I am sure that my hon. Friend would agree that Switzerland is a very particular country which goes its own way and cannot afford us a useful example. Moreover, as my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) said, we should concentrate on our own case.

The central matter that we are discussing is unemployment. It is to the credit of my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North that he has managed to change the question from "Why work?" to "Why not work?". He has placed greater emphasis on work than on unemployment. He gives us no hand-wringing, only progressive ideas for the future.

Unemployment is a blight on lives—on individuals, families, the community and on the whole national spirit. There was a time when unemployment was a very severe blight. One has only to think back to the last century and the novels of Charles Dickens. At that time, there were two sorts of unemployment—the unemployment of young men who lounged about on sofas wondering how best to spend their patrimony, and the shocking unemployment of the almost utterly dispossessed at the edge of the community who had little opportunity to better their conditions.

In more modern times—and this is relevant to workforce—the state has taken a much more active role in providing work for people and benefits for those who cannot work. The starting point has been Beveridge's famous report "Social Insurance and Allied Services", which appeared in 1942. Lord Tebbit, that distinguished former Secretary of State for Employment, writes:

> "those who uphold the doctrines of Beveridge are remarkably selective in their reading of his work."

It seems to me that there were two great principles in Beveridge's work. He spoke of an attack on want, but went on to say:

> "Want is only one of the five giants on the road of reconstruction and in some ways the easiest to attack. The others are Disease, Ignorance, Squalor and Idleness."

The second central theme of the report is this:

> "Social security must be achieved by co-operation between the state and the individual. The state should offer security for service and contribution, not stifle incentive, opportunity, responsibility."

It is clear from those passages that Beveridge understood the possibility of what we now call the dependency trap coming into existence. I think that Beveridge thought that his fellow country men were much sturdier individuals than we think our country men to be today. He was offering people the opportunity to make a start for themselves, but he was not denying them the all-important self-respect and responsibility that all individuals need.

That report contained the beginnings of the relationship between the individual and the state, which has been called the reasonable bargain. There are obligations—of the state towards the unemployed, but also of the unemployed towards the state. Human society has obligations towards the individual and the individual has obligations towards human society. That is one of the key features of the workfare scheme. It is also part of the great traditions that inform western society—for example, the Judaeo-Christian tradition, but also the traditions of other religions.

I want to quote from St. Paul—from Norman Tebbit to St. Paul is a great distance—who wrote to the people of Thessalonia that,

> "if any would not work, neither should he eat. For we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busy bodies."

I like the idea of busy-bodies meddling—it reminds me of the Liberal and Labour local government politicians in my constituency.

From the roots of that letter from St. Paul derive not only the idea that people have a responsibility towards the society of which they are a member, and vice versa, but the whole idea of the dignity of work. In the last century, at the time of the pre-Raphaelites, work was dignified in art and in literature. Indeed, the Church of England used to have almost a theology of work. People would regard work as an essential part of human dignity. Now I fear, the more negative aspects of the modern world are being emphasised by leading figures in our society.

It is important to realise that my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North is, in important part, trying to re-establish the important concept that is deeply rooted in our traditions—that people should work and that they should be given the opportunity to work. They will respond to that opportunity because work, in itself, has moral value. Essentially, it is better and kinder for people to be doing something than to become used to doing nothing. Workfare, in its broad sense, offers the prospect of work and the dignity that goes with it.

We should not say that, for example, tree planting, the cleaning of canals, environmental work reclaiming wastelands or helping the handicapped and the elderly is not fit work—it is fit and important work which should be done be people throughout the country. As my hon. Friend said, his proposal is not a job-creating scheme because there is plenty of work that needs to be done.

If my hon. Friend's scheme were to be implemented it would help to ease the great fear of unemployment. People in my constituency are experiencing unemployment for the first time. When they first went into work they never thought that they would find themselves in that position. Even those who are not unemployed generally know of people in their families or living in their streets who are in that position. We must recognise that the fear of unemployment has spread throughout the country and throughout all social classes. That fear could be alleviated if people knew that if they lost their jobs there would still be something useful for them to do and they would not simply be facing acres of empty space.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman says that people in his constituency are in fear of unemployment. Knowing his constituency as I do, and knowing that it includes Windsor castle, can he say whether anybody at Windsor castle shares that fear?

Mr. Trend: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not expect me to deal with that point.

Workfare offers the state a shift to, as they say in Sweden, the employment principle. I warmly welcome that. It offers a shift away from financing unemployment to finding employment. For the individual, it offers the dignity that goes with having useful work to do and it offers the opportunity to get something for something, rather than something for nothing.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant spoke about the new age travellers who were a prominent part of our summer. I have no objection to people travelling around the countryside. Before the war Vaughan Williams used to do that. No doubt he walked in fields, sat down on a farmer's land and ate a sandwich. Perhaps he listened to a lark ascending and thought, "That's a good idea." But I object to people who despoil the countryside, perhaps ruining archaeological remains, breaking the law, outrageously camping on private property—and then expecting me to pay for it.

There is a great deal of support outside the House for the concept that I shall call reciprocal obligations. Full Employment UK published a report resulting from two consultations in my constituency at St. George's house, which is part of the castle. It is called "A New Policy Framework for Unemployed Adults" and it was published last year. It includes many points and it is another way of viewing the general concept of what we are discussing today. One point that it makes is that there should be automatic referral to a new community benefit programme. I understand that "community benefit" is the phrase used by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade when he writes about the matter.

The report suggests that there should be a last resort sector for those who have either been failed by the system or have themselves failed the system. The report contains an open-ended obligation. Some do not think that that is the right approach. We must accept that there are different approaches, and one of the key elements that distinguishes them is when or whether unemployment benefit should be stopped. That is a hard subject to discuss, but it must be faced. It is probably an essential part of the classic workfare theory—if I may call it that—that we must take seriously the prospect of stopping benefits at a certain point. If that were to be the case, in return—as part of the reciprocal obligations—the state would have to take seriously the level at which it funded the workfare programme.

It is very much to the credit of my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North that he is exceedingly realistic in his excellent pamphlet on that point. All schemes that come before the House have to be tested for the costs that they would incur. I have some anxieties that even my hon. Friend's staged approach to introducing a full workfare system would incur considerable costs.

I have some other minor anxieties about my hon. Friend's scheme. One is that if a minimum income of £100 a week is established, it may in time become seen as a minimum wage—the floor below which people would believe that they should not fall. There is a minimum income in the present structure of benefits, below which people cannot fall, but there is a danger that, as people are used to the present system, they will regard the new system as a doubling of the minimum wage.

Mr. Ralph Howell: As my hon. Friend acknowledged, a minimum income operates for every individual in the country. Every individual can have support. That counters my hon. Friend's concern about the £100 being regarded as a minimum wage.

Mr. Trend: I am grateful for that clarification.

Another of my anxieties is that in some circumstances the workfare scheme could become part of what one might call the Mussolini approach to politics—the building of autostrada and the digging of holes and filling them in. It is a feature of totalitarian Governments throughout the world this century—one thinks of Mao's China or Stalin's Soviet Union—that they send work gangs out simply to keep them out of what the Government of those countries regard as mischief.

I do not sugest that my hon. Friend's programme of workfare has any features that could develop into the Mussolini approach. However, in a general sense, caution is needed in a free society not to place too many obligations on people or restrict their freedom of choice. From reading my hon. Friend's pamphlet closely, I know that his scheme is not a cheap labour scheme. In the pamphlet he made an important point that he did not mention today. His scheme would be voluntary. We should emphasise that.

I hope that I have expressed great support for the idea of workfare. It is valuable and should be examined further. I wish to deal with the employment and social security aspects of the present position. I welcomed the announcement made by the Department of Employment after the autumn statement this year that all people who have been unemployed for a year and do not take up other offers of help will be required to attend a job plan workshop. That is a step in the right direction. After people have been unemployed for a certain length of time, stock will be taken of their position and they will be given advice. It will be a moment to take tough decisions on difficult cases.

The announcement contained another important element. The training for work programme will replace the existing employment training and employment action programmes. It will be delivered through the training and enterprise councils. It is expected that 320,000 adults next year will be offered an opportunity to improve and update skills and learn new skills.

> "or do work of benefit to the local community."

The programme is still in its early stages. It refers back to schemes that the Government have run in past years. It is important that in the context of the training for work programme, we should consider in greater depth useful work that might be done by people who are unemployed.

The present social security position is interesting. On 12 November my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security made a statement following the autumn statement. It contained another welcome announcement. Regulations are to be laid to withdraw income support from those who are not even actively seeking work. My right hon. Friend made those remarks in the context of fraud. He hoped that savings of about £1 billion each year would be made when his proposals had been put into action.

I see the Secretary of State's announcement in the context of a new package that enshrines many of the concepts of workfare. The future might hold an arrangement whereby the unemployed are at least offered training or socially useful work. They should not be paid to do nothing. They should be given a basic-plus for their work. However, payment should be cut off for some people in certain circumstances. We should approach the problem from two ends, and if we did so our approach would have many of the characteristics of workfare.

The concept of workfare has a strong appeal. If I have achieved anything, I hope that I have stressed that the ideas of my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North have an important moral purpose. I appreciate the practical difficulties in such a scheme, and he has been realistic about them. The appeal of the idea is that it offers people the dignity of work and self-respect and gives the state a chance to finance employment and not unemployment. The difficulties are such that, even if we were to move transitionally towards workfare, we probably would not start from the motion. We must find a way to include the advantages of the workfare scheme in Government policy.

Cost is the second difficulty, and it would be almost irresponsible of the Government to move to what one might call the harder aspects of workfare, unless they were prepared to make the money available to ensure that the system worked properly.

The Government's proposals will bring greater discipline and precision to what we mean by the reasonable bargain between the individual and the state. I urge them to keep the essentials of the proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North in the front of their minds, because there is so much to be recommended in them.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I remember Sir Alan Glyn, the predecessor of the hon. Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Mr. Trend). As Dr. Glyn, he was regarded with great affection in the House; we all have a fund of Dr. Glyn stories. I used to get on well with him, but I had one abiding fear—I had collapsed in the House, and was coming round to consciousness to be greeted by the vision of Dr. Glyn, about to descend on me to give me the kiss of life—not a pretty thought; but he was a man for whom the House had great regard.

The hon. Member for Windsor and Maidenhead spoke for some time about Beveridge, but he did not describe some of the things that Beveridge meant to us and to the country. Beveridge was an interventionist, and I find it almost inconceivable, given his interventionist stance, to hear him quoted approvingly by Conservative Members of Parliament, especially those from the remaining Thatcherite wing of the party.

I made notes as the hon. Member for Windsor and Maidenhead spoke. Beveridge saw the state as enabler. He anticipated and looked forward to full employment and that is the biggest difference between Beveridge and Conservative Members—and some Opposition Members. In recent years, some people have accepted that full employment is not achievable in economic or political terms, whereas it used to be one of the areas of consensus between the two major parties; that objective was set out in our respective election manifestos.

There also used to be competition on housing between the two parties—both in government and in opposition. They used to say, "We built more houses than you did." I liked that argument—it was like an auction—and I would like both parties, whether in government or in opposition, to list the achievement of full employment and the building of homes as programmes in their manifestos. The two are inextricably linked.

Mr. Ralph Howell: It seems that we are now having a bit of an auction as to who has the greater regard for Beveridge.

Surely the hon. Gentleman must appreciate that one of the cornerstones of Beveridge's proposals for the unemployed was that unemployment benefit could not be paid indefinitely and that, after either three months or six months, that benefit should cease and work be offered. If a young person did not have a job, he was offered training, but he was never encouraged to take benefit alone.

Mr. Banks: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says, but he should remember what I said earlier—that theory works much better when full employment is the objective. Given the present economic situation, the hon. Gentleman has put forward not an alternative to full employment but a camouflage for unemployment.

If real jobs were on offer, the situation might be different. I am not talking about the £2·50-an-hour jobs of which the hon. Gentleman spoke. It is totally unacceptable for people to receive such an hourly rate, but many people currently exist on such pay. If there were genuine full employment and genuine jobs available, I would have great sympathy for the hon. Gentleman's proposals for those people who refused a proper job and did not take advantage of the training they had received at the expense of the state. We are not in such a situation today.

Mr. Ralph Howell: The hon. Gentleman is totally out of touch. When this matter is discussed in the media, I get many letters from unemployed people who are desperate to take up the £2·50-an-hour jobs that I have suggested. Whenever this matter has been discussed at election time in my constituency, my constituents have criticised me and said, "You have been talking about this for years. Why on earth can we not have those jobs that you have suggested?"

If the Beveridge proposals were in operation today, we would not be worried about the 2·9 million people who are unemployed, because fewer than 900,000 people would be unemployed for more than three months. In fact, there would not be as many unemployed people as that had we put the Beveridge report into practice in full in 1948.

Mr. Banks: A combination of Keynes and Beveridge would be ideal, but that does not take into account current circumstances. The hon. Gentleman is seeking to rewrite the Beveridge report to suit the 1990s, when that report was written in the 1940s and dealt with a completely different situation. The world has moved on, but not to the benefit of working-class people in terms of job availability and the way in which they are treated by the state.

The hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) is trying to cover up the economic failings of the Government with a scheme that might be okay if we had a genuine, interventionist, Keynesian Government and the prospect of full employment, but that is not the case.

I listened very carefully to what the hon. Gentleman said. I respect his views, because he has been proven right in this House on more than one occasion. He likes to give the impression of being a simple farmer from Norfolk, but he is anything but that. Quite a long time ago, the hon. Gentleman suggested replacing, or paying for, poll tax with VAT. Later, the Government were looking for a way out of an appalling mess into which they had got themselves, and produced a variant of the hon. Gentleman's suggestion.

I feel sure that what the hon. Gentleman is now talking about is on the cards, especially with the present Government in power. I say that because they have nowhere else to go. Unemployment is so high in Britain that it is pushing up the public sector borrowing requirement to the point at which they will have deal with it directly in terms of benefits.

Conservative Members may say that that has not happened yet, even though it had been anticipated. That is true, and I agree that many Opposition Members anticipated that something would be said in the autumn statement about not increasing the range of benefits in line with inflation. The Chancellor led us to believe that he might say something along those lines, but then adroitly drew back so that his supporters could cheer. But they are cheering temporarily, because there is almost an imperative in Government economic policy to go down that road.

I was pulled up by your predecessor in the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for having one of my apoplectic fits in a sedentary position. Knowing what a hard man you are, I am glad you were not in the Chair at the time; had you been, I doubt whether I would have been called to take part in the debate. I confess that I got angry as I heard from Conservative Members the sort of terminology one gets used to hearing from them—about the dependency culture and a "something for nothing" society. I recall the Secretary of State for Social Security saying much the same at the Conservative party conference and receiving cheap cheers from the blue-rinsed and red-necked hordes.

I am referring to the sort of terminology that really annoys my hon. Friends and me. When Tories talk about a "something for nothing" society, they are really talking about people on income support, unemployment and housing benefit and so on. They never seem to talk about the real parasites who live in our society and operate in the economy. I refer to the currency and commodity speculators and those who did so much damage to the Government's economic policy on black Wednesday, when we were forced to take the pound out of the exchange rate mechanism. Those are the real "something for nothing" merchants: the people who make money out of money and who cause or exacerbate economic crises.

They could not have succeeded as they did on black Wednesday if the British economy had not been so structurally and fundamentally weak. Speculators will always try a run against currencies—they did it in France a little later—but so long as the underlying economy is strong, they cannot succeed. The knew how weak the British economy was. I have no time for them. They are the "something for nothing" merchants with whom I would deal, and it is time for the Government to recognise the damage that they inflict on economic policy. The Government should produce a Europewide method of dealing with those parasites.

Mr. Gorst: May I help the hon. Gentleman to return to the bipartisan benevolence which I know exists as a strain in his political personality? Will he give us the benefit not so much of his distaste for the present Government's actions as an indication of where he believes the scheme has any merit, if he believes it has? If he finds flaws in it, perhaps he will constructively offer advice about how it might be made more palatable to him.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman asks the question in a gentle way, and I assure him that I have a fund of good advice for Conservative Members, although I doubt they would heed any of it. I shall make some suggestions later. This is probably not the sort of debate in which to go into the intricacies of a proposal that at present I consider to be inappropriate.

The proposal of the hon. Member for Norfolk, North is, as the motion says,

> "That this House recognises that unemployment is nearly three million and rising; considers that unemployment is wasteful and soul destroying".

The real issue is about unemployment, so I shall deal with why this country has such high unemployment and what we should do about it. I might find the hon. Gentleman's scheme attractive if people looking for work could contemplate full employment, or as near as one can get to full employment. There is no such thing as full employment, because there will always be people in the process of changing jobs or being retrained.

Insufficient retraining is done in this country. If we look at other European countries we see how many times people are retrained during the course of a productive economic life. It does not happen like that in this country.

Yesterday I was giving out prizes at Sarah Bornell's school—an excellent girls' school in Newham—and discussing the situation that used to exist when I was at school and when the hon. Member for Norfolk, North and other Conservative Members were at school. We had options and could choose what job we wanted to go for. At university, too, different careers were open to us, and the world was full of far greater promise than it is now.

Now, all we can offer people is, if not a lifetime on the dole, certainly the prospect of going immediately from school, college or university on to the dole and then drawing benefit. People do not have the opportunity to decide which area of economic activity they want to enter and how they want to be trained.

Mr. Ralph Howell: It is difficult to follow the hon. Gentleman's argument. This country and the whole world have a problem, but he simply describes what it was like so many years ago. It must be right to address the problem and to find a way to solve it. If my proposals are not acceptable, where are his proposals?

Mr. Banks: I hope to get on to the many proposals I have in the next hour or so. I am not just reminiscing for the sake of it, although old men tend to do so these days.

I often hear Conservative Members talking about how bad things were when the Labour Government had to call in the International Monetary Fund because of economic problems, so I took the precaution of going to the Library for a set of statistics comparing today with 1976-77. They are very interesting. It is not that long ago—certainly well within the memory of the hon. Member for Norfolk, North. When the IMF was called in, the unemployment rate was 4·3 per cent.; it is now 10 per cent. and rising. In June 1976, 7 million people were employed in manufacturing industry; in June 1992, there were 4·4 million.

Unemployment has been caused by the fact that manufacturing industry has been decimated by the Conservative Government's policies. The hon. Member for Norfolk, North may say, "Hang on, this recession is all over Europe." That may be so now, but we have been in a recession for far longer than any other European country, and unemployment is still rising faster here than in any other of our Community partners. They are just entering a recession, whereas we have been in one and shall now go from recession into slump. One has only to look at this morning's newspapers. The Times headlines say: "British Rail axes 5,000 on black day for jobs". The Guardian says: "10,000 hit in swathe of job cuts". That is what is going on in this country and the hon. Gentleman should deal with the failure of his Government's economic policies, rather than looking around at ways of sticking plaster and a few bits of gum over the real problem of unemployment.

Mr. Nirj Joseph Deva (Brentford and Isleworth): The hon. Gentleman correctly talked about the IMF having to be called in, but does he agree that it had to be called in because the then Labour Government had totally mismanaged the economy?

Mr. Banks: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman something else. The statistics show that things were immeasurably better in 1976-77 than they are in the 1992-93 tax year. Between—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) jumps up and down like a demented jack-in-the-box. I shall give way to her in a moment.

Since 1979-80, the Government have had the benefit of no less than £110 billion-worth of receipts from North sea oil and gas. That is the patrimony that has been squandered by the Government. We have experienced economic failure when we were the only country in Europe, other than Norway, that was entirely energy-independent. To have received £110 billion and to have wasted those moneys is criminal.

Mr. McLoughlin: Was it by virtue of the hon. Gentleman's support for the autumn statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Opposition did not vote against it yesterday? My right hon. Friend has done an incredible job in protecting public investment, whereas the Labour Government slashed capital spending.

Mr. Banks: I do not think that the Minister can draw any great comfort from cock-up theory of history. Had there been a reliable and experienced Whip such as myself on duty last night, the cock-up would not have occurred. In the end, a Division would not have swayed the Government from their position. It was a slightly unfortunate accident, but, in comparison with the Government's breathtaking economic incompetence, it was a fairly minor matter.

Lady Olga Maitland: The hon. Gentleman has referred to the economy in the 1970s. The Labour party lost the 1979 general election because of the disastrous state of the economy at that time, and a Labour Government will never be re-elected.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Lady has made an extremely cerebral point in a characteristic fashion. In politics, the word "never" is not one which she or anyone else should use. In the interests of greater accuracy, as we say in the House, I shall send the hon. Lady a copy of the letter that I received from the Library. I would not want her arguments spoilt by having the facts in front of her, but if she reads the letter she will learn how better things were in 1976 than they are now.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: As for accuracy, it is nonsense to say that £110 billion has been squandered by the Government. How many new road schemes, new schools and hospitals and other forms of public investment have there been over the past 12 years?

Mr. Banks: It is indeed inaccurate to say £110 million. It is £110 billion.

So much more could have been done. If any of us had received a comparable sum—I am not talking about billions of pounds—we would have invested it with care. Instead, North sea oil revenues and capital receipts from the privatisation of nationalised industries have been used to keep people on the dole. Every person who is unemployed costs the country about £9,000 in terms of benefit and lost taxation. That is our money, not the Government's. It belongs to us all, and I want my money to be spent wisely, not squandered.

There is a practical solution to the problem we face. A good investment is to get people back to work. When they are at work, there is an immediate gain, because it is not necessary to pay them benefits. If they have real jobs and earn a decent wage, they can go out and spend some of their money. That should be fairly simple, even for the hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The hon. Gentleman misrepresents me—I said £110 billion, not million. If he does not believe that investment in schools, roads and hospitals is investment in our nation, I do not know what is. Will he tell us one policy of his that would enable us to achieve the full employment that he is talking about?

Mr. Banks: I can think of many. It is all a question of investment. Some economists recently wrote in an article in the Financial Times that, when it comes to worthwhile investment, it does not matter where the money comes from. A good investment is as good for public as for private money. It is the ideological fixation of the Conservatives that prevents them from realising that.

I want my money spent wisely and invested properly. The Chancellor failed in the autumn statement to say anything constructive about the £5·1 billion-worth of accumulated capital receipts that local authorities hold from the sale of council houses. He did say that they can use 100 per cent. of those receipts from now on. This is a bad time to be selling property; why not use the accumulated receipts to create work? Linking our earlier arguments, that would also do something about homelessness.

Large numbers of people living in sub-standard accommodation, private and public, and many others are homeless. There are also unemployed construction workers. One does not need a PhD in economics to realise that these factors should be brought together to solve a number of problems——

Lady Olga Maitland rose——

Mr. Banks: One problem that cannot be solved is the agitation of the hon. Lady, to whom I give way yet again.

Lady Olga Maitland: The hon. Gentleman has spoken of homelessness in his constituency. We all know that thousands of people are living in sub-standard accommodation or are homeless in his constituency because its left-wing-controlled Labour authority is so hopelessly inefficient that it squanders money and refuses to go in for joint venture schemes which would provide homes and stimulate the economy——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. We are getting beyond the scope of the motion now.

Mr. Banks: I will relate my remarks to the motion, which is about unemployment. My point is that, by dealing with the homeless, we can create jobs in the construction industry. When a local authority starts to build, it puts money into the private sector.

The ignorance of the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam is so profound that it beggars belief. The only way to deal with the problem is to make her come and see my borough—possibly a visit to which neither of us will look forward, but in the interests of my future sanity, it has to be done.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House rises at 3 pm. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Lady can then go elsewhere; meanwhile, can we get back to the motion?

Mr. Banks: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is just that, by 3 o'clock, I may have been turned into a homicidal maniac by the hon. Lady.

It is nonsense to suggest that my borough does not go in for joint ventures. We enter into them all the time with the private sector, particularly in construction. I shall send the hon. Lady details afterwards. Newham has close relations with the private sector. We are not ideological, and we have no objections to it. The trouble is that Conservative Members are ideologically fixated. All we hear is, "Labour councils bad, Tory councils good." So let us move on.

People with such a simplistic view of life should not be in politics. There must be work with the private sector. It is the people who work in the private sector who live in my constituency and want the jobs. The hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) asked me how we can create more jobs. In Newham, it would help if the Government made a definitive announcement about the Jubilee line, instead of waiting for £400 million from the bank. As I said, investment is just as good for public money as it is for private money if it is sound in the first place.

Secondly, the construction of a railway station at Stratford for the channel tunnel link would bring jobs to an area in which the railway can play a traditional role. It may be constructed by the private sector, but it would provide jobs for my constituents. I am not ideologically fixated—unlike the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam.

Mr. McLoughlin: The hon. Gentleman ought to acknowledge the amount of Government money that has gone into his borough, including the successful application not long ago for city challenge. The hon. Gentleman suggests that we take a simplistic view of Labour councils versus Tory councils, but the hon. Gentleman takes a simplistic view of Tory Governments.

Mr. Banks: The Minister does me less than justice. The Minister for Housing and Planning, who visited my constituency for city challenge is a man for whom I have some regard. I have known him for many years—since the days when he was on Lambeth council, together with the Prime Minister. That council provides a distinguished training ground for Tory politicians. I say thank you to the Under-Secretary of State—I will always thank a Government who provide jobs and initiative in my borough. I am not sure that city challenge is the way to do that. The trouble with competitions—[Interruption.] I notice that the Minister for Housing and Planning has just entered the Chamber—he will be pleased to hear that I have just referred to him in the most affectionate terms. He will be able to confirm my sentiment, and confirm that when he visited Newham, I thanked him—and he spoke approvingly of some of our initiatives.

We do not have a hang-up, and we will thank the Government for action that they take, but we also have a right to criticise if we believe that the Government are doing something wrong. The Under-Secretary of State and Conservative Members know that I am fair—harsh in my criticism, but warm in my praise, and I praised the Minister when he visited my borough.

The hon. Member for Norfolk, North is anticipating. I said before that he is a man ahead of his time. As he commented, there is nothing new about what we are seeing now—there is nothing new under the sun. We are simply seeing a variant of the workhouse, and something like the bankers' ramp of the 1930s. That always happens when expenditure seems out of control. The Government operate in the area in which they have the most influence —the payments of benefits. I fully expect to see more people like Lord Tebbit espousing the views that the hon. Gentleman holds, for all the wrong reasons.

The hon. Member for Norfolk, North is right to say that unemployment is a curse, but it has always been created by Government policies, though undoubtedly exacerbated by problems throughout the whole of Europe. However, we have been longer in recession than any other European country—and we are likely to remain longer in recession and to go into slump unless something more dramatic is done than the Chancellor's tinkering in his autumn statement.

Britain has some of the lowest unemployment benefit rates in the whole Community. In other Community states, unemployment benefit is related to previous pay. In this country, only a flat rate is paid. That is a pretty dismal view if one's income falls from average earnings of £300 plus to the £43 a week unemployment benefit paid to a single person. That is only 14 per cent. of the skilled rate, which is a dramatic fall. That is not true of every case, but that is the scale of the drama that can be experienced by people being in work and then out of work.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Earlier, I asked the hon. Gentleman to suggest one measure that would return this country to full employment. I hope that he will respond before he resumes his seat.

Mr. Banks: I am chucking them in as I go along. I have already mentioned the £5·1 billion of accumulated capital receipts, construction industry, Jubilee line, and channel tunnel link. This morning, I listened on the radio to the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), who is an acknowledged railway buff. He made a good point on the "Today" programme. My wife and I were listening to the radio, and I said to her, "You would not believe that he was a Tory MP." The hon. Gentleman said that we should imagine ourselves going along on Victorian railway lines, yet travelling alongside roads which have only just been built—or at least, roads which were built in the 20th century.

In many respects we are still living off the Victorian infrastructure. So much investment in the infrastructure needs to be made. Spending money in that way is investment. I know that Conservative Members will say that such investment increases the public sector borrowing requirement and the percentage of debt in relation to the gross domestic product. But we have one of the lowest public debt percentages in Europe. We have the capacity to invest. We spend money when we give it out in transfer payments—benefits. But we invest money when we use it for the infrastructure and for retraining. The hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewksbury doubtless has many schemes of his own, but we should say to ourselves, "Our society has inherited infrastructure from wise decisions made in the past, and we should add to that stock." That is what we do in our private homes, if we are lucky enough to have them. If we can do that as individuals why can we not do it as a country? There are many ways of dealing with the matter.

The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) made a characteristically thoughtful speech, saying that it was not the Government's job to bring together the idle hand and the unmet need. He said that that was the job of the labour market. If it were happening I might have some sympathy with the hon. Gentleman—but it is not happening. The free market does not work. It is "voodoo economics" as George Bush once memorably described Reagan's policy —and he might just as well have been describing Baroness Thatcher's policy. Voodoo economics has not worked. If it had worked I would say that there must be something in it.

Unemployment is so high in this country. The official figure is 3 million, and we must take into account the fact that there have been 19 or 20 changes in the method of calculating the unemployment statistics. If we returned to the original 1982 base for the calculation there would be 4 million people unemployed in this country. Unarguably, on statistical grounds, 1 million of those people would be long-term unemployed. If someone tells me that that is a sign of economic success I shall ask that person what failure would be. If he replied that failure was 1976-77, the International Monetary Fund and the Labour Government, I should refer him to the Library, and the letter in my possession.

What worries me so much about present Government policies is the fact that we are looking at abysmal failure. Conservative Members do not seem to grasp the depth of the recession, nor how fatal it could be for this country. We could reach a point at which recovery would be impossible. Even if the long-awaited green shoots appear and flower into something, the underlying strength of the economy is poor, and manufacturing industry has been decimated over the past 13 years. What would happen if there were any growth in the economy, and any increase in demand? We all know the answer. We would suck in imports. This country's propensity to import is enormous —far greater than that of the United States, for example.

If we suck in imports that will further exacerbate the balance of payments, and cause the pound to fall even further, which will cause the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come back and say, "I must stick up interest rates to protect the pound."

Those are futile economies; they are the economics of the madhouse, as they say. This is the madhouse, and I am beginning to feel like an inmate—and perhaps to sound like one.

I must say to the hon. Member for Havant, although he is no longer here, that the Japanese have seen through those theories. They have announced an investment programme costing $87 billion. The Japanese are not known to throw their money around wilfully. I suggest that if the Japanese have decided that such an investment programme is a good thing, it is at least worth considering for this country.

I do not believe that Conservative Members have grasped the scale of our economic problems. At the end of the Chancellor's autumn statement they were waving their Order Papers. Why on earth they should do that, when every one of the Chancellor's previous predictions has been wrong, I do not know. I have not the faintest idea why they should think that he will get this one right. Even if he were to get it right it would not make any difference.

Watching Conservative Members last Thursday was like watching serried ranks of lemmings waving their Order Papers before plunging over the side of a cliff. If it were only the inhabitants of the Conservative Benches who were plunging over the cliff I should not mind; I should quite welcome large numbers of them going over—I mean no ill intent. But it will not be Conservative Members who lose their jobs—or at least, not immediately. They may not lose their jobs until the next election.

As we go further into recession it will be people in my constituency who lose their jobs. Some 18·6 per cent. of my constituents are unemployed. That is the problem in the London borough of Newham. The worse the recession gets, the worse it gets for Newham. Anyone who thinks that I draw any satisfaction or comfort from the failure of Government economic policies does not understand how seriously I view the problems of my constituency.

I see signs of extreme anxiety among Ministers as they do their calculations about timing. I hope that they are better at their calculations on the timing of the debate than they are at their calculations on the economy. They probably stand a better chance on the former. I realise that other Conservative Members also wish to speak.

Until the Government really grasp the depth of the horror facing the British economy, and until they get off their ideological hobby horse and start realising that, if investment is good, it is as good for the public sector to invest as it is for the private sector, they have learnt nothing and forgotten nothing.

The days ahead for this country look exceedingly bleak. The only chink of light is the election of a Labour Government. Unlike the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam, I never say never, because I believe that a Labour Government will be elected as a result of the economic problems forced on the country by the inept policies of the Government whom she supports.

1.15 pm

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): I have a sneaking feeling that the speech by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) was yesterday's speech. I am not suggesting that it was out of order, although it clearly bordered on that, but I believe that it would have been more appropriate in the debate on the autumn statement than it was today. I imagine that the hon. Gentleman was giving way to frustration. However, it is always enjoyable to listen to his vehemence, vigour and invective, laced as it always is with a great deal of humour.

The House and those of us who have sat through the debate today will be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell). He has tried to produce a positive and constructive approach to the problem of unemployment. Whether the specific changes he suggests are right is less important than that his general approach should be accepted by the Government, examined and then, in the light of that examination, acted on. I hope that in that spirit—the spirit in which speeches have been made by Conservative and Opposition Members—we shall realise that we are reviewing the possibilities for the future rather than engaging in an analysis of the present.

In that spirit, I turn to one suggestion that is worthy of consideration, not in place of, or as an alternative to, present policy, but as an extension to it. The hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) will recall that we were members of the Select Committee on Employment which visited Japan in 1986. The hon. Gentleman may be able to remind me of details or to correct me on specifics of the suggestion to which I want my hon. Friend the Minister to give serious consideration.

In 1986, we visited the Kawasaki heavy industries company which was a large manufacturer involved not only in making motor cycles, but in building ships. Shipbuilding then was suffering from world surpluses and seemed to be in terminal decline. Fortunately for Kawasaki, the Japanese Government operated a scheme to protect lifetime work forces from being broken up and thrown on to the unemployment heap, which would have been negative and barren.

The idea of the scheme was that the company should retain its workers so that they should not become an unproductive burden on society. The scheme involved the Government declaring a particular industry—in this case, shipbuilding—to be obsolescent, and subsidising firms for the extent of their wage bill for up to two years. During that time, approved projects that were already in the pipeline—though perhaps many years from fruition—could be pursued, and the firm would retrain its work force to build, say, helicopters rather than ships.

The great advantage of the scheme was that, instead of the work force being broken up and people being made redundant and turned into an unproductive non-wealth creating burden on the state, they were being positively retrained—perhaps at the same expense as if they had been drawing unemployment benefit and perhaps at slightly greater or slightly less expense.

I urge the Government to examine such schemes. I readily concede that they might not help us to deal with the obsolescence of the mining industry because, by their very nature, such undertakings do not have research schemes that can be brought forward. Perhaps I should add that that shows the desirability of privatising wherever possible and encouraging privatised industries to develop such research projects, the risk being taken in the private as opposed to the public sector.

I hope that, in the context of the debate, my hon. Friend the Minister will bear in mind the fact that there is no dignity in people being in receipt of public support. As has already been said, there is great distress. Anything that can be done to retain people in active work is highly desirable, whether it is necessary as a consequence of recession, of obsolescence or of the cumulative mistakes made by this party or another party or by no one in particular in the handling of the economy.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will believe that not only the scheme that I have outlined but the more detailed proposals advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North are worthy of further consideration, and that something will be done about them not tomorrow but, if possible, this evening.

1.22 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): It is always a genuine pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst), who at least reflects on what he says in the House. I shall return to his remarks, but, before doing so, it is only right that I should congratulate the hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell), first, on winning the ballot and, secondly, on choosing a subject that goes to the very heart of our biggest single problem. The hon. Gentleman was absolutely right that the single most important issue facing Britain and western Europe is unemployment. We may differ over how we should tackle that problem, but we should not differ over the scale of the human misery that has been caused by the politics of unemployment for so many years.

I am not prepared to be charged with making partisan points when I say that I hold the Government and many of the policies that they have pursued for the past 13 years directly to blame for high unemployment and the human misery that it causes. To do otherwise would be to absolve those who have made some tragic decisions of their responsibility for that misery.

For all the time that I have been in the House and previously, my constituency has suffered from a high rate of unemployment. Many people think of unemployment as an inner-city problem. My constituents—like those of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who have similar backgrounds—are sometimes dismissed as having less value and fewer rights than others in our society. I deeply resent that, not just on behalf of my constituents but for myself, because I grew up in my constituency. Of course, I accept that the hon. Gentleman's motion shows that he does not support that view.

It is important that we recognise precisely what unemployment does within our communities and why the hon. Gentleman is right to seek solutions. Unemployment is brutally crippling our society. In my area—although this is not typical to Manchester—drugs are being sold on the streets on such a wide and open scale that it is leading both directly and indirectly to the most mean and callous of human behaviour. People are literally killing each other —not through the use of drugs, but through territorial wars. That comes down to the politics of unemployment being played out on the streets.

Many years ago, someone in my constituency said that the people serving as role models for the youngsters were those who rode around in big cars wearing good suits— things that they had earned from the drugs trade. Therefore, no one in society should be surprised if those youngsters themselves came to believe that the only way that they could make progress was to follow that lesson. That point is fundamental to the way that we deal with the problem. As I have said, the Government historically share a great deal of responsibility for unemployment. Because of their general macro-economic incompetence and their specific incompetence in dealing with micro-economic solutions, they bear the responsibility for allowing the unemployment problem to continue.

During the past few years the rise in unemployment in Britain has been far in excess of that in other European countries. The days are long gone when I sat on the Front Bench and listened to the former Chancellor, Lord Lawson, mocking the Opposition. He said that the future of manufacturing industry was no longer of any interest because it was yesterday's industry and we were looking to the brave new world of the service industries. He said that it did not matter that there was a balance of payments deficit on manufactures, although we consistently cried that that was the politics of stupidity. One or two Conservative Members echoed our cry, but not enough to change Lord Lawson's mind.

The current Chancellor told the Treasury Select Committee

"I do not believe in kick starting the economy by some artificial stimulus or device."

In the autumn statement, the right hon. Gentleman slightly changed his mind. However, if he believes his words to the Select Committee, not only is he wrong but he is wrong at the expense of just those people that the hon. Member for Norfolk, North is trying to help. The problems caused by the Government's ridiculous economic policies have led this country to its current financial state and the heavy social price that our people are paying.

It is important to recognise that it will be many, many years before the social malaise caused by mass unemployment works itself out of the system—even if, in the short term, we can return to full employment. I can do no better than agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West, who emphatically made the point that if we want to return to Beveridge's debate about the future of Britain—going back not just decades but, technologically, generations—we must accept that Beveridge envisaged a society of full employment. The measures that Beveridge suggested were to be set in the context of a society which could offer effectively full employment.

Mr. Ralph Howell: I believe that Beveridge envisaged about 7·5 per cent. unemployment. He called that full employment.

Mr. Lloyd: Beveridge drew up the plans—on which both Labour and Conservative post-war Governments acted for some time—during the war years when people had returned to active work, whether war work or active service in the armed forces. Beveridge was among those who argued that post-war Governments should pursue the politics of full employment.

The Opposition believe that Britain must have a Government determined to pursue the politics of full employment and run the economy in a way that is consistent with that set of political decisions. Our fundamental problem in recent years has been that while the Government paid lip service to full employment, on every occasion they have made the needs of the unemployed and the requirement for full employment subsidiary to the other variables on which they chose to concentrate.

The hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) asked my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West which single measure he would implement. That simple question showed the fixation with a magic solution which has bedevilled economic planning in Britain for 13 years. It was simple-minded monetarism for a long time. The Government pursued simple-minded solutions on every occasion, such as sticking with the ERM at the rate at which we entered or sticking with a policy to keep inflation down. Those so-called solutions failed to deliver the goods and did not maintain a balance between the different aspects of economic management which are all necessary.

Mr. Deva: In previous speeches much was said about investing billions of pounds in infrastructure. But not one word was said about inflation. Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that it is a fact of our economy that the control of inflation is an important requisite for competitiveness because we shall continue to compete against low inflation countries, especially in Europe? Will the hon. Gentleman say a few words about how he would control inflation and make the public expenditure programmes work?

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman will understand that we are not willing to take lessons from a Government who claimed that they had cured inflation in the mid-1980s, yet saw inflation rise again dramatically when Nigel Lawson was Chancellor of the Exchequer. That happened with the full connivance of the then Prime Minister, Baroness Thatcher. Yet the same crass remedies were put into effect at a later stage and squeezed the lifeblood out of the economy. Even the Chancellor now uses a form of words which express his concern that he overdid monetary policy to such an extent that it squeezed the life out of the economy and caused the present recession and slump. That was the cause of at least a considerable part of the unemployment in our economy.

I remind the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury that it is necessary to achieve some balance of economic management. We must accept that, if we are to pursue policies that are consistent with full employment, we cannot have a simple fixation with squeezing inflation down on each and every occasion, even when the measures used are no longer appropriate to either inflation or employment. That is the central issue. That is why the Government will never shake off the blame for the misery that they have caused to millions of our fellow citizens by putting them out of work.

It is ironic that we are having this debate at a time when in the past few days Blue Circle—one of the giant firms in the construction industry—has had to lay people off because there is no longer sufficient demand. British Rail has announced 5,000 job losses. A huge number of jobs will be lost because of Government policies and their failure to invest in modern infrastructure, as British Rail's senior management made clear. As a modern trading nation we should have been investing in the railways, whether or not that was good for jobs. The failure to do so has caused job losses. My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) mentioned 3,500 job losses at the Royal Bank of Scotland. Every job lost is a personal human tragedy and it is part of the daily litany of job haemorrhaging in our society.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I understand that the Labour party gave pledges in its election manifesto that it would not increase public sector borrowing above that planned by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, and the hon. Gentleman would also have had only limited tax increases. All his schemes involve spending public money, so where would he get it from?

Mr. Lloyd: I cannot take lectures from an hon. Gentleman who has supported the Chancellor's pinball economic management, even for the short time that he has been in the House. If I were him, I would be ashamed to mention what the parties said at the election, given that the Chancellor has stood on his head during the six or eight months since then and it is doubtful whether he remembers what his party was committed to. Surely the hon. Gentleman does not want me to apologise for my party's pledges when the Government's management of the economy has been in total chaos. Even by the hon. Gentleman's standards, I think that that would be a little disingenuous.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Who won the election?

Mr. Tony Banks: The Sun won it.

Mr. Lloyd: My hon. Friend is very accurate. The Sun won it, but since that time, it has turned. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West is better at quick one liners—I am sure that he could think one up for me. I remember a headline in The Sun, which made clear what it thought of the Chancellor. Whatever value it saw in the Government in April has long since dissipated, as the Chancellor has proved his unfitness to manage the economy.

The debate is about unemployment and solutions to it, and it is instructive to set it within the context of present Government policy. Hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber will be interested to hear what the Minister has to say. I am sure that he will tell his hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North—as the Secretary of State did—that we cannot afford his proposed schemes, but he will also tell his hon. Friend not to worry because the Government are already doing a lot to deal with such problems.

I know that the hon. Member for Norfolk, North cares about the issue, and he must question the information that comes from the Treasury Benches. The Minister is not in a good position to rubbish the figures, because the Government are not prepared to publish any.

The hon. Member for Norfolk, North will understand that, if I am to trust the Government, who, he says, will set up schemes to provide training or work for young people, I require an absolute guarantee—not a guarantee to be perjured when it suits Ministers at the Dispatch Box—that no one will suffer financially if such training fails. They must guarantee to get people into work after training. We must not merely provide Mickey Mouse training—it must raise skill levels for the trainee and add value for the nation or we may as well not pretend that it has any merit.

Let us examine what has happened to youth training. The money spent on it has been cut by about 7 per cent. in this financial year, which is not great evidence of any commitment to youth training schemes.

Mr. Deva: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lloyd: Yes, but first I must ask some important questions to which I want the Minister to respond. Much as I respect the hon. Gentleman's views, I am sure that he will accept that we need to have the Minister's reasons on the record.

One of the problems with youth training is that the guarantee of that training has not been met. My hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has conducted the only survey of the training and enterprise councils that has sought to find out the extent to which that guarantee is being met. The Minister will not answer questions on this matter because he says that the information is not available. Let me tell the House what my hon. Friend was told. Of the TECs that he surveyed, 55,000 young people were awaiting either training or a job, as guaranteed. That is an awful lot of young people.

That survey was not comprehensive, because some of the TECs did not respond, but if we use it as a reliable estimate, it means that 75,000 young people are being betrayed by the youth training programme. Some of those young people have been waiting for as long as nine months for either a job or training. That delay is not merely equivalent to a bureaucratic aberration—it represents the system's total failure to deliver its promises. Perhaps Conservative Members will now understand why we are so dubious about the Government's commitment to the scheme.

One of the consequences for 16 and 17-year-olds whose promise of training or employment has been broken is that they are denied any form of economic support. Conservative Members—I exempt those who were elected in April—voted to take away income support for that group. At the time we were told that no one would suffer, because of that guarantee, but thousands of young people now have no form of economic support because that guarantee has not been met. They cannot claim any kind of benefit.

The failure to uphold that guarantee means that the promises given to the House have been cheated upon; what is more, it is immoral because it has made paupers of our young people. I relate unemployment to anti-social behaviour and criminality and I lay some of the responsibility for that at the door of those who have failed [illegible] uphold that guarantee.

Mr. Deva: Youth training is an important programme. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, currently, more than 250,000 people are given a guaranteed youth training place? We are the only country in Europe to offer such a guarantee. We are now spending more than £851 million a year on youth training. In 1979, however, when Labour was last in government, there were just 7,000 youth training places on offer.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman might care to cast his mind back to the rate of unemployment in 1979—the level of youth unemployment was far smaller then.

I am not against the idea of guaranteed training or employment, but that guarantee is absolutely meaningless for 75,000 people. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can thus understand why I do not understand the point he is trying to make. It is true that in a different era that guarantee did not exist. However, the hon. Gentleman must note that when his party took away the right to income support from those young people, they gave a solid, copper-bottomed guarantee that no one would suffer, because training or employment would be available to all. Yet between 55,000 and 75,000 young people have been betrayed. The hon. Gentleman should stand up and say to Ministers, "I cannot stand up in public and justify this. You must start doing something about it." Unless Ministers act, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand our diffidence towards schemes that contain any element of benefit reduction.

[Mr. Lloyd]

The Government have launched other training schemes that are meant to underpin training and improve the skills of the nation. The budget for employment training, however, has been cut by 15 per cent. this year. That has not happened because the number of the long-term unemployed has gone down; far from it, sadly that number has shot up. The hon. Member for Norfolk, North admitted that there are now more than 900,000 long-term unemployed people.

The long-term unemployed alone are costing the nation £8·5 billion a year. The hon. Member for Norfolk, North was right to refer to wasters of last resort because that is the most atrocious kind of waste. It is dreadful that the nation should throw billions of pounds into propping up unemployment. We see little for that money, considering, for example, what employment training achieves.

Indeed, I fear that employment training has become something of a joke—[Interruption.] I think that I heard the Government Whip, the hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) say "Rubbish." I appreciate that he cannot take part in the debate. I trust that he will now insist that the Minister gives a good response to the points that I am making on employment training, or the Whip will have been betrayed in his vow of silence, since he expects his Minister to speak for him.

Employment training is now in such a poor state that the probability of someone finding work after being on an employment training course is almost no better than the probability of someone who has been unemployed for six months finding work. Only 19 per cent. of those who have been on employment training schemes get jobs—[Interruption.] I am not surprised that the Minister should have a puzzled look on his face. He is puzzled because when I table questions to him on the subject, he cannot give me answers. The Department of Employment has no statistics. I challenge him to produce better figures, if he contradicts what I say.

My statistics come from reputable sources. If the Minister wants me to believe that employment training is better than I say it is, more work on the subject had better be done in his Department. On the other hand, rather than look for statistics that might prove helpful to the Government's propaganda case, they should put real effort into developing training schemes that genuinely help the unemployed.

Fewer than a quarter of those on employment training schemes are gaining qualifications. The number has fallen in the past 12 months. The idea of employment training being badly organised, badly structured and offering low-quality training does not concern only those who are forced into the scheme. It concerns all who hold views on whether the nation is wasting its effort in terms of providing training for the unemployed and giving training that adds value for the nation as a whole. So the charge against the Government is that, from the point of view of employment training and youth training, they have failed the nation.

The Government have moved away from high-cost schemes such as employment training and are placing greater emphasis on low-cost schemes such as job search and the job interview guarantee. But fewer than 17 per cent. of people going in for job search find work. That is pathetic. The rate for the job interview guarantee is 29 per cent. When I asked the Minister recently about employment action, he said that the Department had no information about the job outturn. If the Minister is to have any credibility when defending Government programmes of that type, he must do better. At present, when he gives information it is awful, and when he cannot give information we are left to speculate that the situation is probably even worse.

The hon. Member for Norfolk, North will appreciate that however well-meaning his ideas may be, we cannot trust the Government to deliver, their having failed in everything else they have done. Not only have they failed the unemployed, they have failed the nation. We cannot trust them even to delve into the type of scheme that the hon. Gentleman is suggesting, because we know that they would not be willing to make the resources available to fund it properly.

To be fair to the hon. Gentleman, I should, from the Opposition Benches, comment on his scheme. While we do not accept every aspect of what he proposes—I shall explain our position—we appreciate that he is making a sincere attempt to examine the problem of mass unemployment and long-term unemployment and suggest something that might be done.

Some aspects of the hon. Gentleman's scheme have a role to play in the future of this country. However, I disagree fundamentally with his statement that unemployment is a permanent feature of this nation. The Labour party rejects the notion that we are a high unemployment society. Our society must recognise that the world of work is so important as a mechanism for distributing the country's economic wealth that a two-tier society—a first tier with those in permanent jobs and a second tier with those in devalued jobs—is socially unacceptable. Moreover, it is not politically necessary because we can begin to develop an economy that moves us back towards full employment.

Mr. Ralph Howell: May I try to correct the impression that I gave? I believe that unless the present system is fundamentally changed, the problem will continue to worsen. No political party and no system, other than a completely different one from the present system, could stop the problem increasing. If we tackle it in the fundamental way that I have described—I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support—we would take the weight of bureaucracy off the productive forces and could reach full employment.

Mr. Lloyd: The reason for the bureaucracy is that, if we have at any time nearly 3 million registered unemployed —in fact, 4 million unemployed—we are spending, simply in terms of the equation of benefits and lost taxation, some £25 billion a year, which is a phenomenal amount to throw down the black hole of unemployment. We must break out of that cycle, a point on which I am at one with the hon. Gentleman. We disagree not about ends or even about why those ends would be so liberating for taxpayers and those of us in work, but about whether the specific means will directly achieve what he suggests.

Some aspects of the hon. Gentleman's scheme cause me difficulty. I do not mean to be unkind when I say that the hon. Gentleman slightly glossed over the aspect of compulsion. He may have been diverted by his hon. Friends. Although he talks about choice between his scheme and existing schemes, it is inevitable that any Government introducing such a scheme would be faced with either directing people into that form of work or stopping benefit. He said that there would be no unemployment benefit but simply benefits topping up the notional rate of pay for work. When challenged, the hon. Gentleman partly conceded that there are technical reasons why that is not desirable. For those coming out of work, looking for work and returning to work, it is not sufficient to force them into the wrong type of work immediately when their talents could be better used elsewhere. They need a period of reflection and the time to look around. That point is not meant to be trivial; it is an important point on which I insist.

I want to know more about how the scheme would work in practice. The hon. Gentleman said that people would either be in work or training. Apart from the long-term disabled and sick, other groups would find it difficult simply to be marshalled into the first job that became available. Those include people with responsibility for family members who need assistance. We would have to be careful to ensure that we did not drive people into poverty through the bureaucrats' misguided actions.

Until we move back towards a world in which people are in work, and until we have properly structured schemes, I see no purpose in trying to dragoon people. If we dragoon one person it will be at the expense of moving someone. It would therefore be a considerable time before the idea of compulsion became relevant. Until our economy can offer people real choice—real work, training or even participation in socially productive schemes—the idea of compulsion will be difficult for us to accept as being helpful to the individual or society.

Mr. Ralph Howell: We are trying to solve the problem of unemployment. There is only one answer to it, and that is working. If the state were to be the employer of last resort, everyone would have the right to work and there would be no question of unemployment. If that work were available for anyone who did not have a normal job, there would be no more compulsion in accepting it than there is in holding down a normal job. After all, 90 per cent. of the working population have a normal job. Those people are compelled to get up in the morning, to travel to where they work and to do whatever they do. If they do not, they do not have a job. The position would be the same for those whom the state employed.

Mr. Lloyd: I understand what the hon. Gentleman says, but I could not accept a situation in which people who were presented with what they regarded as unacceptable choices would have no means of income maintenance were they to refuse to take up the opportunities presented to them. There must be proper choices, especially for young people, between adequate training and adequate employment. It is not enough to produce make-work Mickey Mouse schemes on the basis of "Take it; leave it and you will have no income." It is that element of compulsion which the Opposition could not support.

Nor would we be prepared to support the creation of work that led to competition with other forms of work, where those engaged in some forms of work were paid at the market rate and others were regarded as devalued, compulsorily directed employees and paid much lower rates. There must be the notion of the rate for the job, whether the work be planting trees or anything else. The Opposition are not prepared to have staff at hospitals—for example, cleaners and porters—come from an area of compulsion. We know that that would drive down wages. Indeed, the Government seek to do that already.

The hon. Member for Norfolk, North must understand our concerns. I shall bring my remarks to a conclusion because I know that the Minister needs time to respond on behalf of the Government. I shall do so also because there may be the chance for one or two other hon. Members to say a few words. I accept the sincerity with which the hon. Member for Norfolk, North has raised the matter. He is right to say that unemployment is the most important issue that the nation faces. A Government who refuse to listen to his words and to the same pleas from Opposition Members are a Government who are morally bankrupt.

Our charge against the Government is that they have been proved to be incompetent in planning the economy nationally and in making training schemes and work available at the micro level. They are technically incompetent. Even worse, they are not prepared to accept the social damage that unemployment is causing. They are not prepared even to examine what is on offer, whether they be the schemes advocated by the hon. Member for Norfolk, North or the suggestions that are made by the Opposition. The Government are trivialising the problem at the expense of us all. For these reasons we need a very different Government.

1.58 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Patrick McLoughlin): I join all those who have congratulated my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) on the way in which he has approached the issue of unemployment and on the way in which he has brought it to the attention of the House. There have been many interesting speeches from all quarters. I would not want to refer specifically to individual Members. My colleagues have made some extremely important points and some of the contributions of Opposition Members have been worthy of consideration.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) told us about the problems that disabled people face finding work and about the implications that the workfare scheme might have for them. My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) gave us a thoughtful speech on the wider implications of workfare. He mentioned some of what he thought would be the difficulties of implementing such a scheme.

The hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) discussed the issue of Sunday trading. I am not in a position to respond to that, but I will draw his remarks to the attention of the Home Secretary.

My hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Mr. Trend) also discussed the implementation of a workfare scheme and pointed out why he thought more work needed to be done on it. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) described what has happened in Japan. I shall certainly bear his point in mind.

I should like to reply to a couple of the points raised by the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd), but I do not want to focus too narrowly on the youth training guarantee, because I want to deal with the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North. When the Secretary of State for Employment met the TEC chairmen in July she made it clear to them that she attached great importance to the youth training guarantee. She told them that she believed that it should be their top priority.

This is a time of year when a great many young people flow off and on to the programme. It inevitably takes some time to sort out their needs; when exam results come through, people sometimes change their minds about going to university, and so on.

The hon. Member for Stretford was wrong to talk about a cut in the youth training budget. The point is that more people are staying on at school, a fact which I would expect him to welcome. We all want more young people to stay on and get qualifications—academic or vocational. That should not be a cause for division between the parties.

There are certainly enough places in the youth training programme and we place tremendous importance on its availability to young people. It is estimated that 216,000 people are available for YT, but that there are 244,000 places.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North has been a consistent advocate of workfare. When he has advocated other causes in the past, he has sometimes caught the Government's ear successfully. I well remember his saying that the community charge should be reduced by switching the burden to VAT, and he successfully persuaded the Government that that was the right way forward.

I am sure that my hon. Friend recalls other discussions and arguments of the past. One thinks of his conversations with Lords Carr and Tebbit, for instance. It is a pity that the three of them cannot meet now to see whether there is a meeting of minds. There would certainly be an interesting exchange of views.

My hon. Friend spoke today about his vision of a workfare scheme for this country. For many years he has been urging the Government to consider his proposal. I am sure that he is familiar with our response. The Government have often told him that we do not believe that unemployed people should have to work in return for their benefits. We have no plans to introduce a compulsory workfare scheme. I realise that my hon. Friend was not advocating such a scheme today, but it still might be helpful if I explained why I consider that a compulsory workfare scheme would be wrong——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister must address the House, not his hon. Friend—smart though his suit is today.

Mr. McLoughlin: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I was explaining why I believe that we should not go down the road of the compulsory workfare scheme. The Government believe that there are already certain obligations on unemployed people, and that it is important for young people who are not working or in full-time education to be involved in training for work. That is why we guarantee an offer of training to young people if they need it.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva) for pointing out the difference in the type and availability of schemes now available, compared with 1979. We will not take any lessons from Labour about the importance of training young people. We attach priority to it, and regard it as important.

In the same way, we believe that it is reasonable that adults who are unemployed and who wish to claim benefit should be obliged to be available for work and actively to seek it. Our system places clear responsibilities on unemployed people to seek work. That is a condition of benefit. Unemployment benefit claimants have a duty under the benefit rules to be available for work and actively to seek it, and the Government have a duty to ensure that claimants satisfy those conditions and to give them every possible help in returning to work.

In recent years, we have done much to develop understanding of the rights and responsibilities of those who claim benefit while seeking work. We aim to do more, but the Government should not force people to work if they cannot find their own work.

Then there is the detrimental effect of compulsory work schemes on the labour market and the economy. The Government's aim is to improve the efficiency and flexibility of the labour market. That encourages labour to move towards areas where it can be productive, helping the economy as a whole. A compulsory scheme which forces people to work in jobs that they do not want and does little to improve their skills or motivation does not enhance either the efficiency or the adaptability of the labour market.

One of the most worrying features of such schemes is, in my view, their impact on wage determination. Many proponents of such schemes have suggested that scheme participants should be paid an allowance well in excess of the benefit payments they receive. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North suggested that workfare participants might receive a wage of £100 per week.

The fact that workfare was available for the unemployed at some guaranteed rate of pay would mean that level would effectively become a minimum wage. That point was well made by my hon. Friends the Members for Windsor and Maidenhead and for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland). Individuals, whether unemployed or employed would consider jobs, whether full time or part time, only if they paid more than that level.

What is more, there would be knock-on effects. Employed individuals would seek to increase their wages to a level which restored differentials over those in workfare placements. That would be likely to lead to upward pressure on pay levels, lower levels of employment, and higher levels of unemployment. Meanwhile, as I described earlier, the signals and incentives for unemployed people to find productive and profitable employment would be diminished, so the net effect would be a levelling down to a low-wage, low-productivity economy.

The Government believe that a statutory minimum wage has no role to play in an efficient labour market, and can actively hold back the creation of jobs. That is one reason why we recently announced the abolition of the wages councils, to help increase the number of jobs available for the unemployed at wages that they choose to accept.

Furthermore, if rates of pay were fixed substantially above benefit levels—for example, the £100 per week that my hon. Friend has proposed—some individuals would have very strong incentives to join the scheme. They would include young people in school—though I accept my hon.

Friend's argument for a differential rate for young people—further education, or training who would substantially increase their disposable income.

The introduction of a workfare scheme would increase the levels of benefit dependency, which the Government have fought hard to reduce. In addition to social security benefits, we have provided assistance to the lower paid by the reduction in the level of taxation from 33 to 25 per cent. and the introduction of a new band of 20 per cent.—which the Opposition opposed when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced it in this year's Budget. That is a further measure to encourage people on low incomes to be less dependent on benefit payments.

The "unemployment trap" can arise at the point at which a person would be as well off receiving benefit as working. The effects have been significantly alleviated in recent years, and now only a very small proportion of the working population receive as much or more in income support as they might receive in wages from full-time work. That point was dealt with well by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant, who pointed out the difficulties which would arise.

The willingness of unemployed individuals to leave unemployment and look for work would be reduced if a workfare scheme were introduced. That was a problem which worried my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam. Would somebody on a full workfare programme have sufficient time and availability to go and look for other jobs? Nobody would wish to see that problem arise.

I recognise the importance that my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North attaches to the scheme, and the persistence with which he has promoted his ideas. I know that he attended a meeting at the Department this week to discuss a limited pilot for localised voluntary workfare schemes. We are further considering the feasibility of such a scheme, in the context of increasing the range of local flexibility within the Department's programme. All of that would fit in with my Department's policy of providing more localised services for the unemployed. We have now accepted that there is an area of development, and the training and enterprise councils have been introduced throughout the country. That is welcome.

We already have several programmes for unemployed people which enable them to carry out useful work on a voluntary basis for the benefit of the community. Employment action was introduced in 1991 specifically to enable unemployed people to maintain their skills by undertaking work of benefit to the local community—and nearly 60,000 people have already participated in it.

At this point I shall describe in more detail what is available. I should especially like to draw attention to the package outlined by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment last week. We shall also discuss in more detail with my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North the way in which a pilot scheme could be introduced on a local basis, and consider the scheme in the context of his constituency.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way to me, and I shall not intervene again because I appreciate that he is trying to cover a lot of ground.

When the Minister talks about employment action, and the 60,000 people who have been through it, is he aware that recently, in answer to a question from me, he was unable to say anything about the outcome of the scheme? We have a scheme which, the Minister boasts, puts bums on seats—but we do not know what happens as a result of it. That is ridiculous. Every time the Government realise that one of their pet schemes has failed, the Secretary of State, like her predecessors, stands up and announces a whole plethora of new schemes to replace the failures of the past. The Government then ask us to take on trust that the next lot of failures will at last succeed.

Mr. McLoughlin: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but employment action has made a valuable contribution. I have talked to people on the scheme, and seen it in operation, and I am convinced that it has made a worthwhile contribution.

I shall now deal with the important package of new measures announced last week by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in the light of the public expenditure survey settlement. I hope that some of what I say will go some way towards reassuring the hon. Gentleman that we have listened to what many people have said about the availability of training. We are determined to ensure that unemployed people continue to have the effective help that they need in order to find jobs.

The Secretary of State has conducted a full-scale review of employment and training programmes delivered through the TECs in England and Wales, through the local enterprise companies in Scotland, and through the Employment Service. The purpose of that review was to ensure that the right kind of assistance is available to unemployed people, and to ensure that the programmes delivering that assistance provide the best value for money.

The new package of employment and training measures arising from the review builds on the successful programmes that we are already offering to unemployed people. The package represents the widest range of help and the highest number of opportunities ever made available. There will be almost 500,000 more opportunities available in 1993-94 than there are in the current financial year. Furthermore, the new package of measures includes many of the recommendations put to the Secretary of State by the training and enterprise councils' working groups on adult training.

We firmly believe that the network of training and enterprise councils and the local enterprise companies, together with the Employment Service, is equipped to give positive and appropriate help to unemployed people in their own parts of the country. The new programme for adult unemployed people, to be delivered by the TECs and the LECs, is called "training for work". It will begin in April 1993. Training for work is a flexible and wide-ranging programme which will offer either skills training or temporary work opportunities. It will also offer shorter work preparation courses for those who need to brush up their existing skills to secure a job.

Training for work brings together two existing programmes: employment training and employment action. Those programmes have been effective in helping people become better able to move into permanent employment. The new unified programme will enable help to be provided which is aimed at meeting each person's individual needs. The focus of the programme is firmly on helping long-term unemployed people to get back to work. The precise mix of opportunities in each area will be for the TECs to decide on the basis of the needs and features of their local job market. I hope that training for work goes some way towards what my hon. Friends have urged us to do and will provide flexibility for the training and enterprise councils.

Mr. Trend: Under the new scheme, will the community work aspects be a continuation of the old programmes or will they be a development from them?

Mr. McLoughlin: The whole idea of training for work is to introduce flexibility so that TECs can best decide what is needed in their local areas. I hope that the scheme will go some way towards doing what my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North has asked us to [illegible] in line with a number of other issues that I will not have time to outline. I know that some of my hon. Friends still wish to speak in the debate and I realise that they have remained in the Chamber for most of this morning.

There is much that I could say in this debate, but I am conscious that others wish to make a contribution. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North for the constructive way in which he has approached the subject and for his having taken a rare opportunity as a Back-Bench Member to have a full morning's debate on an idea which is not new to him. He has consistently followed his idea for many years as a Member of the House. I have outlined some of the things that we have managed to do and some of the new schemes that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced last week. I hope that I have shown that we have gone some way towards the proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North. We shall consider the points that he made about his own area.

I thank all my hon. Friends who have taken part in the debate, which has shown the importance that they attach to the subject, and the importance that my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North attaches to workfare and to the problems faced by the unemployed. Nobody underestimates those problems. The Government certainly do not.

2.18 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): I echo the Minister's words. I have worked for many years with my former Member of Parliament, my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell), on his scheme so I know the details of it very well. I pay tribute to the way in which my hon. Friend has managed to move from his original paper in the early 1970s, "Why Not Work?", which centred on the disincentive to move from benefits, to today's changed circumstances of trying genuinely to find a solution to the tragic problem of unemployment.

My second reason for being here is that I care desperately for all those who are unemployed in Cirencester and Tewkesbury. Any new look at the problem must be worth considering. Many hon. Members have spoken in that vein.

The Financial Times of 2 March 1988 contained an article by Philip Bassett about the unemployment queue in America. Lest anyone should think that, by and large, the unemployed do not want to work, let me draw to the attention of the House the fact that one of those mentioned said—it is a particularly poignant quote:

"I don't much mind what I do; I just want to work."

The vast majority of unemployed people who are unemployed through no fault of their own just want to work. I therefore pay tribute to the scheme on which my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North has been working for so many years.

What can we do about the unemployment problem? Contrary to what several Opposition Members seem to think, the only real long-term solution is for the economy to perform and grow. That is the only way in which sustainable long-term employment will be provided. I therefore pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor who, in his autumn statement, provided mechanisms for investment to continue. That will ultimately provide jobs.

I also pay credit to my right hon. Friend for a measure in his Budget that will help the unemployed considerably. I referred earlier to the paper "Why Not Work?" produced by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North, and to the need to dispense with the dependency culture. The new 20 per cent. tax band will ease people out of benefit into work by enabling them to keep more of their hard-earned income.

Not only the present Chancellor but his predecessor, Lord Lawson, have also effectively taken people out of the tax net altogether. People who are starting work for the first time and those returning to work having been unemployed, who generally take low-paid jobs, can keep all the money that they earn. That is especially important.

What benefits would accrue to the country if we introduced the scheme that my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North proposes? To my mind, the scheme would have to pass three tests. First, would the unemployed themselves want it? I hope that, by quoting the Financial Times article, I have shown that they would. The author of that article carried out a survey among unemployed people using that benefit office in America, where a workfare scheme was available, and found that 89 per cent. wanted a job to do. There is no question but that the scheme would pass the first of my tests.

Lady Olga Maitland: I am sorry to intervene when time is so precious, but does my hon. Friend agree that the American-style workfare programme has in many cases not been a great success because it has been coercive and compulsory, whereas my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North proposes that his scheme should be voluntary?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I wholly agree with my hon. Friend, but she will know that many different kinds of workfare scheme are available in the different states of America, as well as those in Switzerland and Sweden about which we have heard today, and that not all of them are compulsory.

The second of the tests is cost—a subject to which the Minister has referred. There is little doubt that a workfare scheme would cost more than what is now paid in unemployment benefit, but surely that cost to the nation would be, to quote a famous phrase, because the scheme would have many spin-off benefits.

"a price well worth paying"

My third test concerns what the country would get from the extra cost involved. There are a number of benefits to be had from the introduction of such a scheme, the most important of which is that it would encourage the work ethic about which we have heard so much this morning. It would encourage people to go out to do a job, even if only for part of the day or for so many days a week. I have come across unemployed people in my constituency who are so demoralised that they live from Thursday to Thursday because that is the day on which they draw their benefit. That cannot be good for people. It would surely be far better to find them something to do. Hon. Members have listed many jobs that could be done under such a scheme. Existing jobs would not be taken away because so many new jobs would be created under the scheme.

Mr. Deva: Is my hon. Friend aware that recent research by Buckingham university's education research centre shows that to put a workfare scheme into place in Britain would cost about £850 million? I have enormous sympathy with the objectives of workfare, but, given that sort of expenditure and the controls required to put it in place, does my hon. Friend think that the money could be better used to increase training provision? Should not people be trained to meet the challenges of tomorrow, especially from the Pacific rim and Europe, in high technology jobs?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I do not entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Although training is one part of the problem, it is no use training people for jobs that may never exist. With the best will in the world, there will never be enough training places for everybody—we have heard of some of the problems today. Indeed, I envisage that training would be part of a workfare system and obviously those on training schemes would not be expected to do a workfare job. I agree that training is vital, especially in today's dynamic and highly technical world. We need not only state training schemes but an extension of the many private schemes that have increasingly been set up during the past 13 years.

Lady Olga Maitland: The impression has been given that the costs of the workfare scheme would be borne by the Government or a Government agency. Perhaps an unemployed person's benefits should go to the employer. That would take that person off the Government agency list and make him a more attractive proposition for an employer. It would get that person into work.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Indeed, such schemes were introduced under the youth training scheme and employment training. However, we must be careful, because that sort of approach could lead to a cheap labour scheme. That is why I favour a separate workfare scheme such as that proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North.

It is surprising that the benefits of people working rather than being unemployed have not been fully explained this morning. A large number of benefits would come from workfare. They may not always be directly tangible, but I am sure that the number of intangible benefits will be enormous. For example, family life would be preserved. I have already referred to the demoralising aspects of not having a job. If people could be found even part-time work under the scheme, that would enhance their quality of life and their expectations and would help families to stick together through what otherwise might be an even more difficult time. I hope that it would only be a short time in most cases.

Mr. Hawkins: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most important aspects of the scheme is the enormous number of community projects that could be undertaken? My hon. Friend rightly said that so many people want to work, and there is so much work that needs to be done. Unemployment in the inner-town wards of Blackpool, South is unfortunately high, but I know that many people are desperate to work and that there are many jobs that desperately need doing.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Many jobs that should be done are not being done—for example, visiting old people, tidying up at libraries and so on. Workfare would not take away existing jobs; it would be supplemental.

Mr. Deva: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way yet again. There is one aspect of the workfare scheme on which I should like some direction, and I know that my hon. Friend is well versed on the matter so I look to him for guidance. One would hope that as the economy picked up and we moved out of the recession people who were on the workfare scheme would go back into proper and more skilled jobs. If people had been doing jobs such as cleaning and library work the gap between the level of skill required in the marketplace and their skills would have increased while they were doing workfare. How would the transfer be made?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend makes an important point. One would have to ensure that training played a continuous part in workfare——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Points of Order

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I draw your attention to page 614 of "Erskine May". The second paragraph says:

> "As a general rule a motion for the nomination of a select committee is tabled and moved by a member of the Government".

A Select Committee on Procedure has not been nominated. Following today's debate, I should have thought that there was a good case for allowing, say, an hour for the second motion on the Order Paper, such as my motion today on Derek Bentley. That would invalidate the argument which people outside might make that the Government Whips had deliberately procrastinated in the first debate to exclude the second debate.

In the ordinary course of events, complaints of this nature can be channelled properly to the Select Committee on Procedure. But that Committee is not yet established so that channel of potential reform is not available to Members. The Government ought to be encouraged to set up the Select Committees. It would be helpful if you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, could bring your influence to bear on them to that end.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Patrick McLoughlin): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It comes ill from the hon. Gentleman to complain because Opposition Members spoke this morning for 153 minutes in a 300-minute debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): I listened carefully to the point of order of the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer)—[Interruption.] Order.

Mr. Cryer: I am listening.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I listened attentively to his point of order. I imagine that when a Select Committee on Procedure is established, he will raise the matter with it in the normal way.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that it is a new point of order.

Mr. Banks: It is necessary to make it, Sir. You must be the judge——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is it a new point of order or not?

Mr. Banks: Yes. The new point of order is that not everyone necessarily understands the way in which the usual channels operate. Unfortunately, I am one of those who does not. Would it be fair to say that if agreement is reached between the two Front Benches about the timing of any debate, of course that can be implemented. If the two Front Benches failed to make an agreement so that we could reach the second motion, it is hardly the fault of anyone that we do not arrive at the second motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair knows nothing about the usual channels.

SECRET SOCIETIES (DECLARATION) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 29 January.

SPORTING EVENTS (CONTROL OF ALCOHOL ETC.) (AMENDMENT) BILL [LORDS]

Bill read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Cox.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): I have to remind the House that this is an unusual procedure which the occupants of the Chair have frequently deprecated.

Bill immediately considered in Committee; reported, without amendment.

Motion made, and Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 75 (Third Reading), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

EUROPEAN UNION (PUBLIC INFORMATION) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 27 November.

MEMBERS' INTERESTS

Ordered,

That Mr. Jimmy Boyce, Mr. Bob Cryer, Mr. Bob Dunn, Ms. Angela Eagle, Dame Peggy Fenner, Mr. Dudley Fishburn, Dr. Charles Goodson-Wickes, Mr. Peter Griffiths, Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith, Mr. Terry Lewis, Mr. Bill Michie and Mr. Peter Viggers be members of the Select Committee on Members' Interests.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

EUROPEAN STANDING COMMITTEES

Ordered,

That European Community Documents Nos. 4829/92, relating to Community spending and revenue to 1997, 5201/92, relating to Community finances to 1997, 5202/92, relating to the system of Community own resources, 5203/92, relating to renewal of the inter-institutional agreement on budgetary discipline, 8567/92, relating to the Cohesion Fund, 6569/92 relating to the European Court of Auditors' Opinion No. 2/92, COM (92)140, relating to the Preliminary Draft Budget for 1993, 7933/92, relating to the letter of amendment No. 1 to the Preliminary Draft Budget for 1993, 8209/92, relating to the Draft Budget for 1993, SEC(92) 1412, relating to the UK abatement, the European Court of Auditors' Annual Report for 1990 with the Institutions' Replies and SEC(92) 1990, relating to the principle of subsidiarity, shall not stand referred to European Standing Committee B.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Wednesday 25th November, the Speaker shall put the Question or Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motion in the name of Mr. Tony Newton relating to Members' salaries, unless they have previously been disposed of, at seven o'clock or three hours after they have been entered upon, whichever is the later.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

CAR TAX (ABOLITION)BILL

Ordered,

That, notwithstanding the practice of the House as to the intervals between stages of Bills brought in upon Ways and Means Resolutions, more than one stage of the Car Tax (Abolition) Bill may be taken at any sitting of the House.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

CAR TAX (ABOLITION) BILL

Ordered,

That, in respect of the Car Tax (Abolition) Bill, notices of Amendments, new Clauses and new Schedules to be moved in Committee may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bill has been read a second time.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

2.36 pm

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It will not have escaped your notice that the hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight)—on behalf of the Government who committed us to open government—just vetoed my harmless Secret Societies (Declaration) Bill, which was designed to extend the frontiers of open government. I hope that when a Minister next comes before the House and talks about open government, you will reserve a suitable note of scepticism.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. What is the point of order for the Chair?

Mr. Mullin: I am attempting to draw inconsistency to your attention.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member challenging inconsistency in the Chair?

Mr. Mullin: Not at all Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order, as the hon. Member knows full well.

Overhead Power Lines

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

2.37 pm

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise a subject of great importance to my constituents and to many people who are interested in environmental matters and the future of the electricity industry. The same subject was raised a few days ago in another place by my noble Friend Lord Crathorne.

I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy who is responsible for energy matters, for being here in person to reply to my remarks even though he could have asked a more junior Minister to be here instead. My hon. Friend is already familiar with many of my concerns and complaints about the manner in which permission can be granted for the construction of overhead power lines. He was good enough to invite me and my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) to his Department in July to discuss the matter. He knows that while my concern is general and covers the national approach to the subject, it arises from the plans of the National Grid Company to erect 50 miles of overhead power lines across Cleveland and North Yorkshire, largely across my constituency.

I am pleased that the Government ordered a public inquiry into the applications to build the power lines, as that is what I and other colleagues asked for. That inquiry is now over. The National Grid Company has presented its case, but it has had to face a formidable array of arguments from North Yorkshire county council, other local authorities, and the extremely well-informed pressure group, Revolt. My hon. Friends the Members for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates) and for Ryedale and I have sent our evidence to the inquiry in support of the arguments of those organisations that the applications are not necessary in the first place, have not been based on an adequate assessment of the alternatives and have not sufficiently taken into account the inevitable impact on the local environment.

My hon. Friend the Minister will no doubt receive the report of the inquiry in due course and it will make many nights of good bed-time reading. It will come as no surprise to me that my hon. Friend will be unable to comment, in advance of receiving that report, on the merits of the particular applications by the National Grid Company. It will come as no surprise to him, however, that I believe that they should be refused outright.

It is important for my hon. Friend to know that the strong feelings shown by me and my constituents on this matter do not arise from simple, uniformed Nimbyism. What we have seen of the procedures for deciding where power lines and power stations should be located, and what we have seen of the policies and practices of the National Grid Company, have led us to conclude that the conditions under which the Secretary of State can grant permission for overhead power lines need to be changed in some respects, interpreted more strictly in others, and made more specific.

One of the deeply unsatisfactory aspects of the local case to which I have referred is that although the construction of the new Enron gas-fired power station at Wilton has been cited as the reason for the power lines, no thought was given to the matter when planning permission was granted for the power station itself. That point has been taken by the Council for the Protection of Rural England and I know that its representatives visited the DTI last week to discuss that matter.

I believe that CPRE is right to argue that we should amend Electricity and Pipeline Works (Assessment of Environmental Effects) Regulations 1989. Surely those regulations should include explicit reference to the fact that environmental statements accompanying applications for consent to build power stations under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 should include an assessment of the likely impact of associated developments, including power transmission lines. It is not good enough to give approval for a large new power station and to tell people in nearby areas only afterwards that huge power lines must be erected through their community as a direct consequence. That clear lesson can be drawn from what has happened in Cleveland and North Yorkshire and I hope that my hon. Friend can accept it.

The question of planning procedures is, however, only the first of many issues that this case has thrown up—many of them are more far reaching and fundamental. It is too late now for any amendment to the 1989 regulations to affect the North Yorkshire case. Instead, I hope that my hon. Friend will make full use of his powers under section 37 of the 1989 Act and reject applications to build power lines or impose on them, according to the words of the Act,

"such conditions . . . as appear to the Secretary of State to be appropriate".

If he were to do so, he could force the National Grid Company to give greater weight to concerns about the environment and health. He could encourage the development of new technology and avoid the creation of huge inefficiencies, overcapacity and waste in the electricity distribution system. I should like to consider those three elements in turn.

First, on the environment and health, let us be in no doubt that 50 miles of pylons—it is proposed that they should run largely alongside a similar, smaller existing line, which will thereby create a corridor of wire under which some people will have to live, and they would cross an outstanding rural landscape—represent substantial visual pollution. In the past few years, the House has passed laws to reduce lead in the atmosphere, phase out CFCs, take the sulphur out of power station emissions, clean up rivers, and so on. We should not be content to build huge overhead power lines across our countryside, with little thought about how we could avoid that. The environmental standards of the nation have changed since the National Grid Company last built power lines on such a scale.

Let us be in no doubt that the evidence on the health implications of such lines, while still inconclusive, is steadily building up to confirm a link between high-voltage power lines and childhood leukaemia. Is my hon. Friend aware that the Swedish National Board for Industrial and Technological Development is now convinced that radiation from power lines can cause leukaemia and that the board is now drawing up options to deal with that for the Swedish Government to consider? Within a few years, the National Grid Company and the Government may bitterly regret the construction of new overhead power lines.

The Minister may say that it is all most unfortunate, but that there is no alternative. That is wrong. In respect of North Yorkshire, the inquiry has been shown a number of alternative arrangements which would achieve a similar reinforcement of the security of the national grid. My hon. Friend will read about them in the inquiry report, so I shall not delay the House today by detailing them. For today, suffice it to say that the case for the National Grid Company's applications becomes compelling only if one assumes that further gas-fired power stations will be built on Teesside in future, stations for which consent has not yet been given and which I hope will never be given.

Even if there were a compelling need, the Department of Trade and Industry should use its powers under the Electricity Act 1989 to push the NGC towards the development of new and more acceptable technology. The old Central Electricity Generating Board described in a 1976 report the possibility of developing new superconducting cables which would have far greater capacity than conventional power lines, would neutralise magnetic fields, thereby obviating the health hazards, and would greatly reduce transmission losses.

In 1976, the only known coolant for such cable was helium. Since the introduction of new, high-temperature superconductors, efficent transmission with much cheaper and more readily available hydrogen and nitrogen coolants is now feasible. That was all set out by the CEGB 16 years ago; yet since then the National Grid Company has done little or nothing to develop such technology.

If the company argues that the nation requires for the future an underground superconducting spine running down the country connecting Scotland with the south of England, that would be applauded by us all. It can expect no support, by contrast, for sleep walking into the future proposing time-honoured techniques on a take-it-or-leave-it basis while rejecting all sorts of better technologies as too expensive. A similar myopic approach in the oil or gas industries would have ruined our environment long ago. The Minister would do an enormous service for the nation if he shook the National Grid Company from its complacency by refusing to give consents for overhead lines until or unless a more imaginative and forward-looking attitude is taken to the development of new technology.

The Minister should use his powers to give the National Grid Company a good kick. Its behaviour is symptomatic of a business which faces no competitive pressures and can tell anyone who argues with it that there is no alternative to whatever it proposes. Until a meeting arranged by a local pressure group in North Yorkshire, the National Grid Company had no idea that the Department of Transport found no problem in principle with underground electric cables by the side of trunk roads. Duties should be placed on it by the Government to promote new technology to tackle environmental and health issues and to maintain a transmission grid that is efficient and economical, not just technically secure according to licence standards.

I referred earlier to the area of waste, inefficiency and overcapacity in the provision of the nation's electricity and the system for transmitting it. The overhead lines project in North Yorkshire has been costed at about £200 million. That cost must ultimately be passed on to the electricity consumer. Yet its purpose allegedly is to ensure the connection of a new power station, or perhaps power stations, to the grid at a time when generation capacity in the United Kingdom is 32 per cent. in excess of peak winter demand. According to the National Grid Company's own seven-year statement, that surplus capacity will increase to 57 per cent. by 1997.

To any outside observer, that would seem strange. Even stranger, however, is the fact that the bulk of extra generation is to be built in areas remote from the centres of demand, resulting in the proliferation elsewhere in the country of power lines and towers, heavy and expensive transmission losses, expensive reactive compensation plant and a reduction in the stability and security of the whole electricity transmission system. How can there be reported plans to build four or five gas-power stations on Teesside when the excess demand for power is in the south of England? The north-east is already an exporter of electricity.

I know of no energy expert in the country who would not argue that if gas must be used for the large-scale generation of electricity—we have already debated that argument and will debate it on other occasions—it would be far more energy efficient to pipe it as gas near to the centres of demand before turning it into electricity. Transmission losses in the piping of gas are minimal, but when electricity is transmitted by overhead power lines from the north to the south of the country, about 10 per cent. of the power is lost. That is a serious waste of the nation's natural resources and adds to the huge cost of constructing the power lines in the first place. There is little doubt that electricity prices would be higher than necessary as a result.

We now have the ridiculous situation where the National Grid Company, through no fault of its own, feels compelled to construct an electricity transmission network to cater not for the demand for electricity but for a grossly excessive generating capacity. Just as bad, it must plan to cater for that capacity despite the fact that, by any judgment of economics or energy efficiency, the capacity is being provided in the wrong place.

There is little point in making fine-sounding statements in Rio about energy use or encouraging people to insulate their homes if we then allow the construction of a transmission network which leads to unnecessary waste and transmission losses on a considerable scale. The solution lies not just in a reform of the electricity market, which may be a subject for the review which my hon. Friend the Minister is conducting, but in a more competitive transmission system for gas. British Gas is the sole owner of the national gas pipe grid. It seems to be charging excessive amounts for gas transmission, thereby encouraging the generation of gas-fired electricity near the onshore terminals rather than near the demand for electricity.

I realise that I have raised a wide range of issues, but they are all interlocking and crucial to consider before my hon. Friend and his colleagues consider whether to grant consent for large numbers of new overhead power lines. My opposition to the power lines proposed for North Yorkshire is founded not on Nimbyism, but on the well-founded view that the way we have structured our electricity and gas transmission systems will lead to waste and inefficiency, compounded by an unimaginative use of technology with serious consequences for the environment and possibly for the nation's health.

My hon. Friend the Minister should use his powers to withhold consent for new overhead power lines and new gas-fired power stations until those vital issues have been resolved. If and when they are resolved, he may find that many potential future applications to build new overhead power lines will become unnecessary. Where they turn out to be unnecessary, he should insist on proper consideration of all alternatives and on the strictest possible approach to environmental and health matters. Although I do not expect him to be able to give me instant satisfaction or answers to every point that I have raised, I hope that he will show that he is now moving in the right direction.

2.52 pm

The Minister for Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) not only on succeeding in raising this matter on the Adjournment but on doing so for the second time, which is rare in the House. I also congratulate him on varying his argument from the first time that he raised the subject. As he kindly said, I was able to see him shortly after I took up my present responsibilities, when he put the case that he has made today on behalf of his constituents extremely powerfully in my office at the Department of Trade and Industry.

As my hon. Friend expected, I cannot respond to the points that relate to the public inquiry, which are of considerable importance to him, his constituents and the Government. As he rightly said, when the inquiry inspectors have completed their investigation, they will report to my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade with their findings and recommendations. I look forward to considering the arguments and what has been said. Given the nature of the inquiry, I must limit my remarks today to the general issues which my hon. Friend has raised and not take up the particular issues that have been raised in the public inquiry.

My hon. Friend talked about gas transmission charges. I am sure that he is aware that the entire function of British Gas—the way in which it and its different businesses operate—is currently the subject of an inquiry before the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. I am sure that, among other things, the commission will be taking into account the sort of issues that my hon. Friends have raised.

In any debate about overhead supply lines, account has to be taken of the statutory responsibilities of the companies concerned. The National Grid Company which is responsible for the 275kv and 400kv transmission lines, has clear obligations under the Electricity Act 1989, through its transmission licence, to offer terms within 90 days for any prospective new connections to the grid. If the terms are accepted, the NGC must provide, under the law, the link in to its system. In addition, the NGC must carry out any necessary extension or reinforcement work resulting from that connection by the power station. The regional electricity companies, which are responsible for the lower voltage lines, also have a statutory duty to connect to their network and to give a supply of electricity to any premises where the owner or occupier of those premises has made a request for such a supply.

All proposed overhead lines in England and Wales, apart from those to supply individual properties and a few other minor developments, require the consent under section 37 of the Electricity Act 1989, and of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade in his capacity as Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. All applications for consent are fully and carefully considered by my Department.

The number of applications made for overhead line consent in England and Wales is now—this may surprise the House—around 1,500 a year. Most of the applications are fairly short lines, typically just a few hundred metres or less. Applications are often occasioned by the need to move existing lines to enable developments to take place. In consequence many newly installed lines once commissioned, are followed by the dismantling of existing lines, giving rise to little or no net increase in overhead line length. In fact quite often, through improved routing, and sometimes also partial undergrounding, companies are able to achieve worthwhile net reductions in the lengths of overhead lines in the areas concerned.

My hon. Friend raised the specific question of Teesside Power. He referred to it as Enron. The Electricity and Pipelines (Assessment of Environmental Effects) Regulations 1990 to which he also referred, implement the relevant European Community directive, and provide that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade shall not grant consent for a power station under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 unless he has first taken environmental information into consideration. This environmental information is the environmental statement submitted by the applicant, together with any representations made about the likely effects of the development. While Teesside Power's environmental statement referred to the need for a link with, and uprating of, the grid, these matters are the responsibility of the NGC and not Teesside Power. Consequently, and not surprisingly, Teesside Power could not be expected to provide detailed information on them.

It should be appreciated—I think that my hon. Friend hinted at it—that the NGC's programme of strengthening the grid in the north is not solely to meet the needs of Teesside power station; it also has to meet other needs, such as the upgrading of the Anglo-Scottish interconnector.

Of course, an overhead line may need to be able to cover not just one power station project but several. It makes no sense to require all projects that would involve an overhead line to come forward at precisely the same time. That is a recipe for inaction. A better way is to approve a power station and then consider overhead lines on their merits, if they are necessary. That does not preclude the turning down of an overhead line. There is always the option of re-routing or laying it underground, and of course the power station would not be able to proceed unless a satisfactory overhead or underground route for the connecting power line could be identified.

Mr. Hague: Is there any reason why the company making the application, Teesside Power in this case, could not ask the National Grid Company what the implications for it would be if a power station were constructed? That could then be taken into account in the environmental assessment. That seems simple, easy and practical.

Mr. Eggar: As I understand it, Teesside Power referred to the need for a strengthening of the grid, but it could not possibly give the sort of information that would be necessary for integration. It would be extremely difficult if all power generation projects were required to follow through the consequences of any affirmative decisions that were granted, right the way through to any changes that might occur in the national grid. This is a complex matter and there are always compensating factors to be considered. We are not often dealing with only one project leading to one defined and dedicated line.

The EC environmental assessment directive requires an environmental statement to be prepared as part of overhead line applications that are considered likely to result in significant effects on their surroundings. The National Grid Company will provide an environmental statement for all its major new overhead line proposals. The United Kingdom's Electricity and Pipelines (Assessment of Environmental Effects) Regulations 1990 also enable my right hon. Friend to call for such a statement with any other application, including those for lower voltage lines from the regional electricity companies, if he considers that they will have a significant impact on the environment. All overhead line applications at 132,000 volts and above must be advertised, as must the existence of an environmental statement, when one has been produced. A period of four weeks following the last advertisement for a project is allowed for representations to be made to my right hon. Friend.

The Government have an open mind about any possible health risks posed by overhead lines. Allegations of cancer resulting from overhead lines are unproven, despite continuing studies in a number of countries, including the United Kingdom. The incidence of childhood leukaemias is small and it is difficult to establish any correlation between that incidence and overhead lines. Measurements of electromagnetism are in any event similar at foot level from underground cables to those at head level from overhead lines.

In March this year, a review carried out by an advisory group headed by Sir Richard Doll, on behalf of the National Radiological Protection Board, concluded that there was no firm evidence of a risk of cancer or leukaemia from electricity supplies or ordinary domestic electrical appliances.

More recently, as my hon. Friend said, two reports have appeared from Sweden on this subject and those reports are interesting additions to the many studies that were considered in Sir Richard Doll's report. The Swedish reports have been referred to Sir Richard Doll's advisory group and we now await its assessment of the new data.

My hon. Friend made a number of references to the National Grid Company's approach to new technology. He is aware of the technical issues relating to undergrounding, the costs of which are many times those of overhead lines.

Superconductivity, to which my hon. Friend also referred, is still—despite the CEGB's report of 16 years ago—an emerging technology, and requires further development before it can be commercially exploited by the NGC or others. The most promising area of commerical exploitation of superconductivity is submarrine propulsion—but even that is very much in its infancy.

The Government are committed, under schedule 9 to the Electricity Act 1989, to the preservation of the environment, which is a requirement of that schedule. Under that legislation, promoters of all overhead lines must take full account of the need to preserve beauty and to conserve flora and fauna when formulating their proposals. Promoters have a duty to do all that they reasonably can, subject always to their statutory duty to supply, to mitigate any effect that their proposals would have on the natural beauty of the countryside or on any flora, fauna, features of special interest, buildings or objects.

Whenever my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State considers any overhead line applications, he is required to take account of the environmental implications and the extent to which the applicant for consent has complied with his duty under schedule 9 to the 1989 Act.

I have taken careful note of my hon. Friend's concerns, but the procedures that I outlined provide a satisfactory and appropriate basis for the consideration of applications for overhead line consent and ensure that such considerations take account of environmental effects.

My hon. Friend is no doubt awaiting with considerable interest the inspector's recommendations and my right hon. Friend's decision. I assure my hon. Friend that his remarks in the House today and on previous occasions, as well as his comments to me in meetings, will be carefully weighed when I consider matters in the wider context. I am sure that my hon. Friend has served his constituents extremely well, both this afternoon and previously.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes past Three o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Single European Market

1. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made during the United Kingdom's presidency of the EC Council on improving transport infrastructure in order to maximise the benefits to be gained from the single European market; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. John MacGregor): At its meeting on 26 October, the European Community Transport Council under the United Kingdom presidency reached provisional agreement, subject to the agreement of the European Parliament, to extend the regulation on EC transport infrastructure for a further two years. Investment in road and rail infrastructure is now at record levels in Britain and will assist British business in making the most of the single European market.

Mr. Salmond: Given that the geographical limit of the Government's rail policy seems to be docklands and of their road policy the M25, what provision has been made to extend transport links for the single market for the world beyond Watford Gap? If it is appropriate to spend £1,700 million to extend the Jubilee line to nowhere in particular and £300 million to build 1 mile of motorway in Limehouse, why is it not appropriate to spend £80 million on electrifying the railway line from Edinburgh to Aberdeen, the oil capital of Europe and from where most of the funds that the Government have squandered over the past 10 years have come?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman is being astonishingly and misleadingly selective, and he knows it. He knows that he is talking arrant nonsense. He is well aware that there is a substantial road-building programme from the channel ports all the way to Aberdeen, which will greatly assist Scottish businesses. I was in Aberdeen recently for a meeting and the chairman complained that there were still 20 miles of single carriageway road between Aberdeen and Paris. That shows the degree to which there are already motorways and dual-carriageway roads. The hon. Gentleman is aware of what is being done on what soon will be the M74, he knows of the Moss End terminal and he should know that the M25 is probably the greatest bottleneck to the Community for Scottish businesses. He is talking total nonsense.

Mr. Adley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that when it comes to infrastructure on both sides of the channel, actions speak louder than words? If the Government, for entirely respectable reasons, decide that they must protect and restore the national heritage after the fire at Windsor, could they not use the same approach to improve our rail infrastructure? Will he study the Development (Loan Guarantees and Grants) Act 1929 to ascertain whether that might be appropriate in the current circumstances?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend must know that we are expecting British Rail to have record levels of capital investment this year and for the next three years. They will be well above the levels of the 1970s and 1980s. In real terms, they will be at twice the level of those for most years. There is a substantial investment programme in British Rail, including one for the channel tunnel, but funds cannot be unlimited. We must have a mind to other spending claims as well as a mind to the overall level of Government spending. The fact that capital investment is at record levels shows the priority that we are giving to British Rail.

Mr. Martlew: Is the Secretary of State aware that unless £800 million is spent on the west coast rail line to upgrade it to the standard of the east coast line, my constituents —indeed, all those living in western Britain—will not be able to benefit from the single market?

Mr. MacGregor: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman acknowledges the substantial sums that are already being spent on the east coast line. Some improvement to the infrastructure of the west coast line is taking place now. Falling revenues have caused British Rail to reconsider its overall plans for the moment.

Mr. Horam: Is there any possibility of European funds being used for the channel tunnel rail link?

Mr. MacGregor: Some European funds are already being used for studies on the rail link. It is for British Rail to put forward proposals for next year. Fundamentally, we need to study the overall financing of the high-speed channel tunnel rail link after I have received Union Railways' recommendations for a precise line. We are publishing the options and can then consider the financing.

Channel Tunnel

2. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his proposals to upgrade rail links from south Wales to the channel tunnel.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Roger Freeman): It is for British Rail to bring forward proposals to upgrade the rail network. For channel tunnel services, BR intends to utilise the existing freight terminal at Cardiff for freight and to provide a night time passenger service from Swansea to Paris and Brussels. Passengers from south Wales will also be able to connect with the inter-capital services from Waterloo.

Mr. Hain: The Minister must accept that that is wholly inadequate for the needs of south Wales. Does not the Government's abysmal failure to invest in a modern, direct link from south Wales to the channel tunnel—coupled with the 500 rail job losses resulting from the pit closure programme and with British Rail's job loss programme —mean that south Wales is in danger of being left with a skeleton service by international standards?

Mr. Freeman: On the hon. Gentleman's point about a direct link, I am sure that he appreciates that when the channel tunnel rail link is built between Folkestone and King's Cross, that will permit direct services via King's Cross on the Great Western line all the way to Cardiff and other parts of Wales. Therefore, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will support the channel tunnel rail link project when my right hon. Friend introduces proposals for consideration.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. Friend will know how grateful I am that our right hon. Friend has said that he will publish the proposals when he receives them from Union Railways. Will my hon. Friend confirm that he is fully seized of the anxieties of all local authorities in Kent that the channel tunnel rail link will suffer from the present plans to run it overground? Will he also confirm that he is not prepared to sacrifice the environment of Kent for a cut-price line, especially as the building of major capital projects is probably cheaper now than it has been at any time?

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. Friend will publish a proposed route for consultation as quickly as possible after he has had the opportunity to study the proposals from Union Railways. He will not subscribe to a cut-price route that abandons all sensible environmental protection. I give my hon. Friend and his Kent colleagues the assurance that the Government will carefully consider the best environmental protection possible with regard to the rail link.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Does the Minister think that the proposal to upgrade the line south of London, which would avoid the need for services from south Wales and the west country to come into the capital, would be a much better alternative? Otherwise, will not London and, in particular, the area around King's Cross become the equivalent of Heathrow—where people can be stuck for hours because of the difficulties of air traffic finding a slot? Why do not the Government invest in the future rather than in short-term plans that will make London a nightmare for rail travellers?

Mr. Freeman: I believe that King's Cross is a sensible terminus for the new high-speed channel tunnel rail link. The capacity created will definitely be needed at some future stage. That choice of terminus will also benefit those who live in the north-east and north-west.

However, there is much to commend in the hon. Gentleman's specific point about routing to the south of London—presumably through Redhill and then on through Reading. I shall draw his comments and those of other hon. Members who have made the same point to the attention of the chairman of British Rail.

Speeding (Villages)

3. Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to reduce excessive speed in villages.

Mr. MacGregor: I have today laid a draft order to remove the requirement that local traffic authorities obtain my consent before establishing a speed limit on any principal road. In addition, I shall shortly be issuing a circular advising local authorities, when setting a speed limit, to place greater stress on environmental considerations and less on the need to show that the road has a poor accident record.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: My right hon. Friend will be aware that many villages in my constituency are bisected by busy roads. Do such villages have to wait for someone to be killed or for a series of serious accidents to happen before action is taken to control excessive speed?

Mr. MacGregor: Many villages in my constituency are in a similar position. I have long been aware of the concern among villagers that it appears that they have to suffer serious road accidents before a speed limit can be allowed. I share that concern. I have changed the criteria so that that will no longer be the case.

Traffic (Town Centres)

4. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will visit mid-Staffordshire to assess the effect of traffic on town centres.

The Minister for Roads and Traffic (Mr. Kenneth Carlisle): My right hon. Friend has no plans to visit mid-Staffordshire at present. But I shall be in the west midlands on 16 December listening to the views of all the local authorities on traffic problems in their areas.

Mr. Fabricant: Is my hon. Friend aware of the huge traffic build-up that occurs when travelling north and south on the A51 through Rugeley and Brereton? Is he aware of the even more desperate need of a bypass in Stone, which is an ancient and beautiful market town?

Mr. Carlisle: My hon. Friend has pressed clearly on me the need for a bypass in Stone. I well understand his argument. We shall make an announcement shortly on our backing for local authority schemes in the coming year. I can assure my hon. Friend that I shall listen carefully to the clear expression of his constituents' views.

I understand the need for a bypass in Rugeley. Our bypass programme is substantial. The Government have included 130 bypasses in the present programme, and there are dozens more bypasses in the local roads programme. So my hon. Friend speaks for many other constituents besides his own.

Mr. Bennett: Does the Minister accept that the problems of mid-Staffordshire are replicated throughout much of the midlands and the north-west of England because people are switching from rail travel to roads as a result of the poor quality of service on the west coast main line? Is it not essential to get the new rolling stock for the west coast main line as quickly as possible? Would not investment in railways be much better than putting one or two extra bypasses here and there, because investment in the railways would help the whole country?

Mr. Carlisle: The hon. Gentleman's question is far from the subject of this question. We have a balanced programme with a substantial investment in railways. The hon. Member would do well if he could press the claims of his constituents as well as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) presses for his.

London Underground (Investment)

5. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what level of capital investment in London Underground he is expecting to authorise in the coming year.

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): The settlement reached will allow investment of about £1 billion in London Underground, including the Jubilee line extension in each of the next three years. Investment next year in London Underground will be higher in real terms than at any point in the 1970s or 1980s.

Mr. Carrington: Does my hon. Friend agree that London desperately needs new underground lines to relieve the congestion on London transport? The news in the autumn statement that the Jubilee line extension will go ahead, subject to private sector money becoming available, is good news. Will my hon. Friend confirm when he expects work to start on the Jubilee line extension?

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend is right that we need to continue extending the infrastructure of tube lines in London. We made it clear in the autumn statement that funds for the Jubilee line are reserved. My hon. Friend will appreciate that it is a matter for negotiation between the two parties to the partnership—the Government and the creditors of the former Olympia and York. Those discussions are proceeding. I hope that we shall be able to start construction in the near future, subject to those discussions.

Mr. Austin-Walker: Does the Minister recognise that, in addition to the capital problems that London Underground faces, it has a severe revenue problem, which is one of the reasons why 5,000 jobs are under threat? Although I welcome the fact that tomorrow's impending strike appears to have been called off, on the ground that there will be no compulsory redundancies, does the Minister accept that the loss of 5,000 jobs will have a serious effect not only on safety on London Underground but on passengers' perception of safety and may lead people back onto the roads?

Mr. Norris: I know that the hon. Gentleman has not been here long, but it might be a good idea if he knew what he was talking about before he started on a rant of that nature. The first thing to establish is that the reductions in jobs are a result of the progress in contracting out services, which produces better quality services for passengers. The basis of the company plan always was voluntary redundancy and more staff on stations, not fewer. In short, I reject everything that the hon. Gentleman says, with the one exception that I join him in expressing pleasure that both sides have seen the sense of continuing to implement the company plan, as they appear from the recent announcement to have done.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend will have heard the welcome on both sides of the House for the Jubilee line new investment. In what way can he and the House be satisfied that the remaining funds for London Transport will allow maintenance and re-investment in existing lines to continue so that there is no deterioration in track or trains?

Mr. Norris: May I direct my hon. Friend to the fact that investment in the next three years—excluding the Jubilee line and for that matter the crossrail project, the funds for which are also protected—will be about £½ billion greater than in the past three years. That should give any hon. Friend the reassurance that he seeks. We shall continue to improve the quality of the existing infrastructure, as well as adding to it through the significant projects that I have mentioned.

Mr. Keith Hill: Can the Minister confirm that, as a result of the autumn statement, the long planned modernisation of the Northern line will be delayed for at least a further three years? Does not that mean that travel conditions for my constituents in Clapham and Balham on the already atrocious misery line can only get worse?

Mr. Norris: The hon. Gentleman must not be caught in one of those embarrassing political time warps. I suppose that he has read the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report. If he has, he will know that the MMC singled out the Northern line as one on which it had noted a significant improvement in the service.

Mr. Tracey: My hon. Friend has mentioned the MMC report, which says that £700 million per year is required for core funding of the London transport network—the underground and indeed, the bus services. Can my hon. Friend give the House an undertaking that that level of funding will continue to be provided alongside what he said about the Jubilee line and lines such as the Northern line?

Mr. Norris: The figure in the MMC report is London Transport's assessement of the cost of producing the decently modern metro service, to which the Government remain entirely committed. In this year's settlement, London Underground Limited will continue to tackle the backlog of under-investment which the report identifies. Clearly, it is for London Transport to determine the priorities for the investment at its disposal. I confirm to my hon. Friend that we remain entirely committed to the principle.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is it not a fact that in his autumn statement the Chancellor announced a 30 per cent. reduction in capital investment for London Underground, as compared with the figure that was announced in the autumn statement of 1991? The chairman of London Regional Transport says that the reduction will mean that the Northern line modernisation will not go ahead. It will mean the closure of Aldwych station and eventually the loss of 7,000 jobs in the supply industry. Is it not amazing that we have the most expensive underground system in Europe and that we have the angriest travellers, the angriest management and the angriest staff? That is a remarkable achievement, even by the Minister's standards.

Mr. Norris: If I have to pick something to answer out of all those points, I make the point that I understand the hon. Gentleman's disappointment at the level of the settlement, even as he expressed it. However, he will know that investment in the survey period will still be higher than in any year in the 1970s or 1980s. That represents a considerable investment measured in hundreds of millions of pounds—investment not merely to maintain the system in its present state but to improve it, and it excludes the commitment measured in billions to extending the system.

Car Commuting (Central London)

6. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest information he has on the daily car commuting journeys into central London and the equivalent for five years ago.

Mr. Norris: In 1991, the daily number of people entering central London by car during the morning peak was 155,000, down from 166,000 five years previously.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the Minister accept that no less than 17 per cent. of all commuter journeys in and out of central London are made by car, congestion and pollution are getting worse, and the danger to Londoners is growing worse as a consequence? Should not the Minister take steps to reduce further the level of car commuting in and out of central London and concentrate on reducing the cost of bus and train travel, so that this will be a cleaner, safter city in which to live?

Mr. Norris: The actual figure for commuting by car is something like 14 per cent., so I agree with the hon. Gentleman about that. I agree also that our policy should be to contain and, where possible, to reduce car commuting into central London. That is why we devoted substantial funds to improving our public transport network—not only the tube but buses. Bus priority measures include the pilot red route, which I hope the hon. Gentleman agrees has produced considerable benefits. However, I disagree with the hon. Gentleman to the extent that I do not believe that the answer is simply to slash fares. That is a disastrous policy, which would leave the taxpayer with a huge bill merely to cover operating costs —instead of investing resources in improving the system.

Mr. Dunn: Does my hon. Friend the Minister accept that for many people, the car is the only way of gaining access to central London? Will he promise to hold an inquiry in respect of the roadworks on the M20, A20, on two points on the A2 in my constituency, and at the Blackwall tunnel that are all being undertaken simultaneously—that is, at the same time? Will he hold an inquiry, so that we may achieve ease of access from north-west Kent into central London?

Mr. Norris: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is a former education Minister, for pointing out the precise nature of his question. Using grammar as simple as I can muster, I may tell him that I entirely—that is probably the wrong word—rather, wholly accept his comments about the necessity in some cases to use a private car. It is just a shame that some single-issue lobby groups do not appear to recognise the obvious truth of my hon. Friend's observation. As to the particular problems that he mentioned, I will undertake to bring them to the attention of the appropriate officials.

Mr. Harvey: Given the cautious welcome that the Secretary of State for Transport gave recently to proposals for road pricing, will the Minister give an undertaking that any revenue raised from any road pricing scheme will be used to provide an effective and affordable public transport alternative?

Mr. Norris: The hon. Gentleman will note that—subject to your allowing it, Madam Speaker—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will shortly be answering a question on that subject.

Rail Privatisation

7. Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to ensure the continuation of British Rail's safety standards after privatisation.

Mr. Freeman: We are committed to ensuring that high safety standards are maintained. We have asked the Health and Safety Commission to arrange for a thorough study of the safety implications of our proposals and to make detailed recommendations.

Dr. Spink: Is my hon. Friend aware of the concern in south-east Essex following weekend press comment that the Fenchurch Street line may be subject to closure in the future for safety reasons? Will my hon. Friend comment on that, and guarantee that the £50 million made available to British Rail to invest new signalling on the Fenchurch Street line will be ring-fenced? Will my hon. Friend meet me at Benfleet station in December to discuss all those and many other problems on the Fenchurch Street line?

Mr. Freeman: The press speculation is entirely incorrect. I have spoken to the chairman of British Rail, who has confirmed that the investment in signalling on the line has been approved. British Rail is now negotiating with the contractor chosen to install the signalling to ensure that the best possible terms are included in the contract, but there is no doubt that the work will proceed.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the Minister aware that British Rail has made it clear that it will be able to undertake only repairs as opposed to major renewal schemes? Is he prepared to state that the report that he is to receive will be published quickly so that the general public can assess the accuracy of his chaotic plans for privatisation?

Mr. Freeman: British Rail will have the capacity to invest about £1,000 million next year—which will include investment in safety work—following this year's higher figure, which includes preparations for the channel tunnel.

I can give the hon. Lady the assurance that she seeks: we shall publish the Health and Safety Commission report as soon as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received and considered it.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: We have heard that investment in British Rail is reaching a record level. Will my hon. Friend pass on to British Rail a message from the travelling public that they want the money to be spent on improvement in services? Will he tell British Rail that passengers are tired of hearing about British Rail's campaign for yet more funds and feel that, instead of holding out the begging bowl, BR should face up to the challenge offered by privatisation? Only then can the British public be given the real service that they deserve.

Mr. Freeman: The Government have always accepted that investment constitutes one contribution to the improvement of service. That improvement can be seen on the Chiltern and Northampton lines, and will shortly be seen on the Kent link line. On Wednesday, with several other hon. Members, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I will be helping to launch the Kent link service officially. It is to receive £700 million of investment. As for management effort, the citizens charter has made a difference on Network SouthEast. I agree with what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Wilson: Will the Minister now admit that the timetable for this unwanted and unworkable privatisation is in tatters? This country's financial settlement will lead British Rail to close stretches of track on safety grounds because it cannot meet the capital costs; on the other side of the channel, the French Government have just announced a grant of £4 billion for SNCF in the coming year—almost three times the British figure. Which Government have their priorities right? Should the priority be unwanted, unworkable privatisation, or decent investment in a safe public railway system?

Mr. Freeman: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his new post. Sadly, however, he always seems to devalue the strength of his argument by exaggeration.

My right hon. Friend's introduction of a railways Bill clearly depends on the early passage of the paving Bill. I think that all hon. Members would accept that, as a courtesy to the House.

Red Routes

8. Mr. Jessel: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress he is making on the installation of red routes in Greater London.

Mr. Norris: Following the success of the pilot red route, I have designated 315 miles of priority routes. I have set objectives for the traffic director, who is now consulting on his network plan.

Mr. Jessel: Does my hon. Friend agree that the red routes—the brainchild of our former excellent colleague Sir Philip Goodhart—are not being introduced nearly fast enough? When the economy revives, London will face monster traffic jams. Will my hon. Friend ensure that the red routes on the A316 Great Chertsey road and the A4 Cromwell road are put in as quickly as possible, that being the main route into London from Twickenham?

Mr. Norris: As you will know, Madam Speaker, the Great Chertsey road is not only the road into London from Twickenham, but the road down which Bill Sikes took Oliver Twist en route to the blag in Chertsey. With that in mind, we shall of course deal with the matter at an early date. The traffic directors' draft network plan proposes implementation of that section during 1994.

I shall be delighted to pass on my hon. Friend's congratulations and good wishes to Sir Philip Goodhard, who did indeed articulate the original concept.

Ms. Glenda Jackson: Will the Minister reconsider his previous refusal to meet traders in my constituency who view the imposition of red routes in Finchley road as catastrophic? I quote from what they say: "If they are—"[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I should inform all hon. Members that during Question Time they are not allowed to quote.

Ms. Jackson: I apologise, Madam Speaker. The traders in my constituency believe that if red routes are imposed in the Finchley road there is no way that either they or their businesses can survive.

Mr. Norris: As one who has spent all his life in small business—I did not intend it that way; it just turned out that way—I take very seriously indeed the idea that businesses might have been adversely affected by the introduction of the priority routes. I have examined with the greatest care all the evidence that has been submitted to me in an effort to demonstrate that proposition. There is not the slightest evidence that priority routes have had any impact on businesses in the priority route areas. [HON. MEMBERS: "Nonsense."] I hear Opposition Members, from a sedentary position, claim otherwise. They are of a particular mind about red routes, but there is no evidence whatever for the proposition that they advance.

Mr. Bowis: Does my hon. Friend agree that what we have heard is an example of the misinformation going around London about the red routes? Will he redouble his efforts to make sure that the truth about the results of the experiment comes out? Will he constantly point to the improvements through the reduction in pollution and rat running and also to the improvements in bus reliability and the number of legal parking spaces?

Mr. Norris: I agree with my hon. Friend. Certain political positions were taken up on the matter by Opposition Members. The obvious advantages of the scheme now being evident, they are in some difficulty. They continue to peddle alarming disinformation—for example, regarding the supposed disadvantages to shopkeepers in the area. The reality is exactly as my hon. Friend says: improved safety, improved bus reliability and the much better management of traffic in the area, to the benefit of all concerned.

Railway Manufacture

9. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take measures to ensure the continued possibility of the manufacture of railway locomotives and rolling stock in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and I have already taken such measures. In his autumn statement last week, my right hon. Friend announced, in addition to further substantial external financing limits for British Rail, new leasing arrangements which would allow British Rail to order an extra £150 million of new rolling stock in the run-up to privatisation.

Mr. Bayley: I welcome that change. The Government are welcome to plunder the Labour party manifesto for many more of our proposals. Will the Secretary of State ensure that British Rail has the revenue to pay the leasing costs? Will he specifically seek to obtain the Chancellor of the Exchequer's approval to reverse the £40 million cut in British Rail's finances announced in the autumn statement the week before last? Will he also seek to ensure that British Rail's budget is not cut to £1,500 million in the following year and to £1,080 million in 18 months' time? Is the Minister aware that when his colleague the Minister for Public Transport was in York on Thursday last week he described as "bunkum" my fear that job losses would result from the under-financing of British Rail—just hours before the British Railways Board announced 5,000 redundancies? Or was the Minister for Public Transport not aware that those redundancies were coming? Did the Secretary of State not tell him?

Mr. MacGregor: I cannot answer all the hon. Gentleman's questions or I should be here for 20 minutes, but I will answer some of them. The announcement that British Rail made last week on voluntary redundancies—a commercial decision that it reached—had nothing to do with privatisation or anything announced in the autumn statement. Like any company with falling revenue and rising costs, it took action to deal with that. The redundancies will be voluntary, and British Rail has an extremely good record for so managing staff reductions over many years. As a result of the autumn statement, compared with the 1970s and 1980s British Rail will be able to make record capital investment of about £1 billion over the next three years. Part of the graph of the external financing limit reflects the fact that, this year and in the forthcoming year, we shall peak on rolling stock for the channel tunnel.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Charters

30. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what new charters he intends to introduce.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. William Waldegrave: Twenty-seven charters have been published so far. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor will publish his courts charter on Wednesday, and five more charters will be published in the next six months.

Mr. Flynn: Does the Chancellor think that our democracy would be improved by the introduction of a voters charter, which would create an elected second Chamber and put controls on national spending at election time? The Register of Members' Interests for the previous Parliament showed that 14 per cent. of Labour Members had outside jobs, whereas 85 per cent. of Conservative Members had two, three and sometimes four or five salaries from outside. As name tags are a main feature of the charters, would not a voters charter benefit from having a list that hon. Members could wear on their lapels showing the companies that are filling those Members' pockets with money, so that voters and the House would know whether Members were speaking on behalf of their constituents or on behalf of Megagreed plc?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am afraid that the question goes a little wider than my responsibilities, wide though they are. I used to be a supporter of an elected upper Chamber, and if we had one with a solid Conservative majority, which would be the result, we might have less difficulty in that Chamber. I hear what the hon. Gentleman says about the other matters and will report them to the Leader of the House, who is the proper recipient.

Mr. Nicholls: Does my right hon. Friend agree that what he said today about the courts charter will be most welcome news to members of the public, witnesses and practitioners who have had to cope with the vagaries of the system? Will he accept my word for it that the way in which listing hearings take place often shows scant regard for those who need to use the criminal courts and simply means that important items are decided according to the whim of court listing clerks?

Mr. Waldegrave: I believe that my noble and learned Friend's charter will be widely welcomed, but I must leave it to him to present it on Wednesday. Many of my constituents, perhaps like those of other hon. Members, have been disappointed by the way in which they have been treated by the courts whether as witnesses or as victims. The charter will be welcome in setting proper targets for the courts' treatment of people.

Ms. Mowlam: Does the Minister accept that the letters that I have received from constituents do not talk about the wonders of the charter, but show that they think that the Minister's handling of it has made it more of a farce than an asset to consumers? Does he accept that his credibility as a Minister is in doubt when he claims, as he has in the House, to have no departmental responsibility for monitoring specific charters or for providing information? Despite that, he still believes that he is the Minister for open government. Surely his failure to stand up to Ministers at the Foreign Office means that he is not up to the job.

Mr. Waldegrave: I think that the hon. Member may have strayed into the wrong debate. If, as an Opposition spokesman, she did not receive letters criticising the Government there would not be much point in her existence. The point of the central campaign is to get charters established throughout the public service. That has been done and I think that the hon. Member will find that the White Paper that we publish on Wednesday will catalogue formidable progress in the past year.

Research (South Dorset)

31. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much Government-funded research is carried out in South Dorset.

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend's constituency of South Dorset has a wide range of important Government-funded research facilities. They are as follows: the Defence Research Agency at Southwell, Portland and Holton Heath; AEA Technology at Winfrith; MAFF Fish Diseases Laboratory at Weymouth; the NERC Institute of Freshwater Ecology at Wareham; and the NERC Institute of Terrestrial Ecology, also at Wareham.

Mr. Bruce: I thank my right hon. Friend for that excellent list and for the research that he has done. Will he reflect that although we have an immediate problem with the reduction of military research and the research at AEA Technology, Winfrith, we have a long-term opportunity for both Government and private industry to come down and use this excellent centre of research in my constituency?

Mr. Waldegrave: I strongly support what my hon. Friend says. The list shows the strength and depth of the scientific resources and the people involved in science and technology in his constituency. They constitute a major national asset.

Mr. Connarty: As the Government have decided today to abandon one source of energy research—fast breeder programme—what money is being given and will be given to examining the potential for energy from bio-fuels? Can the Minister give us some idea of the key areas in that field which his new Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology will be targeting?

Mr. Waldegrave: The ending of the long research programme on fast breeders has been judged broadly as being the right decision, sad though it is. I note the comments of Lord Marshall of Goring on that in the newspapers today. There is other work going on, and on the very matter that the hon. Gentleman mentioned—bio-mass—early work is being done and more will no doubt be done in the future.

Citizens Charter

33. Dr. Twinn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has had in European Council of Ministers meetings on application of the principles of the citizens charter.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service and Science (Mr. Robert Jackson): Although I have had a useful meeting with my French opposite number about the citizens charter, it has not yet been discussed in meetings of the European Council of Ministers. The citizens charter and the British approach to improving public services is, however, attracting interest in many European countries. We shall be describing some of our achievements at a Europe-wide conference on service for the citizen on 3 and [illegible] December. This is being organised in London as one of our presidency events.

Dr. Twinn: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the conference. Does he share my sense of disappointment that our partners in the European Commission have shown insufficient interest in producing the levels of accountability and efficiency in the public services that we are learning to demand in this country? Will he redouble his efforts to ensure that they do show it?

Mr. Jackson: I can certainly give my hon. Friend that assurance. One of the problems with the Commission is that it is not a direct provider of services to the public. The charter concept focuses on the direct provision of services to the public. We certainly intend to ensure that the Commission is kept fully abreast of these important developments.

Mr. Winnick: Do European Ministers not ask the obvious question: what use is the charter to so many people in this country who are losing their jobs and facing tremendous problems as unemployment continues to mount? Does not all this illustrate the fact that the charter is just a cosmetic exercise when seen by people who daily face the possibility of unemployment lasting months or perhaps years? They know that all this is just a mockery.

Mr. Jackson: That is not so. In other European countries there is a keen awareness of the dilemmas—of the need to control public expenditure while meeting rising expectations of quality in public services. Our approach is seen as interesting and innovative in that direction. I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the recent campaign in the United States, where Governor Clinton campaigned on the slogan of re-inventing government, involving the use of techniques pioneered in this country.

We in Britain pioneered privatisation around the world; now we are taking the lead around the world in the improvement of public services.

35. Mr. Moate: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he intends to issue his White Paper on the progress of the citizens charter.

Mr. Waldegrave: On Wednesday.

Mr. Moate: Will my right hon. Friend put paid in the White Paper to any rumours that British Rail is seeking to reduce the standards and targets set in the passengers charter, particularly those in respect of punctuality, because it is said that British Rail is finding them too hard to achieve? Does he agree that my constituents and other travellers in Kent expect, as set out in the charter, the highest standards of punctuality, time keeping, regular services, and cleanliness—and the new rolling stock which was the subject of an earlier question of mine that was not reached?

Mr. Waldegrave: As my hon. Friend would expect, BR's targets for next year are under negotiation with the Department of Transport. The presumption behind the citizens charter programme is that standards should rise.

Mr. Kaufman: What use are the charters to our constituents when, if we, as hon. Members, raise with Ministers cases involving social security, employment, immigration and many other matters, instead of responding to us Ministers shuffle us off to unaccountable quangos, agencies and units? When will the Government end that farce and restore the proper accountability of Ministers to the House of Commons?

Mr. Waldegrave: The accountability of agencies, to which the right hon. Member has referred, is perfectly clear. Chief executives answer for management issues which have been delegated to them, but the line of accountability to the House remains absolutely, as it was, to Ministers. That is the truth.

Mr. Dickens: Does my right hon. Friend agree that despite the sneers from the Opposition, the citizens charter is extremely popular? It gives people—council tenants, workers and hospital patients—their rights. There are no faceless people on the end of the telephone who will not give their names. This is what the people want and we are giving it to them. That is upsetting the Opposition no end.

Mr. Waldegrave: Not for the first time in the House, my hon. Friend speaks for the ordinary people of this country. The Opposition speak for the provider groups—the public sector trade unions and the old gangs who have not provided the service that we need.

Ms. Hoey: Will the White Paper take into account the effect of the pay freeze, which will mean a cut in the wages of most workers in the public sector? Does the Chancellor agree that staff morale, which his Department concedes is so crucial to the implementation of charters, is likely to continue to decline so long as unemployment continues to grow and the Government have no strategy for job creation?

Mr. Waldegrave: Restraint in public sector pay is exactly a strategy for job preservation and job creation elsewhere. What is more, the new earnings survey shows that in the past two years public sector pay settlements have run ahead of private sector pay settlements by a significant amount.

Mr. Kaufman: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In view of the Minister's reply, I give notice that I will raise the matter on the Adjournment of the House.

Madam Speaker: I do not believe that it was the substantive question of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) in any event, but I take his point.

Mr. Spring: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is extraordinary that the Opposition parties, who are supposed to be so committed to freedom of information, are so opposed to the publication of information about schools' performance which has been so widely welcomed by many parents around the country?

Mr. Waldegrave: I strongly agree with my hon. Friend. It was very noticeable that, of the nine leader articles that appeared the next day, only the Daily Mirror remained loyal to the Labour line. I do not understand how the Labour party can be against the provision of information to the users of a service, even though I now understand that the Leader of the Opposition was pushed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister into taking his line on the matter.

Patients Charter

37. Ms. Eagle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress is being made under (a) the patients charter and (b) other charters.

Mr. Robert Jackson: We have made considerable progress through legislation and the publication of the 27 follow-up charters referred to by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy. As he has said, we shall shortly publish a White Paper describing progress to date and our plans for future developments.

Ms. Eagle: I thank the Minister for that response. Does he agree that the patients charter is now regarded by most people as nothing short of a sick joke, given that waiting lists are rising again and cuts in expenditure on the health service mean that services are being denied and cut despite the glossy promises in what is now a sham and a pointless, useless waste of time?

Mr. Jackson: I think that the hon. Lady is ill informed in speaking of cuts in spending on the national health service. Half the people who are given appointments in the NHS are seen within five weeks, the two-year maximum waiting list has been imposed since April and the 18-month waiting list will be reduced for hip, knee and cataract operations from April 1993. Substantial progress is being made in the health service under the citizens charter.

Mr. Rowe: Will my right hon. Friend confirm my clear impression that the most valuable feature of what the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has published to date has been that management at all levels have come together to discuss and work out ways in which their services can be made much more responsive to the public and that, for example, recent publication of the charter by the Kent police has been very widely welcomed within Kent and is serving as a model for forces elsewhere?

Mr. Jackson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. My right hon. Friend was able to visit the police in Kent very recently and see them at first hand. My hon. Friend is right to draw a connection between the charter and better management in public services. The charter is not simply a matter of pious aspirations, as the Opposition seem to think. It is rooted in the whole development of thinking about how to organise great organisations such as the public sector. What we are introducing across the board is management by contract. Management by contract implies management by standards, and management by standards expresses and underpins what has been done through the citizens charter.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: As the Royal Cornwall hospitals trust in Cornwall was the latest to announce ward cuts and closures as a result of financial difficulties, will the Minister confirm weekend press reports that he and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster are about to concede that the health charter and the rail charter failed to meet their targets?

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Gentleman is entirely misinformed. Our objective with the charters is that standards should be realistic, that they should be demanding and that they should be reviewed with a view to improving them and extending them to make them more demanding.

Citizens Charter

38. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will meet members of the Bolton Forum, when he next visits the north-west, to discuss the workings of the citizens' charter.

Mr. Waldegrave: As my hon. Friend knows, I am visiting Bolton tomorrow. Although a formal meeting with the Bolton Forum is not in my programme, I hope to meet individual members in the course of the day.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. Friend find many opportunities to visit Bolton, not only to meet members of the Bolton Forum, which is proving to be an excellent example of successful partnership between the public and private sectors, but to visit the successful city challenge schemes and, I hope, have further opportunities to visit the theatre?

Mr. Waldegrave: The latter item to which my hon. Friend referred depends on my right hon. Friend the Chief Whip. On the former point, I am delighted to see the £37·5 million that is now potentially available to Bolton over the next five years for city challenge, and I congratulate my hon. Friend on the part that he took in winning that money for his constituents.

Market Testing

39. Mr. Deva: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will publish figures showing the year-on-year increase in the amount of central Government market testing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Details of our market testing plans for the period to 30 September 1993 will be published on Wednesday, but I am happy to state now that we expect well over £1 billion worth of services to be market tested by the end of September next year. This compares with an average of about £25 million in previous years.

Mr. Deva: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the dramatic improvement in market testing that has occurred so far. Will he ensure that those improved efficiencies will be passed on to the consumer?

Mr. Waldegrave: I can confirm that the improved efficiencies and indeed any savings that there might be within Departments will be available to those Departments to plough back into the very services where efficiency gains are being made, for the benefit of those services and for those who use them.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that in the past two or three days there has been a lot of market testing going on, and it has gone along the following lines: "Do you think that the British public should have to pay for the fire at Windsor castle?" The market testing returns are of the order of 90 per cent. against.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is aware that we have a statement on that matter later.

Mr. Skinner: Ninety per cent. of the British public are against paying for the fire at Windsor castle. The Queen should be made to pay for it. That is the market test this weekend. Instead of talking about all that consumer crap, the right hon. Gentleman should make sure that she pays for the fire.

Mr. Waldegrave: I think that the level of the hon. Gentleman's thoughts are about the same as the level of his language. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage got it much nearer right when he said that the hearts of people in this country have gone out to Her Majesty the Queen over that tragedy.

Public Services

40. Mr. Lidington: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what measures he has adopted to increase the availability of information about the performance of the public services.

Mr. Robert Jackson: The citizens charter calls on all public services to provide more and better information on their performance. Details of the improvements in public service performance will be set out in the White Paper to be published on Wednesday.

Mr. Lidington: Will my hon. Friend confirm that from next year the parents charter will give further information to parents about the performance of the state schools to which they send their children? Will he and his colleagues continue to reject calls from the teachers' unions and the Opposition to maintain secrecy?

Mr. Jackson: I can certainly give that assurance to my hon. Friend. The publication of schools charters and the information flowing from them are an important step forward in the charter movement. My hon. Friend asks about the publication of performance standards. I visited the Employment Service in the north-east last week and saw for myself the publication of citizens charter performance standards in Employment Service offices. A great deal of performance against those standards is now being published.

Mr. William O'Brien: When the Minister obtains information about local services, will he take into consideration the fact that organisations are saying that, because of lack of resources, the indicators prove that there is a reduction in the service being provided for the public? Will the Minister take on board the information that points to a reduction in services, and the fact that resources for local services should be improved?

Mr. Jackson: I ask the hon. Gentleman to tell me the specific stories afterwards. My understanding is that charter standards are leading to increases in services provided, but I shall consider any case that he might bring forward.

GATT

3.30 pm

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Heseltine): With permission, I should like to make a statement about the latest developments in the GATT Uruguay round of trade negotiations.

As many hon. Members will have heard, the European Commission and the United States Government announced on Friday that they had reached agreement on the remaining issues separating them in the negotiations. Those included key points in the GATT agriculture agreement, and the separate but related trade dispute over Community support for oilseeds production.

That is excellent news. It opens the way to a full GATT agreement between all 108 parties to the Uruguay round. Most immediately, it removes the threat of an imminent trade war with the United States over oilseeds.

I should like to congratulate the two Commissioners directly involved, Mr. MacSharry and Mr. Andriessen, as well as the United States negotiators—Mr. Madigan, the Agriculture Secretary and Mrs. Hills, the United States Trade Representative. I should also pay tribute to my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who have done so much to work for the agreement.

The main features of the agreement were, on agriculture, the cutting of quantities of subsidised exports by 21 per cent. and on oilseeds, a limit on the area under cultivation. We have still to see all the details, but it would appear that a GATT agriculture agreement on those lines will be broadly consistent with the reforms of the common agricultural policy regimes agreed by the Community last summer. The Commission will be preparing a report on compatibility with CAP reform.

That is in any case just one of the whole package of Uruguay round agreements. The results should be judged on the balance between all the elements. The Council of Ministers will take a final decision on whether to accept the deal when all the elements are in place.

Talks will be restarting in Geneva this week so that the other 95 participants in the Uruguay round can consider what has been agreed. I believe that it is possible to complete the negotiations this year and we will be urging all parties to reach a conclusion as soon as possible. Apart from agreeing the necessary changes to the agriculture text tabled by the GATT director-general, Mr. Dunkel, at the end of last year, there remains a great deal of work on other aspects of the Uruguay round negotiations.

Negotiations on liberalisation of trade in services and tariff reductions have to be completed. Much work had already been done on this and was waiting for a final resolution on agriculture. Final agreement is needed on the establishment of a multilateral trade organisation and a single dispute settlement system covering all the GATT agreements. Legal texts must be finalised for all the agreements—not only agriculture, services and tariffs, but intellectual property and investment, textiles, anti-dumping, subsidies and a whole range of other GATT rules and procedures. This is a formidable agenda much remains to be done.

Completion of the negotiations this year would meet the target set by the Munich G7 economic summit, and by the Birmingham European Council. It would enable texts to be ready for presentation to the United States Congress before the 2 March deadline under their "fast track" approval procedure.

Let me remind the House what that will mean. It will mean perhaps $200 billion extra yearly output for the world by the end of this decade. It will mean improved opportunities for our exporters. It will mean that we are able to take advantage of increased trade in services. It will mean that our inventors and artists have a better protection for their intellectual property—it has been estimated that the United Kingdom record industry alone loses £1 billion a year through piracy. For developing countries it will mean western markets being more open to their agricultural and textiles products. The gains to them from increased trade could exceed the total western aid budget.

In short, this is a good deal—for the United Kingdom, for the European Community, for the United States, for the developing countries, and for the world. With determination and good will on all sides, I believe that such an agreement can be reached by the end of the year. I hope, therefore, that the whole House will join me in welcoming the achievement of the Community and the United States.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): All parts of the House will join the President of the Board of Trade in congratulating the negotiators to the GATT treaty, particularly Ray MacSharry, who might well have felt that it was not his job to return to those negotiations. However, he has helped to break out of a difficult stalemate to achieve an honourable agreement.

The whole House will also share the right hon. Gentleman's relief that the world is not to be plunged into a trade war in which everyone would have lost. Does he agree that it is important that other countries do not draw the conclusion from the American experience that all that is necessary to secure concessions is to threaten to start a trade war? Will he therefore confirm that the agreement that has now been reached involves concessions on the United States side, concessions which the United States negotiator initially rejected?

I endorse what the President of the Board of Trade said about the boost that the agreement will provide to the poorest countries, which are most in need of greater access to the wealthier markets of the west and which had most to lose if talks had broken down between the two main trading blocks of the west. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that all 100 member countries that are parties to the GATT talks stand to gain from that agreement.

Some in the House may be surprised that the right hon. Gentleman made a statement without reference to the well-known objections taken by France to the agreement that has been reached. Will he therefore take this opportunity to confirm that it is also true that France will be a net beneficiary of a GATT agreement? Will he also take this opportunity to urge the Government of France to accept the GATT talks and the GATT agreement in the round and not to judge it by the single issue of farm subsidies, because French industry stands to gain more than French farmers will lose?

May I press the President of the Board of Trade on the problems that are still outstanding? Agreements are still to be concluded on financial services, telecommunications and maritime services—the right hon. Gentleman referred to some of those difficulties in his statements. How confident is he that those difficulties will be overcome before the March deadline, when the fast-track mandate runs out for the United States Congress? Has he had any indication that the President-elect would be interested in rolling forward that fast-track mandate for a further year, were that to prove necessary?

The President of the Board of Trade will understand that a statement on trade and tariffs today will be judged by the House against the background of the trade figures on which he has not volunteered a statement today. Those figures show another increase in the visible trade gap, which is now running at an annualised rate of £14,000 million with the other countries that are party to GATT, or £1 million for the time it will take the House to discuss the statement. Is the right hon. Gentleman not concerned that, for the first time in a recession, Britain is seeing imports rise faster than exports? Does he accept that the single most important change in our pattern of trade with the world during the many years of the GATT talks is that, until the early 1980s, Britain never had a deficit in trade in manufactured goods, but, since then, it has never had a surplus in its trade in manufactured goods?

Will the right hon. Gentleman now admit that the stimulus that GATT will provide to world trade, if it is successful, makes it all the more urgent that the Government start to stimulate investment in new plant to provide training and skills and offer the strategy for industry that is now essential to rebuild the manufacturing capacity that they have destroyed and which we need to compete in world trade?

Mr. Heseltine: It is sad that the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), who began by so warmly welcoming the important and positive aspects of my statement, characteristically sought to cloud the good news by trying to divert attention away from it. That is characteristic of the Opposition's mean-minded approach.

May I display my characteristic generosity and concentrate on the early parts of the hon. Gentleman's response. The position is not quite as simple as he suggested by implying that one needs only to start a trade war to achieve results. Two issues were involved and were running concurrently. One was the dispute between the Community and the United States over oilseeds, which had been the subject of continuing discussion in which the Americans believed that they had used all the appropriate means open to them to get redress. GATT panels found on their side twice, yet no progress had been made. In the end, GATT persuaded the Americans to take the steps that they took—dangerous steps, without a shadow of a doubt.

But that matter was coincidental with the negotiations proceeding towards a settlement of the areas outstanding in the present Uruguay round. Inevitably, the two matters became interrelated, and it is to the credit of those who negotiated a settlement that they took that extremely difficult issue and resolved both the matters satisfactorily.

The second issue about which the hon. Gentleman asked was the position of France. I have never tried to pretend—nobody could—that the French Government do not have problems with their agricultural interests. However, the hon. Gentleman is right to say that France relies on its agricultural economy perhaps only to the extent of 5 per cent. Therefore, for the overwhelming majority of French commercial and industrial interests, a successful conclusion of the GATT round is as much in the interests of France as the rest of the world.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether I was confident that, under the renewed GATT procedures, we shall be able to make progress. I can only hope that that is so, and I wish those responsible every good fortune. Everybody knows that the rest of the world has had to stand apart while the disputes between America and the Community have been resolved. They are now back in the picture and will have their own views and self-interests. But they will appreciate, as did the hon. Gentleman, that the fast-track opportunity in the United States expires on 2 March and that it is, therefore, to everybody's interest to get within that arrangement—not to consider extending it, as the hon. Gentleman said, but to take advantage of the existing window that is now open in the American procedures.

No one should understate the dramatic opportunity for the whole world, particularly the less-developed world, of a successful outcome of the sixth Uruguay round.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): Although I welcome the agreement that has been reached, is it not true that what may be good news for world trade in the long term may prove to be rather bad news for farmers in the short term? Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that our farmers will not be significantly worse off under the terms of this agreement than they would have been under the original CAP reform package? So that the House may decide exactly what is going on, can the financial details be laid before us as soon as possible?

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who displays a rightful concern for agricultural interests in this country. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food believes that the present agreement between the United States and the European Community is compatible with the CAP reform announced earlier this year. That does not mean that there are no difficulties for farmers within the CAP reform, but they are not exacerbated by the GATT negotiations.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Does the President of the Board of Trade accept that there is considerable relief among Liberal Democrat Members that a trade war has been averted and that progress is being made towards the eventual settlement of the GATT round? However, may I take up the points made by the hon. Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord)? The settlement and the CAP reforms will further squeeze farm incomes throughout the Community, and rural communities need measures to help compensate for that. Will the right hon. Gentleman assure us that attention will be given to that? Does he also accept that the final shake-out of the GATT round will have a far-reaching effect on many industries and requires a Community-wide strategy to ensure that we can take full advantage of it, defeat unemployment and have a regional policy? When does he think that our balance of payments deficit will be turned into a surplus?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Member asks me to go further than I went in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord). We all realise the pressures applied on the agricultural industry as a result of the CAP reform, but it is the view of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that the agreements reached last Friday are compatible with the

[Mr. Heseltine]

CAP reforms announced earlier. The CAP reforms contain measures, particularly agri-environmental measures, designed to help the sort of people to whom the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) referred.

The wider issue of the balance of trade is a matter of concern. The position in terms of the manufacturing industry has been deteriorating for most of the post-war period. It is a profoundly important issue, but not one to be discussed in this context.

Mr. Paul Channon (Southend, West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there will be a wide feeling of relief at the successful conclusion of the talks? They have, after all, taken six years, as they started under the previous British presidency. Does not my right hon. Friend's statement show how important it is to set up a new disputes machinery so that the damaging row between the Americans and the Community will not occur again? How does my right hon. Friend see the way forward for negotiations within the Community? Can matters be settled by qualified majority, or does the Luxembourg compromise still exist? I thought that it had been abolished in 1983.

Mr. Heseltine: My right hon. Friend shows a perceptive understanding of many of the problems involved. Everyone feels a sense of frustration that it has been six years since the talks got under way. People have a clear understanding of the scale of the potential opportunity available. By our failure to reach agreement, we have prevented such success coming at the pace that we would like.

My right hon. Friend was perfectly right to say that one of the issues that had frustrated progress was the inadequacy of the disputes machinery. It is to be welcomed that, within the text proposed by the director-general of GATT, an improved disputes machinery is there to be negotiated. It is important to stress that, within the agreement between the United States and the Community, a peace clause has been injected so that both sides know that when the agreement has been reached there is no recourse to further reopening of the issues in the context of the agreement. Such a reopening of the issues could destabilise the agreement.

As for qualified majority voting, I believe that the position is that the Commission, which is authorised to negotiate on behalf of the Community, is now empowered to move back into the GATT talks in Geneva and negotiate there as the Community's representative. When and if a satisfactory outcome to a GATT round is achieved, it will be for the Community at large—the Council of Ministers—to determine whether that agreement, taken in the round, is acceptable. That decision is taken by the Council of Ministers by qualified majority voting, and it is to be greatly questioned whether the Luxembourg compromise is relevant in such circumstances.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): It is well appreciated in Canberra and Wellington that Ministers here have kept in close touch with Australia and New Zealand about the negotiations. As for the multinational trade agreement that is still to be concluded, may we be assured that there will be continuing close contact with Australia and New Zealand, and all member countries of the Cairns group, as with Commonwealth countries generally?

Mr. Heseltine: I am extremely grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for raising that issue—what he has said is accurate. During our presidency of the Community—and as a nation which sees wider world trade as economically beneficial to the world community—we have tried to keep in touch with those people not directly immersed in the dispute across the Atlantic. I confirm what the right hon. Gentleman said—we have kept closely in touch with the Cairns group of Ministers. I can go further and say that now that the GATT process has returned to Geneva, we shall continue to keep in touch across the world and use our good offices to bring about a speedy resolution of outstanding matters. Such a policy will embrace a continuing relationship with the Cairns Ministers and a wider Commonwealth connection.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): I add my thanks to my right hon. Friend and his team for the success that has been achieved to date. I wish, however, to emphasise what lies ahead. With responsibility for access to, and reduced tariffs in, the world market, there comes a responsibility for true and fair prices. Does my right hon. Friend recognise that the textile industry in particular is looking to the conclusion of anti-dumping arrangements that are more meaningful than those which emerged from the previous GATT round?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend raises a most important issue. The position of the textile industry is especially important in the GATT round, because the multi-fibre arrangement is designed to be phased out and replaced as GATT arrangements come in place. The position of the United Kingdom is clear: we are determined to ensure as best we can, with all the energies that we possess, the interests of the United Kingdom textile industry. The House will be glad to know that in the draft GATT agreement there are provisions for a transitional period of 10 years. The agreement offers better protection, for example, for intellectual property rights, improved GATT rules against unfair or disruptive trade and the prospects of greater access to other markets. I have in mind especially the high tariffs on textiles that are maintained by the United States and certain developing countries, which would be beneficially affected downwards.

Mr. Bryan Davies (Oldham, Central and Royton): I share the relief that a damaging trade war with the United States has been averted and that the MFA will continue, to the benefit of my constituents. Will the President of the Board of Trade accept that he should not be so evasive about the other significant trade factor, which is the sign that Britain is not paying its way? Yet again, disastrous balance of payments figures have been recorded. Unless policies that bear on the engineering industry and manufacturing industry generally are changed, the opportunities demonstrated by the GATT round will not be available to the United Kingdom in full measure.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman must not have been present in the Chamber when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his autumn statement, as a result of which we saw interest rates coming down, new tax allowances to encourage investment and a range of announcements to stimulate capital expenditure, plus a determined attack upon inflationary wage claims that would otherwise undermine Britain's competitiveness.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): I warmly welcome the agreement and extend congratulations to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who, in his capacity of President of the European Council of Ministers, is reputed to have played an important and valuable role. But may I put it to my right hon. Friend—I am sure that he is fully aware of this—that not only French farmers are concerned about the agreement? Farmers in my constituency—and, I am sure, throughout the country—are extremely worried. Does he understand that it would not be acceptable for set-aside to be raised above 15 per cent? Farmers in my constituency will look to the Government for special help to cushion the effect of all this.

Mr. Heseltine: I am sure that my hon. Friend will want to explore the matter with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, but I understand that Commissioner Ray MacSharry has said specifically that there is no likelihood of set-aside being increased above 15 per cent.

As for my hon. Friend's tribute to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, there is not the slightest shadow of doubt that no one did more in a benign way to influence the outcome of the agreement last Friday. There is not the slightest doubt that his relentless pursuit of sanity and reason helped to achieve the agreement that has been warmly welcomed this afternoon.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I regard "benign way" as a studied insult to the Prime Minister. Is the Secretary of State aware that, contrary to all the opinion that has been expressed up till now about GATT being wonderful and beautiful, the view still prevails among socialists—those who believe in intervention in the internal market of the economy and the external market—that GATT will not ensure full employment, a regional policy, a position in which our coal industry does not have to compete with slave labour economies in Colombia and South Africa and a situation in which farmers and farm workers in Britain do not have to compete with the sunshine states of Florida and California?

Some of us believe that there is no such thing as a level playing field in world economics. The truth is that, while people are clamouring for GATT, the net result will be that third-world economies will suffer, as will people in this country because the dole queues will increase.

Mr. Heseltine: We have just heard the voice of the international brotherhood of man. The hon. Gentleman tells us of the views that still prevail among socialists. The question for this House is whether any socialists still prevail.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Hastings and Rye): May I add my welcome for, and relief about, the agreement to the welcome already expressed by other hon. Members? I am glad that my right hon. Friend has told us when he expects a general agreement to be concluded. Can he say whether that final agreement will be discussed in the EC under the British presidency or the future Danish presidency and also whether the French could delay agreement until after their Assembly elections?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend will not be surprised to hear me say that we are working on that problem. We very much hope that the agreement will be concluded under the British presidency, but it must be clearly understood that it is not now within the gift of the EC to dictate the pace at which the GATT round makes progress.

Having answered the first half of my hon. Friend's question in that way, it follows that the answer to the second half is that, just as we are not in a position to bring forward the ultimate conclusion, neither are we in a position to disrupt progress. All that is now within the GATT negotiating machinery.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I join hon. Members on both sides of the House in welcoming the fact that a damaging trade war has been averted. The President said that the agreement was broadly consistent with the agreement on reform of the common agricultural policy. Is he aware that, even if it is only minutely inconsistent with that agreement, that could mean the end for tens of thousands of Welsh hill farmers? I urge him to make available all the details as soon as possible, because morale in the industry is very low.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will have heard me say that the full details of last Friday's agreement have not yet been made available to us, but that the broad declaration has made it clear that the terms are consistent with the CAP reforms. The hon. Gentleman has a particular interest in agriculture, especially hill farming. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is as concerned as the hon. Gentleman about that category and, indeed, about all categories of agriculture. He will carefully study how the new agreement will affect hill farmers.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Has it not been demonstrated in the House this afternoon that we are all in favour of free trade until it affects our particular interest or industry—whether it is coal, hill farming in Wales, farming, textiles or manufacturing industry that is protected in this country? In view of the prejudice that has been shown in the House, will there be any opportunity for third-world countries truly to take advantage of the GATT agreement?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend raises a most important point. The answer to his question is yes, there will be every opportunity for third-world countries. Although in the negotiations leading to a successful GATT round every country is bound to argue for its national self-interest, in the end all countries have to consider the agreement in the round to judge whether they gain more than they lose. Some industries or some sectors of industries in individual countries may not think of themselves as natural winners, but the overall national interest and the overall trading interests of the world gain. It will not be possible for those countries that are adversely affected in some small way to use that as an excuse for denying the third world the opportunities that are built into a successful GATT round.

Mr. Campbell-Savours (Workington): How can a reduction in rapeseed and cereal exports be secured without increasing set-aside above 15 per cent?

Mr. Heseltine: I have already explained that the GATT agreements are compatible, as we are advised, with the common agricultural policy reforms. Obviously, the compatibility of them will be explored when the full details of the settlement are available. Of course, a certain set-aside provision is already anticipated in the CAP reforms.

Mr. Mark Robinson (Somerton and Frome): I am sure that my right hon. Friend, like me, will welcome the day when the Opposition are prepared to support and welcome a settlement such as the GATT agreement, which has been asked for and demanded by British farmers consistently. The settlement is welcomed in Somerset.

Will my right hon. Friend and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food do all in their power to persuade the French Government to place the broader international interest above the interest of a few French farmers?

Mr. Heseltine: I can assure my hon. Friend that there has been a continued dialogue between Ministers in Her Majesty's Government and Ministers in the French Government. That dialogue will continue.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): The President of the Board of Trade has said that he believes and hopes that the GATT agreement will be concluded by the end of the year in accordance with the wishes and aspirations of the G7 countries. Although Opposition Members would welcome a conclusion if it were possible, we accept that there are so many ramifications, difficulties and negotiations that we may be looking at the deadline of 2 March. Of course, that brings in the confluence with the elections in France.

In his statement, the President of the Board of Trade said that the agreements reached in America were "broadly" in line with the CAP reforms in May. The matter is of great importance to the French, and it will have to be dealt with, beyond simply reaching a broadly consistent agreement.

The right hon. Gentleman will remember our last debate on the multi-fibre arrangement when the hon. Members for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) and for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) and my hon. Friends the Members for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) and for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Davies) raised the issue. As he is aware, the multi-fibre arrangement ends on 31 December. Although we welcome his statement that there may be 10 years protection for our textile industry as a consequence of the new GATT arrangements, can he give an undertaking that, between now and 31 December, the multi-fibre arrangement will be extended?

Mr. Heseltine: We anticipate that the multi-fibre arrangement will, in some way, be the subject of a carry-over arrangement until the new GATT arrangement is in place. At present, the Community is negotiating with suppliers of textiles to the Community to ensure that satisfactory arrangements are in place in any interregnum. For example, agreement has been reached with Hong Kong.

The hon. Member asked about the use of the word "broadly". One must use that word because, for example, the CAP reforms have not yet embraced wine or sugar. There is not a finalised agreement that can be set alongside the Friday arrangement, so we must use words that show that there are still matters of uncertainty but that within the broad view there will still be compatibility.

I fully understand the position of the French Government. They entered into a negotiation which gave authority to the Commission to negotiate on a certain basis. The Commission must satisfy all members of the Community that it has discharged that authority within the remits that it was given. It believes that it has done so. The Commission must continue any further discussions on the matter.

I do not disagree with the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that there are many ramifications ahead. That is certainly the case, but the Commission must now make progress. It is not for individual countries within the Community to frustrate that position. The ability of individual countries in the Community to make a judgment will depend on a successful outcome of the entire GATT round, when it will be put to the Council of Ministers for qualified majority approval.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. There is another statement and, as the House knows, I take points of order after all the statements have been completed.

Windsor Castle (Fire)

4.4 pm

The Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mr. Peter Brooke): With permission, I should like to make a statement to the House about the tragic fire at Windsor castle.

Shortly before midday on Friday, a fire started in or near the private chapel close to the state apartments. It took hold rapidly. The county fire service arrived within eight minutes and built up to 39 fire appliances and more than 200 firefighters. By late afternoon, the fire had been contained in the north-east corner of the castle. The fire services continued fighting the fire throughout Friday night, and by Saturday morning it had been largely extinguished.

The fire severely damaged several of the state rooms in the north-east corner of the castle, including St. George's hall and the grand reception room. An extremely effective pre-planned salvage operation was carried out to remove pictures, furnishings, carpets and other valuables from threatened rooms.

I visited the castle on Saturday and saw the extent of the damage. I am sure that the House will wish to join me in saying to Her Majesty that we share with her the sadness of the devastation of what is, at one and the same time, her home, a major state building, and a unique asset and attraction of our national heritage.

I would like to pay tribute to the county fire services, to the Windsor castle auxiliary fire service, and to all those who so quickly and efficiently helped to salvage so much from the burning buildings. In very difficult and dangerous circumstances they performed with skill, courage and dedication. There was no loss of life and only limited damage to works of art—one picture, one sideboard, and an antique carpet appear to have been lost. The fire was contained to one area, and the contingency planning was put into effect most successfully.

Investigations into the cause of the fire started almost immediately, and I will receive a complete report in due course. Scaffolding is being erected to stabilise the structure, and temporary roofing will be provided. Surveys will then be carried out to identify what action is needed to restore the buildings, and a full report is expected within a month. Meanwhile, the rubble will be carefully sifted by experts from English Heritage and elsewhere, working in close co-operation with the royal household, to provide essential information for authentic restoration work. It will then be possible to estimate the scale and cost of the restoration work, and to plan for it. Those of the state apartments that have not been damaged will be open to the public as soon as feasible.

Windsor castle is the property of the state, and it is the Government's responsibility to ensure that resources are provided to maintain it in a manner commensurate with its status, and its role on occasions of state. Therefore, I have no hesitation in saying that resources will be provided to restore that most precious and well loved part of our national heritage.

Once preliminary examinations of the circumstances of the fire have been completed and considered, I shall want to decide in consultation with the royal household that further investigations are necessary.

Windsor castle is a world famous symbol of this country. I believe that it is our duty to ensure that the damage is repaired as soon as possible.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): The Opposition share the profound sense of loss at the destruction of such a valuable part of our national heritage in the Windsor castle fire. However, we regret the failure of the Minister to set up a public inquiry into the causes of the fire and the lessons to be learned. We echo the tributes to the impressive work undertaken by the firefighters of the Berkshire fire service and others involved in the rescue operation. They displayed great courage in extremely difficult circumstances. All of us owe a great debt of gratitude to them. However, Opposition Members have several serious concerns about the safety arrangements and fire precautions at Windsor. Those questions were not fully dealt with by the Minister.

Sir John Garlick's report following the fire at Hampton court recommended more effective fire drills held jointly between the local fire brigade and Hampton court palace staff. Was that recommendation implemented in the case of Windsor castle? How many fire drills have there been involving castle staff and the Berkshire fire service, and what were the dates of those drills? If the Secretary of State does not have that information today, will he let me have it tomorrow? On the same basis, can the House be informed whether British standard 5839—the code of practice for the installation and servicing of fire-related equipment, including the use of a logbook—was implemented at Windsor castle during the period before the fire?

Why did the Property Services Agency, as part of its preparation for privatisation, transfer responsibility for fire protection at royal buildings to the royal household two years ago? Does the Secretary of State agree that if, as he said, they are buildings of the nation and part of the nation's heritage, the nation should be responsible for fire protection?

Can the Secretary of State say why the Government closed the Crown Suppliers, which was responsible for providing expert advice on fire protection? Can he inform the House who is left within the Government to provide expert advice to Government Departments and to the royal family on anti-inflammable materials? Will the Secretary of State tell the House whether it is true that the royal household refused English Heritage access to survey parts of the castle that have been rewired and structurally altered in the past few years?

Will the Secretary of State confirm that Windsor castle's 12 part-time firemen were made redundant under a cost-cutting exercise five years ago? Does he agree that the fire could have been dealt with much more effectively in the crucial first few minutes of the blaze if that force had still been in place? Will the right hon. Gentleman comment on suggestions that there was considerable ambiguity about the respective roles of the royal household, the PSA, the internal fire prevention services and the Berkshire fire brigade—an ambiguity which delayed the firefighting exercise?

Is the Secretary of State aware that, according to documents leaked to The Sunday Times, the castle was considering abandoning its computerised alarm system because it was "very labour-intensive"? Is it not the case that, as the consequences of cost cutting, high-pressure water-jet pumps were replaced by inferior pumps less capable of fighting a major blaze?

Can the right hon. Gentleman give more details of the safety conditions imposed on the private contractors involved in rewiring the area around Windsor chapel? Were contractors undertaking electrical work in that part of the building where the fire started? English Heritage, the National Trust and most national museums have banned hot work except with stringent safeguards. Can the Secretary of State say whether such safeguards were in force at Windsor?

Can the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that he will include within the remit of any inquiry clarification of what is public and what is private property on the Windsor estate—what is ours, what is theirs, and whether there are any grey areas?

The Garlick report on the Hampton court fire concluded:

> "Perhaps the most important lesson of the Hampton Court Palace fire . . . is that the preservation of our national heritage requires that the best material contribution from science and technology is matched by a corresponding commitment to securing the best organisation and use of human resources."

The whole country is asking whether we learned those lessons.

Several of my hon. Friends as well as members of the public raised the question of who should pay. The right hon. Gentleman has already pledged this afternoon that the total cost will be paid out of the public purse. While there is a great deal of public sympathy for the monarch, there is also legitimate public concern that the total cost of repair should not be paid exclusively by the taxpayer. Has the right hon. Gentleman ruled out a contribution from the royal family, and would he welcome such a contribution if it were offered?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Lady has asked me a series of questions. I am grateful for the sympathy that she expressed at the outset.

The hon. Lady asked about the inquiry. I did say that, as soon as we had received the preliminary report, I would discuss with the royal household whether there were further matters that we should investigate. She also asked about fire service drills. If that is a matter of particular importance to her, I shall let her know the dates of drills; but they occur on a regular basis. One of the most recent rehearsals was carried out in the Brunswick tower, which was affected by the fire.

Although the part of the castle that was affected by the fire is not subject to fire regulations, it is the royal household's policy to comply with them. It is, however, in the nature of such ancient buildings that it is not possible to carry out all the regulations that are laid down for modern buildings without destroying some of the historic fabric. I understand that the regulations are being complied with in the castle as far as that is feasible; indeed, fire precaution measures exceed the guidance set out in them.

The hon. Lady asked a number of questions relating to the part-time fire service. The changes made in 1991 have brought about a positive improvement in part-time arrangements. The complications were reduced when a central Government Department and the Property Services Agency, as well as the royal household, became involved. It is, I think, universally agreed that the previous arrangements were unsatisfactory, and that the present ones are much better.

The hon. Lady asked about the denial of access to English Heritage. The rewiring which occasioned the issue did not involve significant renovation work, and English Heritage experts were not needed; they have, however, been fully involved in renovation of the round tower. The hon. Lady also asked about cuts. The castle-based fire service has increased its full-time staff from five to six. She mentioned 12 part-timers: I acknowledge that that figure has fallen to nine, but if volunteer part-timers came forward, they would willingly be accepted.

It was suggested that there had been delay owing to ambiguity. On Saturday, I spent a long time with the relevant officer in the Berkshire fire service. He was clear that the arrangements—for which there had been preparation—had worked extremely well. The castle fire service was used for its specific purposes, providing guidance and, in particular, identifying the order in which objects should be removed.

The hon. Lady asked where the distinction lay between public and private property. Responsibility for the fabric of the castle rests with the Government, as it has done since 1831, before the introduction of the great Reform Bill. The contents of the castle constitute a royal collection, and responsibility for them therefore rests with the Queen. Let me stress to the hon. Lady, in terms of the question that she asked——

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): She asked about hot-work certificates.

Mr. Brooke: I shall come back to that.

The hon. Lady asked specifically about public and private property. The state apartments, where the fire occurred, were not Her Majesty's private apartments, and were, therefore, essentially public. Not all of them are open to the public all the time, but they are state rooms in which state functions occur.

As for the question that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) just prompted me about, when we have received the report on the origins of the fire, we shall be able to go into the practical details.

The hon. Member for Clwyd finally asked me whether the lessons of Sir John Garlick's report had been learned. A substantial series of works were put in hand, including those at Windsor castle, as a result of his recommendations. In the context of what the hon. Lady said about who should pay, I have already referred to the Government's responsibility, which goes back over 160 years, for the fabric of the castle. The responsibility for that lies clearly and firmly with the Government.

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor and Maidenhead): In thanking my right hon. Friend for his full statement, will he bear in mind the fact that my constituents in the royal borough are particularly distressed by the damage caused by fire to the castle? Does he accept that, while the castle is a priceless part of Britain's national heritage, it is to my constituents, and particularly to the good townspeople of Windsor, a familiar friend that they hold in great affection? It is a central part of their lives and their livelihood. I speak not only for myself but also for my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay), with whom I share parliamentary representation of the roayl borough. He sits on the Treasury Bench and, as the House understands, cannot speak at this time.

Does my right hon. Friend also agree that various of the royal borough's and county's services, led by the fire service combined with the expertise of the auxiliary service in the castle, were of the highest standard during the terrible events of last weekend?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks, just as I was grateful for his presence in the castle on Saturday when we looked at the damage. Of course I link with any remarks those of my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East. My hon. Friend expresses a universal view when he praises the quality and effectiveness of the work done and the co-operation achieved in fighting this disaster.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): May I, on behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends, join in the sympathy that has been extended to Her Majesty and in the admiration that has been expressed to the firemen? May I also express our relief that the chairman of English Heritage, Mr. Jocelyn Stevens, has not been able so far to deprive us of the expertise that will enable the rubble to be investigated by English Heritage experts?

The question of the public interest in Windsor castle and all the royal residences goes beyond the fabric of the building, which has been protected by the 1831 Act, to its contents—the works of art and the decorations. The accident of the Queen choosing to reside in a certain part of the castle cannot determine how best those objects have to be protected. A proper and full inventory is needed of buildings that are publicly protected, and also of their contents, so that the public can be assured that they are being properly protected.

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his remarks, both of sympathy and of admiration. In the context of what he said about English Heritage, the people who gave advice on the restoration of Hampton Court palace, as well as experts from other parts of the public services and elsewhere, are not the precise people with whom his question was connected in the context of English Heritage's plans. As to the hon. Gentleman's question about an inventory, I understand that what is known as photogammetry has been carried out in all the rooms concerned, and that there is therefore a substantial record against which restoration work can be conducted.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Is my right hon. Friend aware that we on the Benches behind him warmly endorse what he has said, in particular his expression of sympathy to the Queen? Is my right hon. Friend further aware that, when £60 million is divided among a population of 57 million, it come to about £1 a head, or, spread over 10 years, to about 10p a head per year; and that I know of no one who would resent paying such a sum to restore a vital part of Britain's heritage that draws an immense number of foreign visitors, which benefits Britain as a whole? Is my right hon. Friend also aware that Hampton Court palace staff rushed to the scene and helped to rescue the paintings?

Mr. Brooke: I am quite certain that the views of sympathy that my hon. Friend expressed are shared throughout the House. He expressed a notional cost fugure, and although I have seen figures quoted in the press, I cannot lend any credence to them, as such preparatory planning has not been done. I am certain that those who came from Hampton Court palace, like everyone else involved, enjoy the gratitude of the nation for the manner in which the works of art were so successfully rescued from the castle.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): Since the Secretary of State is quite rightly paying considerable resources to Windsor castle following an accident for which I do not blame the Government, does he agree that, where we lose our heritage as a direct result of the Government's action, the Government equally should pay money? I think in particular of Frickley Colliery Athletic football club and Grimethorpe colliery band, both of which will cease to exist, and which, as the hon. Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Mr. Trend) said, are crucial to the communities that they represent.

Mr. Brooke: I do not know precisely where responsibility lies—[Interruption.] No, people should not become excited. I genuinely recognise the significance of what the hon. Gentleman said, and it is one of the considerations that I have been putting my mind to in the context of potential closures.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does my right hon. Friend accept that those who have been deeply distressed by the fire over the weekend have been almost as distressed by some of the mean-spirited comments that have been made following it? Will he emphasise that we are dealing with an official residence where people are entertained in the name of this country by our head of state, who represents much better value than most presidents, and that it is just as legitimate to spend money on this as it would be if a misfortune happened at Chequers, whoever was the occupant at the time?

Does my right hon. Friend agree that the treasures of the royal collection cannot be sold and are available to the public, who see them in their thousands, if not millions, every year? Does he further agree that we can be encouraged not only by the wonderful efforts of the firefighters in rescuing so many treasures but by the fact that we know from Hampton Court that we have brilliant British craftsmen who will be able to restore the building to its former glory?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's admirable common sense, and I hope that his comments will inform the argument about the issue, because he is quite right about the essence of the castle and its contents. I entirely share the admiration that he expressed about our craftsmen.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): My right hon. and hon. Friends and I wish to be associated with the Secretary of State's expression of sympathy to the sovereign, but who is ultimately responsible for the decision not to insure such buildings, and did the premium saved cover the cost of the damage?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's initial expression of sympathy. It is a long-established principle of Governments, of all parties and colours, that we do not insure such buildings, and I should be surprised if the Treasury had not done a calculation showing that it is a more economical way of proceeding.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): This fire was undoubtedly a tragedy and a disaster for the nation. My right hon. Friend will recall that, following the similarly awful fire at Hampton Court, Ministers at the Department of the Environment, then responsible for that building, called for an extensive report on the precautions that should be taken for the future. I refer to the report by Sir John Garlick.

My right hon. Friend has said that the lessons of the Hampton Court fire and the report on it have been duly noted. Can he assure the House that the Government have provided the necessary financial means to carry out the lessons of the report?

Mr. Brooke: I should perhaps have clarified earlier the fact that the lessons have been not only learned but acted on. My hon. Friend will recall from his time at the Department of the Environment the scale of the assistance given to Hampton Court palace. The programme mounted in Windsor and elsewhere has been on a larger scale still, some of it devoted to rewiring and related issues and some of it to fire precautions.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I have not lost one second's sleep over this tragedy—[HON. MEMBERS: "Shame".] No lives were lost, and that is what is most important.

How can we suddenly find any amount of money—perhaps as much as £60 million—when in the same week most local authorities may be capped, when cardboard city still exists, when houses are falling apart and when people are being dispossessed? How can the right hon. Gentleman justify that?

Mr. Brooke: I mentioned earlier the cost involved. How this matter will be funded will depend partly on what is required. I do not expect the likely amount to be easily absorbable in the budget of my Department, but I shall discuss that with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary when I have had an estimate of the costs. Clearly, restoration in cases like this involves work spread over a number of years.

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): My right hon. Friend confirmed that Windsor castle has been the responsibility of the Government since 1831. Will he also confirm that it has been open to the public throughout the 19th century and into this century, and that substantial overseas earnings are gained by its being open for tourism? Will he also confirm that Her Majesty is personally responsible for the maintenance of the royal collection, which has been greatly added to during the course of this reign, and that she will pay a large sum of money for the restoration of any damaged works in the collection?

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend's last point was entirely correct. As for the castle being open to the public, the range of media bids that I have received from other parts of the world is an indication of how much the rest of the world regards Windsor castle as a symbol of the nation.

Ms. Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): The Minister will recall making a statement to this House on 26 October regarding the redirection and concentration of budget resources for English Heritage. On that day, such redirection and concentration meant that 180 historic sites were deemed no longer within its remit. How is it that, in less than a month, the Government have found sufficient funds to underwrite, apparently, the entire reconstruction work necessary after the great fire of Windsor? Where has the money come from? Would it have been spent on other aspects of English Heritage's remit if the fire had not occurred?

Mr. Brooke: On the date in question, I answered a private notice question: I did not make a statement. The hon. Lady's question about that is not wholly germane to today's statement. Since then, discussions have continued on the nature of the negotiations that will occur with bodies that will perhaps be prepared to take over such sites. I told the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) a moment ago that I still have to discuss funding with my hon. Friend the Chief Secretary.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that most sensible people will reject the mean and Pecksniffian attitude of the Opposition? If Windsor castle is not part of our national heritage, it is hard to know what is. Is my right hon. Friend aware that the overwhelming majority of people, apart from a few readers of The Sun like the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), would gladly contribute to the restoration?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his robust Dickensian adjectives, and I share his view of the attitude of the country.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that English Heritage has proposed that royal immunity from planning legislation and public inspection should be removed from unoccupied palaces? Should not that arrangement be extended to occupied palaces? Is it not a fair share of responsibility that the Government should be responsible for repair to the fabric of the palace, as it is a heritage property, and that the Queen, as I understand it, will be responsible for restoration and treatment of any paintings or artefacts that need treatment?

Mr. Brooke: In answer to an earlier question, I made it clear that the royal household went beyond the guidance for fire regulations, even though the royal household is not specifically and directly responsible for them. Similar considerations apply in terms of other regulations. The hon. Gentleman's concluding question was entirely accurate.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the lessons and warnings to be absorbed from this episode go beyond royal palaces? Does he also agree that, at a time of recession, many national treasures, not necessarily in public ownership, are also at risk as a result of people cutting protection and care and maintenance? Does he accept that it is part of his responsibilities to ensure that no existing or potential national treasures are at risk from fire and similar irreparable damage?

Mr. Brooke: I must take issue with my hon. Friend's phrase about cutting care and maintenance, which implied that that had been the case in this instance. I assure my hon. Friend that that was not the case, but of course I share his view about the care that we should extend to national treasures.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Is it altogether wise for the Secretary of State to give undertakings to anyone until he has received the surveyor's report? Is it not accepted by structural engineers that ancient walls are destabilished when they are subjected to intense heat? Might not each Norman stone have to be dismantled and reconstructed, and would not £60 million be only a starting price for such work? Does the Secretary of State recollect that he attended the Adjournment debate on Pitchford hall, and that there are many other calls on English Heritage? It might turn out that some of our heritage, like Linlithgow palace, might have to remain in ruins and the cost of repair be absolutely disproportionate.

Mr. Brooke: I have been careful in all my answers to say that I have no precise indication at the moment of what the cost will be, and the determination of how we resolve that must await the figures. I acknowledge the possibility behind the hon. Gentleman's question, because he will know what had to be done with individual timbers at Hampton Court palace. On the other hand, I have to say—I agree that this is not an informed statement—after touring the castle on Saturday, that those from the fire service themselves said that, because of the building's quality, it was less likely that the walls would have to be dismantled than might be the case in more modern walls.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): My right hon. Friend is aware that the Isle of Wight enjoys a very special relationship with the royal family, not least because of Osborne house, which houses one of the foremost collections relating to our government of India. In due course, will my right hon. Friend find time to write to me to confirm that the fire precautions in the royal palace are adequate and up to date?

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend is quite right to bring Osborne house to my attention. My Department has a particular responsibility for the house and I will gladly write to him. I am due to write to him on other matters in relation to the House in any event.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): The most important fact is that no life was lost. Did the Secretary of State consult the Prime Minister, the royal family, their advisers or anybody else before he decided to sign a blank cheque on our behalf and at our expense? If not, why not? Does he accept that the argument that the taxpayer should pay the bill rather lends support to the argument that the royal family should pay taxes just like everybody else?

Mr. Brooke: In answer to the hon. Gentleman's first question, I was asked at Windsor on Saturday a specific question: "Who will pay?" I enunciated the statutory responsibility of my Department for royal palaces. The hon. Gentleman's second question is for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): Will my right hon. Friend take heart from the remarkable restoration of York minster? Will he ensure that we employ the nation's finest craftsmen and builders to put the building right? Will he ensure also that visitors can see the restoration as it is being undertaken?

Mr. Brooke: Of course I assure my hon. Friend of the quality of craftsmen whom we will use. My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), the Under-Secretary of State, will be visiting York next week, and there will be a further opportunity for consultation.
